Whether in a given case the delivery of a deed to a third party, to be delivered by him to the grantee after the grantor's death, is to be deemed a delivery in presenti or not, is generally a question of fact depending upon the conduct and intention of the parties to such a transaction. Two of the essential features of such a delivery are these: (1) The grantor must deliver the deed to a third person for the benefit of the grantee ultimately, and in some way express his intention to that effect; and (2) by the very great weight of authority the grantor must, at the time of such delivery to the third person, part both with the possession of the deed and with all dominion and control over it. See the cases cited to this effect in the note to the case of Munro v. Bowles, 54 L. R. A. 871, 872; Porter v. Woodhouse, 59 Conn. 568, 22 Atl. 299, 13 L. R. A. 64, 21 Am. St. Rep. 181. A delivery so made and accepted by the grantee is irrevocable by the grantor, and cannot by him be recalled, or revoked, or modified, without the consent of the grantee. Arnegard v. Arnegard, 7 N. D. 475, 75 N. W. 797, 41 L. R. A. 258; Bury v. Young, 98 Cal. 446, 83 Pac. 338, 35 Am. St. Rep. 186; Issitt v. Dewey, 47 Neb. 196, 66 N. W. 288; Everett v. Everett, 48 N. Y. 218; 16 Cyc. 568, and cases there cited. We think the facts found in the case at bar clearly show that the delivery of deed A to Mr. Pierce was in effect a present delivery of it, to be held by him for the benefit of the grantee and subject to the life use of the grantor, and at her death to be surrendered by him to such grantee. As shown by her request to Pierce, the grantor fully intended to pass the fee of the property to the plaintiff at the date of the deed, subject only to her life use; and the transaction into which she then entered with Pierce and the plaintiff was well adapted to carry out her intent. She intended to add did, in delivering the deed to Pierce, part with the possession of the deed, and with all her dominion and control over it.

The defendant claims that the delivery to Pierce was of no effect because he was the agent and attorney of the grantor, and consequently that the deed in his hands was in her hands. If the facts found supported the above claim, the claimed consequence would undoubtedly follow; but they do not; on the contrary, they clearly show that, in taking delivery of deed A, Pierce was not the agent of the grantor in any respect. The defendant further claims that, as deed A was made without consideration, the delivery of it to Pierce could be revoked by the grantor at will; and in support of this claim he cites the cases of Belden v. Carter, 4 Day, 66, 4 Am. Dec. 185, and that of Hoig v. Adrian College, 83 Ill. 267. These cases do not support his claim. In Belden v. Carter the grantor expressly retained control of the deed during his life; and in the Illinois case cited it was held, merely, that a deed of land intended as a gift may be withdrawn before delivery of it is complete. In the case at bar the gift was accepted and complete before the grantor attempted to revoke the delivery of the deed, and then it was too late, as is held even in cases where the deed was made without consideration. Brown v. Austen, 35 Barb. 341; Issitt v. Dewey, 47 Neb. 196, 66 N. W. 288; Brown v. Westfield, 47 Neb. 399, 66 N. W. 439, 53 Am. St. Rep. 582.

Upon the facts found in this case we think that the delivery to Pierce was irrevocable by the grantor, without the consent of the grantee; that by such delivery the title to the fee of the land described in deed A immediately passed to the plaintiff, subject to the grantor's life use; and that such title, as against the grantor, and as against the defendant, her subsequent grantee without consideration and with knowledge of the existence and delivery of deed A, is a good and valid superior title.

There is no error. In this opinion the other Judges concurred.

BOARDMAN v. BOARDMAN et al.

TRUSTS — CAPITAL AND INCOME — DIVIDENDS ON STOCK.

Testator's will created a trust fund, the income to go to his widow for life, and on her death the corpus to certain remaindermen. Shares of bank stock were set apart to such fund, and thereafter the bank absorbed another, and the transaction by which the absorption was brought about resulted in the declaration of an extra dividend. The funds out of which the dividends were paid could not be traced to their source, but after payment the price of the stock was greater than at the institution of the trust, and the capital of the bank was unimpaired. Held, that the dividend was income, and did not belong to the corpus of the fund.

Case Reserved from Superior Court, New Haven County; William S. Case, Judge.

Suit by William J. Boardman, as trustee under the will of William W. Boardman, deceased, against Lucy H. Boardman and others, to determine rights to a fund in the hands of the trustee. Questions of law arising upon an agreed statement of facts reserved for the advice of the Supreme Court. Rights determined.

Henry C. White and John Q. Tilson, for plaintiff. Burton Mansfield, for defendants.

PRENTICE, J. William W. Boardman, who died in 1871, left a will by which he created a trust fund of $200,000. His widow, Lucy J. Boardman, and his nephew, William J. Boardman, are the trustees of this fund. By the terms of the will, "the dividends, rents and profits" of the fund were to go to his said wife during her natural life. The remainder over passed into the residue of the estate, which was given to a sister and the testator's nephews and nieces named in the will. May 7, 1872, certain securities belonging to the estate were distributed and set apart to this fund. Among them were 100 shares of the capital stock of the National Bank of Commerce of New York, of the par value of $100 each, and 200 shares of the capital stock of the Mechanics' National Bank of New York, of the par value of $25 each. The former stock was then appraised at $118 a share and the latter at $33.75, or $135 for each $100 of stock. In 1877 the capital stock of the National Bank of Commerce was reduced one-half by the payment back to the stockholders of the par value of the surrendered stock. This left the holding of the trust fund in this stock at 50 shares. The balance of the original holding was represented by the cash paid, as aforesaid, in the reduction process. In 1903 the Bank of Commerce took over the assets, business, and liabilities of the Western National Bank of New York. This merger or absorption was accomplished by the following process: It was agreed by the parties that the Bank of Commerce should become the purchaser of the assets and business of the Western and assume its liabilities, and that the latter bank should liquidate; that to this end the capital stock of each bank should be increased, that of the Bank of Commerce from $10,000,000 to $25,000,000, of which sum, however, $12,500,000 should not be issued, except to consummate the purchase, and that of the Western to $12,500,000; that each bank should have a surplus of $5,000,000; that the assets of each over and above those required to create such capital and surplus might be declared to its stockholders in dividends; and that, when this was accomplished, the Bank of Commerce should issue $12,500,000 of its authorized increase in payment for the assets and business of the Western, which should thereupon be transferred to the former bank. This course was pursued, whereupon the Bank of Commerce became one with $25,000,000 of capital and $10,000,000 of surplus, and the Western Bank ceased to exist. In the process thus outlined the Bank of Commerce increased its capital stock by $15,000,000. Of this amount $12,500,000 was retained, and $2,500,000 was at once issued so as to raise its existing capital, in anticipation of the merger, to $12,500,000. The right to subscribe for this issue was given to stockholders at the rate of $140 a share; each owner of four shares having the right to take one new share. This right attaching to the stock held by the trustees was exercised by them, and the stock thus acquired added to the corpus of the fund. Upon the completion of the preparations for the merger the bank found itself possessed of assets in excess of its capital of $12,500,000 and of the $5,000,000 of surplus agreed to be retained, and the directors thereupon declared a cash dividend of 57½ per cent. for the purpose of surrendering this excess to the stockholders. Pursuant to this declaration there was paid to the trustees the sum of $2,875, which they now hold. In the communication to the shareholders, in which the board of directors first made known the proposed plan of merger, it was stated, in connection with the provision for a large dividend, that, "of course, the payment of such a dividend is conditional upon, and can be made only as a part of, the consummation of the plan in its entirety." For 10 years prior to the events last recited the Bank of Commerce had paid regular dividends of 8 per cent. per annum. In April, 1900, and again in July, 1903, special dividends of small amounts had been declared. Following the payment of said dividend of 57½ per cent., the market value of the stock of said bank did not fall below $215 a share. In 1904 the Mechanics' National Bank of New York absorbed the Leather Manufacturers' National Bank of New York by a process precisely similar in all pertinent particulars to that already described. The capital stock of the Mechanics' was increased from $2,000,000 to $3,000,000, of which amount $310,000 was issued to its shareholders at par, and $690,000 retained and finally issued in payment for the assets and business of the Leather Manufacturers'. The Mechanics' was to have at the time of the merger and had $2,310,000 of capital and $3,092,174 of surplus, the Leather Manufacturers' $800,000 of capital and $1,017,600 of surplus. The Mechanics' after the transaction was completed, and its $690,000 of new stock issued in payment, thus had $3,000,000 of capital and $4,409,000 of surplus. The dividend declared by the Mechanics' was at the rate of 89 per cent., yielding $1,950 to the trustees. For 10 years prior to the merger the Mechanics' had paid 10 per cent. in dividends regularly. Subsequent thereto the market price of said stock did not fall below $235 a share. The trustees availed themselves of the opportunity offered to subscribe at par for their pro rata share of the $310,000 issue of stock, and thus took 30 shares. The source of the funds out of which the dividends were paid cannot be traced.

Mrs. Boardman, the life beneficiary, claims that she is entitled to have the whole amount of the two cash dividends paid as above stated. Those representing the remainder interest claim that their amount less only $125, being the equivalent of a regular quarterly dividend on the Bank of Commerce stock, should be added to the corpus of the trust fund. The conflicting claims thus made are the same as those which were under discussion in Smith v. Dana, 77 Conn. 543, 60 Atl. 117, 69 L. R. A. 76, and the conclusions then reached are controlling of the rights of the parties in this case. In that case we reaffirmed the so-called Massachusetts rule that ordinarily cash dividends upon corporate stock are to be regarded as income and stock dividends as capital. It was not claimed for this rule that it was one whose application would accomplish exact justice in all cases. What was claimed was that some clear, intelligible, and workable rule was a necessity, and that the difficulties in the way of stating any other practical rule were so insurmountable as to render the chosen one, if employed with a due regard for the substance and intent of the vote of declaration, the fairest and best for general use, all things considered, which could be devised. The application of this rule would confessedly bar the claim here made on behalf of the remainder interest. But the opinion in Smith v. Dana recognized the possibility that there might be exceptional situations which would call for exceptional treatment; and the remaindermen here rest their claim upon the assertion that the circumstances of this case reveal such a situation. In the former case we stated our conclusion that the adopted rule, when interpreted and applied as there indicated, was such a judicious one for general application that few, if any, exceptions to it should be admitted. But whether more or less exceptions are to be recognized, it is clear that no appeal can be successfully made for any which does not find its justification in a demonstration clearly made, that the general rule would under the conditions work inequity, and that some other determination of the conflicting claims would lead to results more in consonance with the strict rights of the parties. In Smith v. Dana we recognized, and whether by way of an exception or not we had no occasion to determine, that where any part of the capital of a corporation was being surrendered and paid back to the share owners, although through the form of a cash dividend, the benefit of that dividend should accrue to the capital interest. The reason and justice of this as according to the parties their clear rights are evident. It cannot be claimed that there is anything in the circumstances of the present declarations of dividends to make them the means whereby capital was sought to be returned to stockholders. If the case presents any situation which deserves to be regarded as exceptional, it must be found in other conditions. It is claimed to be found in the fact that the dividends were declared as incidents of the merger of two corporations and for the immediate purpose of so adjusting the capital and assets of the merging institutions that the merger could be accomplished. It is not suggested, nor do we discover, how this bears upon the rights of the parties before us. It matters not whether the transactions of which the declarations were incidents are, from the point of view of the surviving banks, to be regarded as mergers, or as expansions through acquisition, or as something else. The ultimate purpose which the stockholders had in view can of itself have no significance in our present inquiry. The pertinent question is, what was in fact done in the matter of the declarations, what were the resources drawn upon in the payment of the dividends, and what was their effect upon the assets of the corporations and the stock, as bearing upon the conflicting capital and income interests? The investigation to be made is one which looks beneath the surface to discover what there was in the operation or effect of the present dividend declarations which justifies these remaindermen in asserting that they ought in equity and right to have the benefit of them, and that to permit a different result would be to suffer a palpable injustice to be done.

We find the facts to be that the capital of each of the banks in which the trust fund owned stock was increased, the capital interest in the trust stock receiving all the benefit resulting therefrom; that the funds out of which the dividends were paid cannot be traced to their source; that after they were paid each bank had an unimpaired capital, the full amount required to be retained by national banks as a surplus fund, any amount, as in the case of the Bank of Commerce, received as contributions from shareholders through the premium paid upon new issues of stock, and a considerable amount of assets besides; and that, following the dividend payments, the market value of each stock remained at more than $2 for each $1 of capital, and nearly twice as high as it was at the institution of the trust. Rev. St. U. S. § 5199 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3494]. These facts clearly disclose that there was no surrender of capital in the case of either corporation. The dividends having been paid out of funds which cannot be traced specifically, and their payment having left an unimpaired capital and a net surplus as described, they were paid out of surplus. Having been paid out of surplus, the presumption is that they were paid out of profits. Smith v. Dana, 77 Conn. 543, 555, 60 Atl. 117, 69 L. R. A. 76. There is nothing whatever in the agreed facts to rebut this presumption. On the contrary, as the corporations were both national banks, there is much to indicate that the presumption is one supported by the fact. Rev. St. U. S. §§ 5136, 5137 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, pp. 3455, 3460]. The remaindermen have therefore failed to show, and the burden is upon them to do so, that the operation of the rule of general application would be to take from the corporation aught which was not the direct contribution of profits, or to otherwise wrongfully injure the capital interest, either by its improper depreciation or by a diversion therefrom of anything to which it is rightfully entitled, or in any other manner. Their contention, when analyzed, resolves itself into one whose sole foundation is the mistaken notion, which so frequently appears in arguments in support of the claims of remaindermen, that in some unexplained way profits which are not promptly declared in dividends, but are for some reason or other, influencing the exercise of that large discretionary power which is vested in directors, permitted to accumulate in the form of surplus, acquire some sort of character which deprives the income interest of any equitable claim upon them, even if they later chance to follow the course they might have originally followed and go out in cash dividends, and entitles the capital interest to the benefit of them as an accretion thereto, whatever course may be thereafter pursued in respect to them. It was one of the aims of the opinion in Smith v. Dana to combat that fallacy. In reaching our conclusion, we have given to the language of the will creating the trust which gave to Mrs. Boardman "the dividends, rents and profits" of the fund no peculiar significance favorable to her, but have treated the quoted words as synonymous with "use and income," as the remaindermen urged that we should.

The superior court is advised that Mrs. Lucy H. Boardman is entitled to receive from said trustees the full amount of said two dividends received by them. Costs in this court will be taxed in favor of Mrs. Boardman and against the other defendants. In this opinion the other Judges concurred.

CLARK et al. v. FITZSIMMONS.

1. APPEAL—FINDINGS—REVIEW.

Where there was evidence from which the court might lawfully draw the inferences of fact which supported the judgment, and it did not appear that the court omitted to find any admitted or undisputed fact material to any question of law, the court's findings would not be interfered with on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, New Haven County; William S. Case, Judge.

Action by George L. Clark and others against Fannie Fitzsimmons to set aside an alleged voluntary conveyance of land for mistake, fraud, undue influence, and incapacity on the part of the grantor. A judgment was rendered in favor of defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

William B. Stoddard, for appellants. William H. Comley, Jr., for appellee.

HAMERSLEY, J. This appeal is not advisedly taken. It presents no contested question of law. The judgment rendered is clearly the true legal conclusion from the facts found by the trial court. It is not assigned as error that the court was controlled or influenced by any erroneous view of the law in reaching its conclusions of fact. The appellants in their brief confess that, if the facts are true as found by the trial court, they have no case in court, but claim that certain material facts found by the court and upon which its judgment was based were found without any evidence, and ask that the finding may be corrected. It is manifest from an inspection of the evidence certified that this claim and request are made without reasonable foundation. There plainly was evidence from which the court might lawfully draw the inferences of fact which support its judgment, and it does not appear that the court has omitted from the finding any admitted or undisputed fact material to any question of law. There is no occasion for a correction of the finding. Hourigan v. Norwich, 77 Conn. 358, 368, 59 Atl. 487.

There is no error in the judgment of the superior court. The other Judges concurred.

HARRISON et al. v. INTERNATIONAL SILVER CO.

1. PARTITION—ACTIONS—TENANTS IN COMMON—POSSESSION—NECESSITY—STATUTES.

Gen. St. 1888, § 1307 (Gen. St. 1902, § 1037), provides that courts of equity may, on the petition of any person interested, order the sale of any estate, real or personal, owned by two or more persons, when in the opinion of the court a sale will better promote the interests of the owners. As first passed in 1848 (Laws 1848, p. 49, c. 59), the first section of the act provided that the superior court, as a court of equity, might order the partition of any real estate held in joint tenancy, tenancy in common, or coparcenary, and section 2 (page 50) that the court might, on the petition of any person interested, order the sale of any real estate so held, whenever in its opinion a sale would better promote the interests of all parties than a partition. Comp. St. 1854, p. 480. The section, as modified in 1852, 1853, and 1858, appeared in Revision 1875, p. 481, as it now stands. Held, that under the statute a person actually ousted of possession by his alleged tenant in common cannot seek a court of equity for the purpose of establishing his title and regaining possession and thereupon obtaining a decree of partition and sale; the statute introducing no new principle into the common-law rule.

2. SAME.

One claiming to own land as tenant in common with others and actually ousted must establish a unity of possession before asking partition.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 38, Cent. Dig. Partition, § 60.]

3. DISMISSAL—DEFECT OF PARTIES.

Where, in an action for sale of land by tenants in common, defendants couple with their defense a counterclaim, asking affirmative relief confirming and establishing the title to the land, and it appears that parties necessary to an adjudication are not parties to the action, it should be dismissed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 17, Cent. Dig. Dismissal and Nonsuit, § 127.]

Case Reserved from Superior Court, New Haven County; Ralph Wheeler, Judge.

Action by Alexander Harrison and others against the International Silver Company for sale of land owned by tenants in common, brought to the superior court in New Haven county on the first Tuesday of March, 1900. After answer by the defendant the court found the facts and reserved the question as to what judgment shall be rendered by the superior court upon said facts for the advice of this court. Judgment advised for defendant.

The plaintiffs are sons of Apollos W. Harrison and Margaret L., his wife. Prior to 1873 Apollos W. Harrison and wife and his children, namely, the plaintiffs Margaret A. Harrison and Apollos Butler Harrison, who is since deceased, and whose interest passed in equal shares to his sister and the plaintiffs, claimed to be owners of the land described in the complaint by force of provisions of the will of Thomas Belden, deceased, whose estate was settled as a testate estate in 1842; Harrison and wife claiming a life estate in the wife and the children the remainder. In 1873 the land was purchased by and conveyed to one Tobias Kohn, under whom the defendant now claims title. At that time the plaintiffs were minors, being, respectively, 18 and 20 years of age and their sister was of full age. Mrs. Harrison was then insane, and one H. H. Fitch was her conservator, and as such in charge and possession of the land. Apollos W. Harrison and his daughter, Margaret A., conveyed their interest in the land to Kohn by warranty deed. Fitch, as conservator of Mrs. Harrison and guardian of her minor children, conveyed the land to Kohn by deed reciting that he was duly authorized to make such conveyance as guardian and conservator by an order of a court of probate passed on June 28, 1873. Kohn paid to Fitch, for the interests of Harrison and wife and their children, about $3,500, which was the fair value of the land conveyed. Fitch charged himself as conservator with the proceeds of the sale, and remitted said proceeds to Apollos W. Harrison, husband of Margaret L. and father of the plaintiffs. Since the conveyance to Kohn the land has been conveyed by Kohn and his successors in title, has been mortgaged and the mortgages thereon foreclosed, and through a series of mesne conveyances was finally sold to the defendant in April, 1899. In 1874 buildings and improvements were erected on the land by the defendant's predecessor in title at a cost of $45,000, and said improvements have since been maintained by the defendant and its predecessors in title. Apollos W. Harrison died in 1886, and the same year his sons, the plaintiffs, first learned of the conveyances of said land, and became advised of certain defects in the appointment of Fitch as their guardian, which, as was claimed, rendered his conveyance of their interest in the land to Kohn absolutely void, and were advised that they could not commence any action against the parties in possession of and claiming to own the land until after the death of their mother, which occurred December 28, 1898. The plaintiffs gave no notice of their claim to the persons occupying and claiming to own the land until shortly before the commencement of this suit. In February, 1900, the plaintiffs brought this complaint, alleging themselves and the defendant to be in possession as tenants in common of the land in question, and that they own an undivided two-thirds and the defendant an undivided one-third thereof, and claiming a sale of the land. The defendant in its answer denied each allegation of the complaint, and set up a second defense, coupled with a counterclaim. The finding of the court shows that at the commencement of this action, and for more than 26 years prior thereto, the defendant and its predecessors in title have had the actual, exclusive, and uninterrupted possession and use of the land in question under the claim of title in fee simple thereto. The finding also states a number of facts bearing upon questions arising upon the defendant's second defense and counterclaim, and including the will of Thomas Belden. The case was reserved for the advice of the Supreme Court of Errors as to what judgment should be rendered upon the facts found by the superior court. It was argued by the parties in full, and two supplemental briefs have been filed at the suggestion of the court. The last argument was limited to the following questions: (1) The plaintiffs not being in possession, can they maintain this action? (2) If the land in question was intestate estate of Thomas Belden, what are the rights of the parties? (3) Are there sufficient parties to the record? And any other questions that counsel may think proper to raise not already argued.

Lynde Harrison, for plaintiffs. John R. Buck, for defendant.

HAMERSLEY, J. (after stating the facts). It appears from the finding that at the commencement of this action the plaintiffs were not in possession of the land described, and that for some time before there had been a constant actual ouster of the plaintiffs by the defendant and its predecessors in title. The defendant, therefore, upon the facts put in issue by the first defense and found by the superior court, is entitled to judgment, and it is needless to consider the second defense. The action is brought under section 1907 of the General Statutes of 1888 (Gen. St. 1902, § 1037). This section was first passed in 1848. Laws 1848, p. 49, c. 59. The first section of that act provided that the superior court, as a court of equity, might order the partition of any real estate held in joint tenancy, tenancy in common, or coparcenary, and the second section (page 50), provided that the court might "upon the petition of any person interested order the sale of any real estate held in joint tenancy, tenancy in common or co-parcenary whenever in the opinion of the court a sale will better promote the interests of all parties than a partition." Comp. St. 1854, p. 480. The second section was modified in 1852, 1853, and 1858, and in the Revision of 1875 (page 481) appears as follows: "Courts of equity may upon the petition of any person interested order the sale of any estate, real or personal, owned by two or more persons, when in the opinion of the court a sale will better promote the interests of the owners," and this section appears unaltered as section 1307 in the General Statutes of 1888. The meaning of this legislation, in so far as it affects the sale of land owned by two or more persons, has been settled. In Johnson v. Olmsted, 49 Conn. 509, 517, it was held that the power to order a sale in such case rested on the same ground as the power to order a partition, and was an alternative mode of relief in cases where an owner was entitled to partition and partition was not practicable. An owner applying for a sale assumed the burden of proving partition impossible, and, if upon such application the impossibility of partition is proven, the court is as much bound to order a sale as it would have been to order a partition upon prayer for it and proof that it could have been conveniently and equitably made. The statute giving the power of sale introduces no new principle into the law regulating partition of estates held in common. Richardson v. Monson, 23 Conn. 94; Vail v. Hammond, 60 Conn. 374, 379, 22 Atl. 954, 25 Am. St. Rep. 330.

The complaint alleges: (1) The plaintiffs and defendant are in possession of the locus as tenants in common. (2) The plaintiffs are owners of an undivided two-thirds and the defendant of an undivided one-third. (3) Sale would better promote the interests of the parties than partition. The first defense denies each of these allegations. The third allegation is immaterial unless the first two are proved. The second allegation is immaterial unless the first is proved. In other words, a person actually ousted of possession by one he claims to be tenant in common with him of land cannot under this statute seek a court of equity for the purpose of establishing his title and regaining his possession and thereupon obtaining a decree of partition and sale. This was clearly the rule at common law, and our statute in enlarging the jurisdiction of the court of equity for the purpose of partition and sale introduced no new principle. Partition now, as heretofore, affords equitable relief against a compulsory common ownership, and cannot be used to supplant the remedy at law against an actual disseisor. A person claiming to own land as tenant in common with others, and who has been actually ousted, must establish a unity of possession before he can ask a dissolution of that unity by partition. 1 Sw. Dig. side p. 103. This was settled in Adams v. Ames Iron Co., 24 Conn. 230, and has never since been questioned. Partition of land belonging to two or more owners, whether as joint tenants, parceners, or tenants in common, is a mode provided by law for disuniting or dissolving the unity of possession in such owners (2 Blackstone's Comm. side p. 191), and the remedy cannot be invoked by one claiming to be owner, but who has been disseised, against his alleged cotenant, who is in sole possession of the land, claiming as sole owner thereof. This rule rests, also, on the settled and salutary principle that a person disseised of land he claims to own should not be permitted while thus disseised to exercise the rights belonging only to an owner in possession.

The plaintiffs refer to other statutes providing for a sale under other circumstances upon the application of one who may not be in actual possession. These statutes are not enacted for the purpose of partition, are based upon grounds entirely different from those upon which section 1307 is based, and do not apply to the facts in this case. It is unnecessary to consider whether the changes in procedure following the enactment of the practice act may authorize the joinder of an action for partition by sale, under section 1307, with an action of ejectment or with an action for other equitable relief, as the action set forth in the plaintiffs' complaint is simply and solely an action for partition by sale.

It is suggested that the defendant has coupled with its second defense a counterclaim, asking affirmative relief through a decree confirming and establishing the title to the land in question in the defendant. If this prayer for relief can properly be considered as asking an adjudication of the persons entitled to the land or any interest therein under the will of Thomas Belden and the other facts set forth in the second defense, and if the defendant can lawfully plead such a counterclaim in answer to the action set forth in the complaint, it nevertheless appears that persons necessary to such an adjudication are not parties to this action, and for this reason the action should be dismissed. The plaintiffs suggest that it is within the lawful discretion of this court to remand the cause to the superior court in order that the pleadings may be amended, other persons made parties to the action, and the various questions affecting the title to the land, suggested by the defendant's second defense and counterclaim, be adjudicated. Such a discretion ought not to be exercised in this case, inasmuch as we think it clear, from the facts appearing in the record, that such a course would not serve the ends of justice.

The superior court is advised to render judgment that the complaint be dismissed and the defendant recover its costs from the plaintiffs. Costs in this court will be taxed in favor of the defendant. The other Judges concurred.

BETTS, Ins. Com'r, v. CONNECTICUT LIFE INS. CO.

(Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut. Dec.
15, 1905.)

1. INSURANCE — INSOLVENCY — PAYMENT OF POLICY HOLDERS.

Under Gen. St. 1902, §§ 3607, 3611, providing that securities deposited by an insurance company shall be held in trust by the State Treasurer for the policy holders, with the right in the company to collect and receive the interest and dividends thereon, and directing that the receiver shall administer the trust fund invested in such securities for the benefit of the policy holders under orders of the court, on the application of the receiver of an insolvent insurance company, a direction by the court that the accrued interest on the funds received from the State Treasurer and the principal be applied as a trust fund for the policy holders was proper.

2. SAME—WORKING CAPITAL—APPLICATION.

10 Sp. Laws, p. 616, provides that an insurance company shall have a working capital, which shall be liable for the payment of mortuary claims when the mortuary or other fund for the payment of such claims is insufficient, and any assets or property of the association may be taken for the payment of the same. The constitution and by-laws of the association provided for separate funds derived from different sources, each having its separate treasurer, and each chargeable with certain liabilities, and that the secretary of the company shall pay to the treasurers of the respective funds the money belonging to such fund, and shall pay the expenses from the expense fund of the association. Held, that where the receiver of an insolvent insurance company has received, in addition to the state treasury fund, moneys derived from judgments against stockholders for the amounts due on their stock subscriptions, such sums belong to the working capital, and, it having been reduced below the required amount, the policy claimants have the exclusive right thereto.

3. SAME—APPLICATION OF ASSETS—STATUTES.

Gen. St. 1902, §§ 3546, 3554, providing that the superior court may direct the application of avails of certain assets and property equitably in satisfaction of claims proved against an insolvent company, and directing the insurance commissioner, after payment of expenses, to apply the avails of assets to the payment of claims allowed against the company, do not authorize the court or commissioner, in applying such assets, to disregard the equities created by statute and the charter and by-laws of the company.

4. SAME—POLICY HOLDERS—LIABILITY TO CREDITORS.

The policy holders of an insurance company are not liable as partners to the creditors; it being a stock company, and the management of its affairs being in the hands of directors and officers chosen by the stockholders.

5. JUDGMENT—SET-OFF.

The failure of a judgment debtor to file a complaint under Gen. St. 1902, § 654, asking a set-off against a judgment for a tort by the court in which it was rendered, did not deprive the court, which had taken jurisdiction of the settlement of the affairs of the judgment creditor by receivership proceedings, from allowing the set-off by directing an equitable application of the assets in the hands of the receiver in satisfaction of claims proved.

Appeal from Superior Court, New Haven County; Silas A. Robinson, Judge.

Action by Frederick A. Betts, Insurance Commissioner, against the Connecticut Life Insurance Company. From an order directing the order of payment of claims by a receiver, and disallowing an application for a set-off, certain claimants appeal. Reversed.

William H. Ely and Lucien F. Burpee, for appellants Lewis A. Platt and others. Henry C. White, for the receiver. Charles H. Lovett, for certain mortuary and policy claimants.

HALL, J. The appellants from the order of the superior court are Lewis A. Platt, Henry L. Wade, and the executors of the will of C. M. Platt; said named persons having been directors, and said Lewis A. Platt president, of said insolvent company. In April, 1903, the appellant Lewis A. Platt filed an application in the superior court, alleging that the New Haven Trust Company, which in 1899 had been appointed by said court receiver of the defendant company in the above-entitled proceeding, had, in 1903, obtained a judgment against said applicant and one John B. Doherty for the sum of $14,280.83 (New Haven Trust Co. v. Doherty, 75 Conn. 555, 54 Atl. 209, 96 Am. St. Rep. 239, is an appeal from said judgment); that said Doherty had no property from which any part of said judgment could be satisfied; that a claim of the applicant against said company had been allowed by the court to the amount of $9,203; that the assets in the hands of the receiver were insufficient to pay his claim in full—and asking that the receiver be restrained from collecting said judgment, and that said claim of the applicant be set off against said judgment. Upon the demurrer of said Lewis A. Platt to the receiver's answer to said application, the court held that said claim might be set off against said judgment, unless it should appear that the sum due on said judgment was needed to pay claims entitled to a preference over said applicant's claim.

Upon a hearing upon the receiver's application concerning the marshaling of assets and the preferring of claims, these facts were found by the court:

The defendant insurance company, to wind up the affairs of which a receiver was appointed, upon the application of the insurance commissioner, has for more than 10 years been engaged, under a charter from the Legislature of this state, in the business of life insurance on the assessment plan. The assets in the hands of the receiver and the claims allowed by the court are:

Assets.

| Proceeds of the sale of bonds deposited by the company with the State Treasurer and surrendered to the receiver under sections 3607 and 3611 of the General Statutes of 1902, with interest to December 28, 1904..... | $15,858 74 |
| Money derived from judgments against stockholders for amounts due on stock subscriptions, and judgments against officers and directors for negligence in management, and disposition of moneys belonging to expense fund, estimated at... | 80,000 00 |
| Judgment against L. A. Platt for a tort unaccompanied by force (against which said Platt claims a set-off of his claim below stated of $9,203)..... | 14,280 88 |
| | $80,140 57 |

Claims Allowed.

|--|--------------|
| Preferred claims for taxes, costs, etc..... | $ 172 05 |
| Mortuary claims..... | 44,502 78 |
| Claims on accident policies for accidents occurring prior to receivership..... | 852 99 |
| Claims on policies without an assessment clause..... | 1,032 23 |
| Claims on policies in force at commencement of receivership and containing an assessment clause..... | 1,919 17 |
| | $50,479 21 |
| General claims on, for money loaned on contracts, for service of officers, agents, etc., | 92,320 34 |
| | $142,799 55 |

The following are included among the general claims so allowed:

| | |
|---|-------------|
| Lewis P. Platt, for salary and amount due on contract..... | $ 9,203 00 |
| Henry L. Wade, for money loaned and due on contract..... | 3,456 83 |
| C. M. Platt, for money loaned and due on note and contract..... | 48,381 24 |

Of the money so loaned to the company by C. M. Platt, $14,108 was used for the payment of death claims, and was secured by collateral, $12,823 of the proceeds of which have been applied in payment of the sum so used, and the value of the remainder of said collateral is estimated to be sufficient to pay the balance of the sum so used. The remainder of the sum so loaned by the appellants was used in the payment of obligations of the company chargeable to the expense fund.

Upon said application of the receiver the court upon these facts directed (1) that from the assets in the hands of the receiver there be first deducted the sum of $2,500 for administration expenses; (2) that the accrued interest upon the fund received from the State Treasurer, as well as the principal, be applied as a trust fund for the policy holders; (3) that after deducting said amount allowed for administration expenses all the assets remaining in the hands of the receiver be first applied to the payment pro rata of all valid mortuary, accident, and policy claims; (4) that after said deduction, and the payment of said claims, the remainder of the assets, if any, be applied to the payment pro rata of all other valid claims against the company; (5) that none of the appellants, as to claims against the company, be subrogated to the rights of mortuary claimants; (6) that said L. A. Platt be not allowed to set off his claim of $9,203 for salary, etc., against the judgment recovered against him by the receiver. No question is made regarding that part of the order which directs the $2,500 allowed for administration expenses to be first deducted from the fund in the hands of the receiver.

The direction regarding the application of the fund received from the State Treasurer, and including as a part of it the income therefrom while it was in the hands of the receiver, is correct. By statute (section 3607) the securities deposited by the company were held by the State Treasurer in trust for the policy holders, with the right in the company, while they were so held, "to collect and receive the interest and dividends thereon." By section 3611 they were delivered to the receiver "to administer the trust fund invested in such securities for the benefit of the policy holders * * * under the orders of the court." By the order made, and the facts found by the superior court, the fund has, in legal effect, been applied to the payment of the claims of policy holders as of as early a date as when it was delivered to the receiver; and he is to be regarded as having since that time held the securities as belonging to the policy holders, and the proceeds and income therefrom as having been derived from the property of the policy holders.

There is error in that part of the order which directs that all the remaining assets in the hands of the receiver be first applied to the payment of mortuary, accident, and policy claims. Section 8 of the charter (10 Sp. Laws, p. 616) provides that "said corporation shall have a working capital to an amount not exceeding $100,000, divided into shares of $100 each, with power to increase the same to an amount not exceeding $250,000, and may commence business under this charter when $50,000 shall have been subscribed for and paid into said working capital, which shall be in lieu of a reserve, and said working capital shall not be reduced below the sum of $50,000 by dividends, expenses or in any other manner, except for payments under policies, or certificates, in case of death or otherwise; and if said working capital shall at any time be reduced below said amount of $50,000 then the right to issue new policies under this charter shall cease, unless said working capital shall be made up to that amount within ninety days thereafter, * * * and should a valid claim at any time exist against said association for indemnity in case of sickness, accident, old age, or death, by virtue of a certificate of membership or policy issued by said association, and the funds collected by assessment and set apart as a mortuary or other fund for the payment of such claim be insufficient therefor, then said working capital shall be liable for the payment of such claim, and any assets or property of said association may be taken or applied for the payment of the same." The constitution and by-laws of the company, adopted under the authority of its charter, provides that there shall be certain separate funds derived from different sources, as the mortuary, the old age benefit fund, and the dividend fund, each having its separate treasurer, and each chargeable with the payment of certain liabilities, and that the secretary of the company shall pay over to the treasurers of the respective funds the money belonging to such fund, and shall pay the salaries of officers, compensation of agents, and various other expenses from the expense fund of the association.

The relative rights of the policy claimants and of these appellants are to be determined with reference to these provisions of the charter, constitution, and by-laws, and of the statute referred to, all of which form a part of the contract between the company and the policy holders. Matter of E. R. F. L. Association, 131 N. Y. 354, 30 N. E. 114. In so far as such provisions subject certain assets to the payment of particular liabilities, the prior equities which may be thereby created should be considered in the application and distribution of the assets of the company under the receivership, as suggested in Barrett's Appeal, 75 Conn. 280, 53 Atl. 591, and neither section 3546 of the General Statutes of 1902, which provides that the superior court "may direct the application of the avails of such assets and property equitably in satisfaction of the claims proved against such company," etc., nor section 3554, directing the insurance commissioner, after payment of expenses, taxes, etc., to apply the avails of the assets of a company whose charter has been repealed "to the payment of the debts and claims allowed against such company, and the surrender value of its policies in proportion to their respective amounts," are to be construed as authorizing the court or insurance commissioner, in applying such assets, to disregard the equities so created by statute, and by the charter and by-laws of the company.

While the appellants do not so much question that by statute and by the charter provisions the State Treasurer fund, the mortuary fund, and, upon failure of the latter, the working capital to the amount of $50,000, are impressed with trusts in favor of the policy holders, which must be regarded in winding up the affairs of the company, they claim that none of the assets in the hands of the receiver belong to either the mortuary fund or the working capital, but that both of these funds have been exhausted, and that the remaining assets, excepting those received from the State Treasurer, belong to the expense fund. It is true that upon his appointment no fund came into the hands of the receiver to which the policy claimants have the right of exclusive resort. Such funds, excepting the State Treasurer fund, had presumably been exhausted in the payment of claims under policies, since they could not properly have been used in the payment of expenses. Since his appointment, however, in addition to the State Treasurer fund, the receiver has obtained about $30,000, a part of which is derived from judgments against stockholders for the amounts due on their stock subscriptions. The sum so received from stock subscriptions was as much a part of the working capital, and subject to its liabilities, as if paid in when the company commenced business; and, as the working capital had already been reduced below $50,000, it could not become a part of the expense fund, nor be used for any other purpose than payments under policies. To that part of said sum so derived from stock subscriptions, as well as to the fund received from the State Treasurer, the policy claimants have the exclusive right. It does not appear that any part of the original capital enters into the other assets. The right to apply any property of the company to the payment of a death or accident claim, upon failure of the mortuary fund, gives to policy claimants only the right to demand payment from funds other than the State Treasurer fund, the mortuary fund, and the working capital to the amount of $50,000 in common with other creditors.

No exception is taken to the order of the superior court in giving to the claims of living policy holders, amounting to about $5,000, the same preference as that given to the mortuary claims, which amount to over $44,000. None of the appellants were entitled, on account of money loaned by them to the company, to be subrogated to the rights of mortuary claimants. The only part of such money, used for the payment of death claims, has either been repaid or its payment secured by collateral. The provisions of the charter and by-laws do not render the policy holders liable, as partners, to the creditors of the company, as claimed by the appellants. The insurance company was a stock company, the entire control and management of the affairs of which was in the hands of these appellants and the other officers chosen by the shareholders only.

The appellant Lewis A. Platt is entitled to set off his allowance claim of $9,203 against the receiver's claim of $14,280.83. In sustaining the demurrer to the answer to the application for the allowance of such set-off, the court (Shumway, J.) decided that the applicant was entitled to the set-off, unless the amount due from him was needed to pay preferred claims, and no exception has been taken to that ruling. The later ruling of the court (Robinson, J.), disallowing the set-off because the amount due upon the judgment was needed for the payment of preferred claims, did not conflict with the first, but applied the law as laid down by Judge Shumway. But, irrespective of the absence of any exception to such first ruling, the set-off should be allowed. The court before which the receivership proceedings were pending had the power to allow it. By the failure of L. A. Platt to file a complaint in accordance with the provisions of section 654, asking such set-off to be made against said judgment by the court in which it was rendered in 1902, he was deprived of the right to have his set-off allowed in the proceedings incident to that cause. But such failure did not deprive the court which had already taken jurisdiction of the settlement of affairs of the company by the receivership proceedings, which had itself directed the bringing of the action against Platt, and before which the question of the amount to be allowed upon the claims now sought to be set off was then pending, from allowing such set-off, by directing, as the statute empowered it to, an equitable application of the assets in the hands of the receiver "in satisfaction of the claims proved against such company." The insolvency of the company raises an equity which, under the circumstances of this case and in a proceeding of this character, calls for the allowance of the set-off. Goodwin v. Keney, 49 Conn. 563-569; Carroll v. Weaver, 65 Conn. 76-81, 31 Atl. 489.

There is error, and the case is remanded, with directions that after deducting the administration expenses the fund, including principal and interest, derived from the securities received from the State Treasurer, and so much of the remaining assets as are derived from judgments against stockholders for amounts due on stock subscriptions, be applied to the payment of the said mortuary, accident, and policy claims as preferred claims against said particular assets; that said allowed claim of Lewis A. Platt, of $9,203, be set off against the receiver's judgment against him of $14,280.83; and that the remaining assets, after such deduction, application, and set-off, be applied to the payment pro rata of the remaining claims against the company, including the balance of said preferred claims remaining after said particular assets have been so applied to their payment. The other judges concurred.

McLAUGHLIN v. JOY.

1. BASTARDY—EVIDENCE.

While perhaps not necessary, the original complaint and magistrate's record in a bastardy process may be put in evidence before the jury, upon the trial of the issue whether the defendant begot the child, for the purpose of showing compliance with the preliminary statutory requirements.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 6, Cent. Dig. Bastards, §§ 155, 156.]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

If a party in a jury trial is apprehensive that evidence admitted upon one proposition only may be applied by the jury to other propositions, he should request instructions to the jury to disregard that evidence in considering such other propositions. Without such request, he has no cause for complaint as to the effect of the evidence upon these propositions.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trial, § 682.]

(Official.)

Exceptions from Supreme Judicial Court, Kennebec County.

Complaint by Annette M. McLaughlin against Alton Joy, under Rev. St. c. 99. Plaintiff offered in evidence an original accusation and examination and the magistrate's record in the matter, and defendant excepted. Exceptions overruled.

Argued before EMERY, WHITEHOUSE, STROUT, POWERS, PEABODY, and SPEAR, JJ.

Williamson & Burleigh, for complainant. Sheldon & Sawtelle and A. M. Goddard, for defendant.

EMERY, J. This was a case of bastardy, tried in the superior court for Kennebec county before a jury, in which the defendant pleaded not guilty, and made no other defense than a denial of the paternity of the child. At the trial the plaintiff offered in evidence her original accusation and examination before the magistrate, and also the magistrate's record in the matter. Upon the defendant objecting to the papers, the plaintiff's counsel stated that they were not offered as evidence of anything stated in them, but to show that the plaintiff had complied with the statute requiring such proceedings. They were by the court "admitted to show that the preliminary statutory requirements are complied with." These statements of counsel and court were made in the presence and hearing of the jury, but the court did not give any further instructions to the jury as to the use to be made of the papers, and no further instructions regarding them were requested.

While, perhaps, the question of compliance with the statute, so far as preliminary papers were concerned, was for the court, rather than for the jury, it has been the practice to permit them to go to the jury. Sidelinger v. Bucklin, 64 Me. 371.

The defendant urges, nevertheless, that he was in fact prejudiced by these papers going to the jury. He argues that, inasmuch as self-serving oral statements made by the plaintiff out of court would not be admissible in support of her testimony in court, her written statement on oath made out of court should not be allowed to go to the jury; that the latter is even more prejudicial than the former.

We do not see, in this case, at least, that the admission of the papers named was prejudicial to the defendant. It must be assumed that the jury knew the law, knew that such papers must have been made before the case could have been lawfully opened for trial before them, and also that the accusation and examination must have been in substantial harmony with the declaration already read to them. The actual production of the papers added nothing to the knowledge they must be assumed to have had.

Again, in this case it was stated before the jury by counsel and court that the papers were offered and admitted, not as evidence of anything stated in them, but to show that the preliminary statutory proceedings were complied with. It must be assumed, upon exceptions, that the jury heeded the statement and the ruling, and gave the papers no other effect. If the defendant feared that the matter had not been made sufficiently plain to the jury, he should have requested the court to make it more plain. Not having done so, he has no legal ground for complaint on that score.

Exceptions overruled.

POWERS et al. v. SAWYER.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. Dec. 9, 1905.)

TAXATION—SALE FOR NONPAYMENT—TAX DEED—DESCRIPTION—CLOUD ON TITLE.

A description in a deed from the State Treasurer, whereby a portion of land in a township containing 22,000 acres was attempted to be sold for the nonpayment of taxes, as follows: "4,520 acres in 13, range 7, W. E. L. S.," is utterly insufficient to pass any title to any portion of the township, and is insufficient to create any cloud upon the title of a tenant in common, who seeks partition of the township, either in equity or by petition for partition.

Exceptions from Supreme Judicial Court, Aroostook County.

Petition by Frederick A. Powers and others against Louise J. Sawyer for partition. Judgment for petitioner, and defendant excepts. Exceptions overruled.

The following was the petition:

"To the honorable justice of the Supreme Judicial Court next to be holden at Caribou, in and for the county of Aroostook, on the 1st Tuesday of December next.

"Respectfully represents Frederick A. Powers, Simon Friedman, and Jennie Wilson, all of Houlton, and John P. Donworth, of Caribou, all in said county of Aroostook, and Elaine Wilson, also of said Houlton, an infant under the age of 21 years, who joins in this petition by said Jennie Wilson, her guardian, that they are seised in fee simple and as tenants in common of and in certain real estate situated in said county of Aroostook, to wit: Township No. thirteen (13), in the seventh range of townships west of the east line of the state of Maine, excepting the public lots; the township containing twenty-two thousand forty acres exclusive of the public lots, which have been set out, and are described as follows:

"Commencing at a cedar stake on the north line of the township one mile and a half east from the northwest corner, and running south, one mile, to a cedar stake; thence east, five hundred rods, to a hemlock tree marked 'Public Lot'; thence north, one mile, to a cedar stake and stones on the north line of the township; thence west on said north line, five hundred rods, to the point begun at, according to plan of said township designated as plan No. 17, and recorded in the land office of the state of Maine. That your petitioners are the owners of four hundred fifty-one undivided five hundred fifty-first (451-551) parts thereof with Louise J. Sawyer of Bangor, in the county of Penobscot, and said state, who is seised of one hundred undivided five hundred fifty-first (100-551) parts thereof, and who also owns the pine and spruce timber which was standing on said township December 3, A. D. 1850, and that your petitioners desire to hold their undivided interests in severalty; that is, they desire to hold their undivided interests separately from, and independently of, the said Louise J. Sawyer.

"Wherefore, they pray that notice to all persons interested, to wit, the said Louise J. Sawyer, may be ordered; that commissioners may be appointed; that the interests of your petitioners may be set out to them to be held in fee and in severalty—that is, in common and undivided as among themselves, but separately from, and independently of, the interest of the said Louise J. Sawyer.

"Houlton, Maine, October 1, A. D. 1903.

"Frederick A. Powers.

"Simon Friedman.

"Jennie Wilson.

"John P. Donworth.

"Elaine Wilson,

"By Jennie Wilson, Guardian."

The following was the deed from the state of Maine to Milton S. Clifford: "To all Persons to whom These Presents may come, I, F. M. Simpson, Treasurer of the State of Maine, send greeting: Whereas, in obedience to the provisions of chapter 6, section 73, of the Revised Statutes in relation to the collection of taxes in unincorporated places, the said treasurer caused to be published a notice containing a list of all tracts of land lying in unincorporated places which have been forfeited to the state for state taxes or county taxes, which have been certified according to law to the Treasurer of State, together with the amount of such unpaid taxes, interest, and costs on each parcel, and that the same would be sold at the treasury office in Augusta on the twenty-eighth day of September, A. D. 1899, at eleven o'clock a. m., in the state paper and in a paper in the county where said lands are situated (where any such was published) three weeks successively before the day of sale and within three months thereof. And whereas said list contains the following described parcel of land so forfeited, situate in the county of Aroostook, viz.: 4,520 acres in 13, range 7, W. E. L.

L. S., upon which there was due and payable for taxes, interest, and cost the sum of thirty-eight and 6-100 dollars, including its proportion of the state tax for 1897 and of the county tax for the same year, certified to the Treasurer of State according to law. And whereas, on said twenty-eighth day of September, 1899, at eleven o'clock a. m., at the treasury office in Augusta, said treasurer did sell all the interest of the state in said premises to Milton S. Clifford at auction for the sum of forty-one 0-100 dollars, he being the highest bidder therefor, and his bid being a price not less than the full amount due thereon for such unpaid state and county taxes, interest, and cost of advertising, as required by law. Now know ye that I, F. M. Simpson, in my said capacity, in consideration of the premises and of the payment of the said sum of forty-one 0-100 dollars, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, do hereby sell and convey to him, the said Milton S. Clifford, his heirs and assigns forever, all the interest of the state by virtue of said forfeiture in and to said premises so sold, as aforesaid, to have and to hold the same, with all the privileges thereof, to him, the said Milton S. Clifford, his heirs and assigns, forever, subject to all taxes assessed thereon subsequent to the year eighteen hundred and ninety-seven: provided, however, that any owner or part owner thereof shall have the right to redeem his proportion of the same at any time within one year, by paying or tendering to the purchaser or Treasurer of State his proportional part of what the said Milton S. Clifford paid for the same, with interest at the rate of twenty per cent. per annum, and the cost of conveyance, as provided in chapter 6, section 75, of the Revised Statutes.

"In witness whereof, I, the said F. M. Simpson, in my said capacity, have hereunto set my hand and seal this twenty-eighth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-nine.

"F. M. Simpson, State Treasurer. [L. S.]

"Signed, sealed, and delivered in presence of D. W. Emery. [L. S.]"

"Kennebec—ss.: Oct. 25, A. D. 1899. Personally appeared the above-named F. M. Simpson, and acknowledged the foregoing instrument by him signed as Treasurer of State, as aforesaid, to be his free act and deed.

"Before me.

D. W. Emery,

"Justice of the Peace."

The following was the deed from Milton S. Clifford to Louise J. Sawyer:

"Know all men by these presents that I, Milton S. Clifford, of Bangor, county of Penobscot, state of Maine, in consideration of one dollar and other considerations paid by Louise J. Sawyer, of said Bangor, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, do hereby remise, release, sell, and forever quitclaim unto the said Louise J. Sawyer, her heirs and assigns forever, all my right, title, and interest in and to a certain parcel of land situated in the county of Aroostook, and known as township thirteen (13), range seven (7), W. E. L. S.; said parcel being 4,520 acres, as per deed of F. M. Simpson, Land Agent, to me dated Sept. 28, 1899.

"To have and to hold the above-described premises, with all the privileges and appurtenances thereof, to the said Louise J. Sawyer, her heirs and assigns, forever.

"In witness whereof, I, Milton S. Clifford, have hereunto set my hand and seal, this 29th day of March in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred.

"Signed, sealed, and delivered in presence of Milton S. Clifford. [L. S.]

"Penobscot—ss.: March 29, 1900. Personally appeared the above-named Milton S. Clifford, and acknowledged the above instrument to be his free act and deed.

"Before me. Samuel F. Humphrey,

"Justice of the Peace."

Both of the above deeds were duly recorded.

The following exceptions were allowed:

"And now at the hearing for partition in the above-entitled action, and before judgment, the defendant comes and files this bill of exception, and prays that the same may be allowed.

"This is a petition for partition of certain real estate in the county of Aroostook, to wit, township No. 13, in the seventh range of townships, west of the east line of the state of Maine, excepting the public lots.

"To entitle the claimants for partition, they must show a clear legal title.

"The defendant offered to show that the complainants did not have a clear legal title to the demanded premises by reason of a cloud on the title by reason of an existing sale of this land for taxes, and in support of this contention produced a deed from the state of Maine to M. S. Clifford, and from said M. S. Clifford to the defendant, Louise J. Sawyer.

"The court ruled that these deeds were not sufficient to show any cloud on the title of petitioners, and to this ruling the defendant, being aggrieved, asked, and the court allowed, an exception thereto.

"To the foregoing ruling the defendant excepts, and prays that the exception may be allowed."

Argued before WISWELL, C. J., and EMERY, WHITEHOUSE, STROUT, SAVAGE, and PEABODY, JJ.

E. C. Ryder, for plaintiffs. H. L. Fairbanks, for defendant.

WISWELL, C. J. This is a petition for partition of a township of land in Aroostook county, described in the petition as follows:

"Township No. thirteen (13), in the seventh range of townships west of the east line of the state of Maine, excepting the public lots; the township containing twenty-two thousand forty acres exclusive of the public lots, which have been set out," and which are described in the petition.

At the hearing before the court anisi prius, judgment for partition was ordered, and commissioners were appointed. The only question raised by the exceptions upon which the case comes to the law court is as to the effect of two deeds offered by the respondent—one from the State Treasurer, attempting to convey land claimed to have been forfeited by the nonpayment of taxes, and the other a quitclaim deed to the respondent from the grantee in the first deed.

The position of the respondent is that the petitioners are not entitled to a judgment for partition unless they can show a clear legal title to the proportion of the premises claimed to be owned by them, invoking the rule established where a partition is sought in equity (Nash v. Simpson, 78 Me. 142, 3 Atl. 53; Pierce v. Rollins, 83 Me. 172, 22 Atl. 110); although this is, as we have seen, a petition for partition, and not a bill in equity brought for partition, and that the deed from the State Treasurer is at least sufficient to raise a doubt as to the title of the petitioners, or to create a cloud upon their title.

A sufficient answer to this position of the respondent is a reference to the description of the premises attempted to be sold and conveyed as forfeited from nonpayment of taxes. The only description contained in this deed is as follows: "4,520 acres in 13, range 7, W. E. L. S.," the township containing, as we have seen, over 22,000 acres exclusive of the public lots. It has been uniformly held in numerous decisions of this court that such a description in a deed is utterly ineffectual to pass any title to any specific tract or acre in the township, or to convey any title whatever. Larrabee v. Hodgkins, 58 Me. 412; Griffin v. Creppin, 60 Me. 270; Moulton v. Egery, 75 Me. 485; Skowhegan Sav. Bank v. Parsons, 86 Me. 514, 30 Atl. 110; Millett v. Mullen, 95 Me. 400, 49 Atl. 871. A deed with such a description is insufficient to create any doubt or cast any cloud upon the petitioner's title, since a mere inspection of it shows upon its face that it conveyed no title. Briggs v. Johnson, 71 Me. 235. The deed from the grantee in this last deed to the respondent contains a similar description, and is equally insufficient to pass any title. The ruling of the judge anisi prius, that these deeds were ineffectual to pass any title and insufficient to create any cloud upon the petitioners' title, was correct.

Exceptions overruled.

WESTERN MARYLAND R. CO. v. BLUE RIDGE HOTEL CO. OF WASHINGTON COUNTY.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Dec. 8, 1905.)

1. RAILROADS—POWERS—ULTRA VIRES CONTRACT.

Where the charter of a railroad company (Acts 1852, c. 304, §§ 14, 15, 18; Acts 1872, p. 102, c. 71; Acts 1884, p. 209, c. 153) conferred power to operate a railroad, to erect warehouses and other works necessary to the road, to erect all buildings, stations, other works, and accommodations necessary or convenient for the operation of the road, to aid any other company "in the construction of its road," to consolidate with any other corporation owning a railroad, or a railroad and any other property, and to guarantee the obligations of other railroad companies, a contract by which it contracted to pay out of certain of its earnings such "commissions" on its receipts as would make good to a hotel company a deficit in the hotel company's earnings sufficient to enable the hotel company to pay dividends on its stock and interest on its bonds was ultra vires and void.

2. SAME—EXECUTED CONTRACT.

Where a railroad company made an ultra vires contract by which it guaranteed the payment of interest and dividends on the bonds and stock of a hotel company to aid in the improvement of the latter's property, and thereafter received nothing of benefit from the hotel company except increased earnings for transportation of passengers and freight over its road, it was not precluded from subsequently claiming that the contract was ultra vires and void.

Appeal from Baltimore City Court; Henry Stockbridge, Judge.

Action by the Blue Ridge Hotel Company of Washington County against the Western Maryland Railroad Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BRISCOE, BOYD, PEARCE, SCHMUCKER, JONES, and BURKE, JJ.

Leon E. Greenbaum and Benjamin A. Richmond, for appellant. William S. Thomas, for appellee.

PEARCE, J. This is an action of covenant, brought by the Blue Ridge Hotel Company of Washington County, a corporation organized under the general incorporation laws of Maryland, against the Western Maryland Railroad Company, a corporation created by an act of the General Assembly of Maryland (chapter 304, Acts 1852) under the name of the "Baltimore, Carroll, and Frederick Railroad Company"; the name being changed by chapter 37 of the Acts of 1853 to the "Western Maryland Railroad Company." The covenant sued upon is contained in a sealed agreement between the parties, made October 23, 1883. This agreement recites the making of a previous agreement between the parties on April 2, 1883, whereby the said railroad company, in consideration of anticipated advantages to it from the construction by said hotel company of a summer hotel near Pen Mar Station on the line of said railroad, had agreed to secure the payment of a dividend not exceeding 5 per cent. per annum on the capital stock of said hotel company of $100,000. The agreement sued on then further set forth that, since the erection of said hotel, the railroad company had in fact derived large receipts from travel and traffic to and from the station used for said hotel, known as the "Blue Mountain Station," and that its receipts from travel and traffic to and from an adjoining station, known as "Pen Mar Station," had, by reason of the attractions of said hotel and its neighboring property, increased to an amount exceeding the utmost liability to be assumed by it under the contract then made, and that it was believed these receipts would be largely augmented by increasing the capacity of the hotel, and by the improvement of the grounds of the hotel company, and of its other property near Pen Mar Station; that the hotel company had already expended in the undertaking more than its whole capital, and an additional amount, not less than $125,000, was necessary to complete improvements begun, and others contemplated, which could not be procured without the assistance to the credit of the hotel company as thereafter stipulated in said agreement; that the hotel company was about to issue its bonds to an amount not exceeding $125,000, bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum and to be secured by a first mortgage upon the said hotel and its revenues, and such other of its property as should be described in said mortgage. The agreement then further set forth that in consideration of the advantages expected to accrue to the railroad company from the said improvements to the hotel and its other property, and of certain privileges secured to the railroad company by the terms of said agreement for the benefit of its excursionists, the said railroad company covenanted with the said hotel company, as follows: "That if in any one year the actual net earnings of said hotel company from said hotel and other sources shall not suffice to pay 5 per cent. dividend upon its capital stock of $100,000, and the interest at the rate of 6 per cent. semiannually upon such amount of said first mortgage bonds as may be issued for the purposes herein stated, not exceeding $125,000, the said railroad company will in that event allow and pay to said hotel company, for its stockholders and the holders of said bonds, such commissions upon its receipts for traffic to and from Blue Mountain and Pen Mar Stations, or any other station or stations which may be hereafter substituted for either or both of the above, at which the business hereby contemplated may be done, as will be sufficient to make up said deficit to 5 per cent. upon its capital stock, and 6 per cent. per annum upon its bonded debt"; and the hotel company upon its part entered into a covenant designed to protect the railroad company in the proper application of the revenues of the hotel company to its economical and successful management, and of the net earnings to the dividends and interest due to its stockholders and bondholders. The declaration averred that, in reliance upon this covenant of the railroad company, it issued its bonds to the amount of $125,000, of which $122,000 were still outstanding, which sum was expended in the improvements contemplated by the agreement, and that at the close of the fiscal year of the hotel company ending October 1, 1903, the net earnings of the hotel company were not sufficient to pay the interest then due on said bonds, by the sum of $3,660, and there was nothing available for payment of the $5,000 dividend then due to its stockholders; that demand had been duly made on defendant for said sums; and that payment had been refused.

It will only be necessary to consider the defendant's fourth plea, which averred that the agreement sued on was ultra vires on the part of the railroad company, and void, and could not be enforced by suit such as was brought against it. To this plea the plaintiff demurred, and, the demurrer being sustained, the case went to trial on issues joined on the other pleadings, resulting in a verdict for the plaintiff for $9,433.68, and judgment thereon. The defendant offered six prayers, of which the first and second raised the same question raised by the demurrer, and were refused by the court; no prayers being offered by the plaintiff. The question raised by the demurrer, and by the defendant's first and second prayers, is the vital question in the case, and will now be considered.

The agreement was drawn with much care and skill, and evidently with a view to the avoidance of the question raised, as is suggested by the phraseology of the covenant "to allow and pay such commissions upon its receipts to and from" the stations named as would make good the deficit which was the subject of the covenant; but we do not think the use of this language can disguise the real character of the transaction, or control the validity of the obligation assumed by the railroad company. If the contract would be declared ultra vires if the deficit were to be made good from the general receipts of the company, it could not be rescued from invalidity by calling the payments to be made commissions from traffic receipts from the particular stations named. There is no limit to the rate of commission to be paid. The full amount of the gross receipts from these two stations was pledged by that covenant, if required to make good this deficit. This appears not only from the language of the covenant, but even more explicitly from the recital of the mortgage from the hotel company to the trustees of its bondholders, which assigns to said trustees "the benefit of the contract between the hotel company and the railroad company, dated October 23, 1883, by which the payment of the interest on the said bonds is guaranteed by the said railroad company to be paid of the receipts from the traffic at Blue Mountain and Pen Mar Stations." A contract, which in effect pledges the total gross receipts from any source, cannot be regarded as a contract for commissions on, or a rebate from, those gross receipts, and this contract must be regarded as an absolute guaranty to the stockholders and bondholders of the hotel company of their dividends and interest, to the extent to which the receipts from the stations named should be adequate for that purpose, since in the language of the contract the payment was to be made "to the hotel company for its stockholders and bondholders." The promise thus made was a promise "to answer for the payment of some debt, or the performance of some duty, in case of the failure of another, who is himself, in the first instance, liable to such payment or performance." 14 Amer. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) 1128. Its object, as declared in the recitals of the agreement, was to furnish to the hotel company "assistance to its credit," and it was at least twice designated in said agreement as a "traffic guaranty," and we think it could not be accurately otherwise designated. It is therefore necessarily a collateral contract, but there is no question here of the statute of frauds, and it would make no difference so far as its validity is here concerned, if it had been an original contract to pay the hotel company a lump sum upon the consideration stated. The question of ultra vires would still remain for consideration.

Corporations, being mere creatures of law, possess only such powers as are expressly granted, together with such incidental and implied powers as are necessary to carry into effect those expressly granted. "An incidental power is one that is directly and immediately appropriate to the execution of the specific power granted, and not one that has only a slight or remote relation to it. * * * It can in no case avail to enlarge the express powers, and thereby warrant the corporation to devote its efforts or its capital to other purposes than such as its charter expressly authorizes, or to engage in collateral enterprises not directly but only remotely connected with its specific corporate purposes." 10 Cyc. 1097, 198. And it is equally well settled that "a corporation has no power to enter into a contract of suretyship or guaranty, or otherwise lend its credit to another, unless the power is expressly conferred by its charter, or unless such a contract is reasonably necessary, or usual in the conduct of its business." 7 Amer. & Eng. of Law (2d Ed.) 788.

The original charter powers of the Western Maryland Railroad Company are found in sections 14, 15, and 18 of chapter 304 of the Acts of 1852. In addition to the mere power to construct a railroad from Baltimore to Westminster and thence to some point on the Monocacy river in the direction of Hagerstown, the additional powers given are to erect warehouses or other works necessary to said road and to contract with the Susquehanna Railroad for intersecting its road, to carry the mail, and to borrow money not exceeding $200,000. Chapter 71, p. 102, Acts 1872, gave the power to construct a railroad from the western end of the tunnel of the Baltimore & Potomac Railroad to Williamsport or to Cumberland, together with all buildings, stations, other works, and accommodations necessary or convenient for the operation of said road, and to execute mortgages upon its property for building the road. Section 8, p. 107, of that act, which is specially referred to by the court below in the ruling upon the demurrer, set out in the record, gives power to aid any other company in the construction of its railroad, by means of subscription to its capital stock, or otherwise, for forming a connection therewith, and to consolidate with any other corporation owning a railroad, or a railroad and any other property; and chapter 153, p. 209, of the Acts of 1884, gives the only power of guaranty it possesses, and limits this power to the obligations of other railroad companies.

In none of these acts do we find any power, express or implied, either to engage directly in the construction and operation of a summer hotel, or to lend its credit to any other corporation engaged therein, while the acts of 1872 and 1884, supra, seem to us, by their express limitation of the powers granted to dealing with railroad companies, or companies "owning a railroad and other property," to exclude the power to engage in any other business than that of a railroad, or to guaranty the obligations of any other corporation than a railroad corporation. However, the strict rules which we have cited above may have been relaxed or evaded elsewhere under the influence of competition in trade and commerce, and of the modern theories of expansion of power in every direction, they are still approved by text writers of the highest authority and have been always observed and enforced by the court in this state.

Judge Seymour D. Thompson, in 10 Cyc. 1146, says: "Perhaps the most general statement which can be made of the doctrine of ultra vires is to say that the contract of a corporation which is unauthorized by, or in violation of, its charter or other governing statute, or entirely outside the scope of the purposes of its creation, is void, in the sense of being no contract at all, because of a total want of power to enter into it"; and Mr. France, in his recent excellent work on the Elements of Corporation Law (section 72) says "The transaction may be beyond the powers of the corporation, simply because it is foreign to the purposes expressed or implied in the charter; it may invoke the exercise of a power, not forbidden, but simply ungranted, as, for example, where a railroad company undertakes to guaranty the expenses of a public festival. In the better usage, the term 'ultra vires' is limited to acts of the latter class, and many of the courts make a distinction between transactions which are illegal, because forbidden, and those which are simply in excess of the granted powers."

In Steam Navigation Company v. Dandridge, 8 Gill & J. 318, 29 Am. Dec. 543, the court said: "In Angell & Ames on Corporations it is justly observed that a corporation and an individual stand upon very different footing. The latter, existing for the general good of society, may do all acts and make all contracts which are not, in the eye of the law, inconsistent with the great purpose of his creation; whereas, the former, having been created for a specific purpose, can not only make no contract forbidden by its charter, which is, as it were, the law of its nature, but in general can make no contract which is not necessary, either directly or incidentally, to enable it to answer that purpose. In deciding, therefore, whether a corporation can make a particular contract, we are to consider, in the first place, whether its charter or some statute binding upon it forbids or permits it to make such a contract; and, if the charter and valid statutory law are silent upon the subject, then, in the second place, whether a power to make such a contract may not be implied on the part of the corporation as directly or incidentally necessary to enable it to fulfill the purpose of its existence, or whether the contract is entirely foreign to that purpose." It was accordingly there held that the navigation company, being incorporated only for the purpose of conveyance of passengers and freight, could not lawfully enter into a contract for breaking ice upon the waters navigated by its vessels, and towing other vessels through the track so made. And in Abbott v. Baltimore & Rappahannock Steamboat Company, 1 Md. Ch. 542, where the company was incorporated solely for the same purpose between Baltimore and Fredericksburg, but entered into an obligation in aid of an enterprise to improve the navigation of the river near Fredericksburg upon its own route, which would result to the great advantage of the company, it was held that the contract was not within its express or implied powers, and could not be enforced against it, though the obligee had incurred large expenses upon the faith of the contract. In the latter case the Chancellor followed the decision in the Dandridge Case, supra, and that case has been repeatedly approved in this court, upon the point here involved; the latest instance being in Boyce v. Trustees M. E. Church, 46 Md. 373. In State v. B. & O. R. R., 48 Md. 49, one of the questions was whether the receipts from certain hotels built and owned by the railroad company were subject to the gross receipts tax imposed by the act of 1872 upon such railroad companies, and the court, in construing the language employed in the power granted "to erect warehouses and other works necessary and expedient for the completion and operation of the road," said, on pages 76 and 77: "Hotels, or buildings for the accommodation of passengers over the road, are, we think, necessary to its business and therefore within its charter. * * * The gross receipts, therefore, from these hotels are exempt from taxation. The Oakland and Deer Park Hotels, however, appear to have been built and are now used primarily as places of summer resort, and, although as such they may attract travel over the road, they are not in any sense necessary to its operation. But the receipts from these hotels are not liable to the tax imposed by the act of 1872, because they are not derived from the exercise of any franchise granted by the state, and they must be taxed according to valuation as other property." The court had previously said upon the same page: "It is hardly necessary to say that the original charter does not authorize the appellee to build and conduct hotels in the usual and ordinary manner in which hotels are kept—that is for the accommodation of the public generally." The power to build and conduct such hotels was not actually before the court under any of the pleadings in that case, and the language last cited therefore may perhaps be regarded as obiter, but the application of the gross receipts tax to such hotels was before the court, and it was held not to apply to them, because "the receipts were not derived from the exercise of any franchise granted by the state"—in other words, because the charter did not, either expressly or by implication, grant the power to engage in that business.

The cases we have cited from our own courts sufficiently show how the law has been held in this state, and they are in accord with the best considered cases elsewhere in this country, and in England. Thus, in Davis v. Old Colony R. R., 131 Mass. 258, 41 Am. Rep. 221, in which the subject was exhaustively considered by Judge Gray, it was held beyond the power of a railroad corporation chartered by the Legislature, or of a corporation organized under the general law for the manufacture and sale of musical instruments, to guaranty the expenses of a musical jubilee and festival, and that no action could be maintained against either corporation upon such a guaranty, though made with reasonable belief that the holding of such festival would be of great pecuniary advantage to such corporations by increasing their proper business, and though the festival had been held and expenses incurred in reliance upon the guaranty. In Elevator Co. v. Memphis & Charleston R. R. Co., 85 Tenn. 703, 5 S. W. 52, 4 Am. St. Rep. 798, the charter of the railroad gave it power "to do all lawful acts properly incident to a corporation, and to the transaction of the business for which it was incorporated, and also such additional powers as may be convenient for the due and successful execution of the powers granted in the charter." The railroad company guaranteed 8 per cent. dividends upon the stock of an elevator company which built a grain elevator upon the line of the railroad, but the court held the guaranty could not be enforced, saying: "In no part of the grant of power is that of guarantying the success of another institution, person, or corporation to be found, either in expression or implication." In Pearce v. Madison & Indianapolis R. R. Co., 21 How. 441, 16 L. Ed. 184, the Supreme Court of the United States held that two corporations created to construct distinct lines of railroad leading to Indianapolis had no right, without authority from the Legislature, to consolidate into one corporation, and thereby to subject the capital of the one to answer for the liabilities of the other. The managers had also established a steamboat line to run in connection with these railroads, and the court held this to be "a departure from the business they were authorized to conduct, thereby diverting their capital from the objects contemplated by their charters, and exposing it to perils for which they afforded no sanction." In Coleman v. Eastern Counties Railway, 10 Beavan, 1, where the railway company proposed to guaranty the profits of a steam packet company to run in connection with the railway, Lord Langdale, Master of the Rolls, restrained the company by injunction, saying: "To look upon a railway company in the light of a common partnership, and as subject to no greater vigilance than these, would be greatly to mistake the functions they perform and the powers which they exercise, which are given by act of Parliament, and which extend no farther than is expressly stated in the act, or is necessarily and properly required for carrying into effect the undertaking and works which the act has expressly sanctioned. * * * But it has been contended that they have a right to pledge without limit the funds of the company for the encouragement of other transactions, however various and extensive, provided the object of that liability is to increase the traffic upon the railway, and thereby to increase the profit to the shareholders. There is, however, no authority for anything of that kind." And in East Anglian Railways v. Eastern Counties Railway Co., 11 C. B. 775, where a similar guaranty was under consideration, it was held ultra vires; the court declaring the question to be one exclusively of power, and asking the unanswerable question: "What additional power do they acquire from the fact that the undertaking may in some way benefit their line? For whatever be their object or prospect of success, they are still but a corporation for the purpose of making and maintaining their railway." These cases, which we have selected from the many that could be cited, sufficiently illustrate the principle which requires us to hold, as we do, that the agreement in this case is ultra vires.

But it is contended for the appellee that, as the contract has been partly executed by both parties, the railroad company is estopped to set up that defense. Let us see how far this contention can be justified. Judge Seymour D. Thompson, in continuation of the passage from which we have quoted above (10 Cyc. 1146), says: "Such a contract will not be enforced by any species of action in a court of justice; being void ab initio, it cannot be made good by ratification, or by any succession of renewals, and no performance on either side can give validity to the unlawful contract, or form the foundation of any right of action upon it." It is true that the same distinguished author says, on page 1156 of 10 Cyc: "The great mass of judicial authority seems to be to the effect that, where a private corporation has entered into a contract in excess of its granted powers, and has received the fruits or benefits of the contract, and an action is brought against it to enforce the obligation on its part, it is estopped from setting up the defense that it had no power to make the contract." This must be understood to mean, however, that the fruits or benefits of the contract must have been received from the other contracting party, and not from outside parties. That this is the true meaning of the passage appears from the language of the same writer on page 1155 of 10 Cyc., where he says: "If the contract of a corporation is ultra vires, but not immoral or otherwise malum in se, and either party disaffirms it on the ground that it is ultra vires, and refuses further execution of it, then, while the other party cannot sue to recover damages or compensation in respect of the unexecuted portion of the contract, yet the law will afford him remedies for procuring from the other party a restoration of what he has lost under it. The governing principle is that, where money has been paid or property transferred to a corporation under a contract which is not malum in se, the party receiving may be made to refund to the party from whom it has received the value of that which it has actually received, and to this end he may maintain against the corporation the equitable common-law action for money had and received." In Johnson v. Hines, 61 Md. 131, where the question under consideration was what title passed to mortgagees under a mortgagor, from one whose title was derived from an unauthorized conveyance by a trustee, Judge Yellott, speaking for this court, said: "That nothing can emanate from nonentity, or, as more tersely enunciated, 'de nihilo, nil,' is an axiom in the physical sciences which might be appropriately transferred to a judicial investigation of this nature." This is certainly sound logic, and a void contract can no more give rise to a right of action upon such contract than a void deed can create title in the grantee. In Thomas v. West Jersey R. R., 101 U. S. 71,

25 L. Ed. 950, the railroad company made a 20-year lease of its road, which was acted under for five years and was then repudiated by the railroad, and the other party brought suit upon the contract. It was held void as ultra vires, but the doctrine of estoppel was invoked by the plaintiff on the ground that the contract had been partly performed. The court said: "It was the duty of the company to rescind or abandon the contract. Though they delayed this for several years, it was nevertheless a rightful act when done. Can this performance of a legal duty, a duty both to the stockholders and the public, give the plaintiff a right of action? To hold that this can be done is in our opinion to hold that any act done under a void contract makes all its parts valid, and that the more you do under a contract forbidden by law, the stronger the claim to its enforcement in the courts." In Central Transportation Co. v. Pullman Palace Co., 139 U. S. 62, 11 Sup. Ct. 498, 35 L. Ed. 55, under a contract held ultra vires, the Supreme Court again held that part performance was no ground for enforcing further performance of an unlawful contract, though the Pullman Company was required to account in an independent proceeding for the value of what it had received from the plaintiff under the contract, saying: "In such case the action is not maintained upon the unlawful contract, nor according to its terms, but on an implied contract to return, or, failing to do that, to make compensation for the property or money which it had no right to retain. To maintain such an action was not to affirm, but to disaffirm, the unlawful contract." This is the doctrine of the majority of the state courts of highest repute. In Morville v. American Tract Society, 123 Mass. 137, 25 Am. Rep. 40, the court said: "The plaintiff's money was taken and is still held by defendant under an agreement which it is contended it had no power to make. * * * The plaintiff is not seeking to enforce the contract, but only to recover his own money and prevent the defendant from unjustly retaining the benefit of his own illegal act." In Day v. Spiral Springs Buggy Co., 57 Mich. 147, 23 N. W. 628, 58 Am. Rep. 352, in a suit upon a speculative contract which was held ultra vires, the defendant pleaded in estoppel on the ground of part performance, but the court, through Judge Cooley, said: "There are some decisions which give plausibility to the position of the defendant, but we know of none that is adequate to the exigencies of this case. * * * The power on the part of such a corporation to enter into contracts of speculation, being withheld on reasons of public policy, for the protection of shareholders and the general good of the community, the act neither of one party nor of both in entering into it can work an estoppel against setting up the invalidity. A rule of law established for the public good cannot be thus defeated. A corporation cannot, by the mere act of individuals, be given a power which the state for general reasons has withheld from it. Steam Navigation Co. v. Dandridge, 8 Gill & J. 248, 319, 29 Am. Dec. 543. Parties may be estopped in some cases from disputing the validity of a corporate contract, when it has been fully performed on one side, and when nothing short of enforcement will do justice. To quote the language of Comstock, C. J., in Parish v. Wheeler, 22 N. Y. 508, "The executed dealings of corporations must be allowed to stand for and against both the parties when the plainest rules of good faith so require." But this is not such a case. The contract has only been performed in part. * * * No valid ground for estoppel is therefore found to exist in the case."

Our own decisions have distinctly recognized the principle of the cases we have cited above. In Maryland Hospital v. Foreman, 29 Md. 524, the hospital had received money from Foreman under a contract which the court said was not authorized by the powers conferred in its charter, and was therefore "simply ultra vires and not binding upon the parties"; and Judge Bartol said: "The contract in all such cases will be regarded as void, and the party who delivered the property or advanced the money to the corporation will be entitled to his legal remedy, not founded upon, but in repudiation of, the contract, to recover the property or the money from the corporation, upon the principle that it had acquired no right or title to either under the contract." So, in Lester v. Bank, 33 Md. 563, 3 Am. Rep. 211, the appeal was from an order ratifying an auditor's account and allowing a claim for a debt due upon a loan made by the bank in violation of its charter, and the order was affirmed; the court saying that, "in cases arising under contracts made in violation of a statute, it has been repeatedly held that an action would lie against a party receiving money under such a contract upon a promise implied by law to refund it." In Weckler v. First Nat. Bank, 42 Md. 582, 20 Am. Rep. 95, the bank sold bonds on commission in violation of its charter powers, but paid over the proceeds to the owners of the bonds, and it was held that, not having any of the plaintiff's money obtained by means of the sale of the bonds, the defense of ultra vires was open to it. In United German Bank v. Katz, 57 Md. 141, where the bank discounted a note in excess of its charter powers, a recovery was allowed upon the note, though the plea of ultra vires was made, but the principle upon which it is allowed was stated to be "that it is inequitable to permit one who has received the benefit of the contract to repudiate it on the ground that the corporation from which he received the benefit had no power to make the contract"; so that the form of recovery, and not the substantial right of recovery, was the thing in question there. This is the only case in Maryland to which we have been referred in which a recovery directly upon the void contract has been allowed at law. The case of Heironimus v. Sweeney, 83 Md. 146, 34 Atl. 823, 33 L. R. A. 90, 55 Am. St. Rep. 333, like Lester v. Howard Bank, was an equity case, and, where the defendant has retained the fruits of the void contract, the plaintiff may either resort to the common-law action for money had and received, or to an accounting in equity. The case of Bank v. Katz, supra, was cited in Black v. Bank of Westminster, 96 Md. 429, 54 Atl. 88, but in the latter case the declaration contained the common counts as well as a special count on the note, and the recovery of the bank might be properly attributed to those counts, even if the note had been held to be purchased instead of discounted as it was held to be; and both those cases were cases of fully executed contracts in which the defendant sought to retain the fruits of the contract.

In this case, there is but one count in the declaration, and that is upon the void contract, and the proof is clear that the railroad company never received from the hotel company, either directly or indirectly, any money or property whatever under this contract. The only money it has received as a result of the contract is that paid by passengers for transportation over its own road, or for freight carried over the road. The hotel company has paid nothing and parted with nothing under this contract, and is therefore, under all the authorities, without any right of action.

It follows from what we have said that the demurrer to the defendant's fourth plea should have been overruled and the defendant's first and second prayers should have been granted; and, for the error in sustaining the demurrer and refusing those prayers, the judgment must be reversed. As there can be no recovery under our view of this case, it is unnecessary to consider the other rejected prayers of the defendant.

Judgment reversed without a new trial. Costs above and below to be paid by the appellee.

WATERS v. AMERICAN FINANCE CO.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Nov. 23, 1905.)

1. CORPORATIONS — OFFICERS — AUTHORITY TO CONTRACT — PRESUMPTIONS.

There is no presumption of law that one who is the secretary, treasurer, and general manager of a corporation, whose principal business is selling or attempting to sell the stock of another corporation on commission, has authority to make a contract with its vice president under which he was to have one-half the commissions accruing from the sales of stock, whether made by him or by the secretary and treasurer.

2. SAME — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action by the vice president of a corporation, whose principal business was selling or attempting to sell the stock of another company for commissions on sales, evidence held insufficient to show authority of one who was secretary, treasurer, and general manager of the corporation, to contract to pay plaintiff one-half the commissions accruing from sales, whether made by plaintiff or by the secretary and treasurer.

3. SAME — DIRECTION OF VERDICT.

Where, in an action for commissions by the vice president of a corporation, whose principal business was selling or attempting to sell stock of another company on commission, against the corporation, there was evidence that plaintiff did sell at least 2,500 shares, and that defendant actually had in hand a considerable portion of the money received on such sales, plaintiff was entitled to recover reasonable compensation for his services.

Appeal from Baltimore City Court; Daniel Girard Wright, Judge.

Action by Thomas S. Waters, Jr., against the American Finance Company. From the direction of a verdict for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Frank V. Rhodes, for appellant. D. Eldridge Monroe, for appellee.

BOYD, J. This is an appeal from the judgment in the short note case in an attachment proceeding instituted by the appellant against the appellee. The short note contains the common counts, and the account filed is for "12½ per cent. commissions on the sale of 3,500 shares of the Gliroux Consolidated Mines Company's stock to Mr. and Mrs. F. P. Center, Brooklyn, N. Y., at $5 per share, $2,187.50, less amount paid $135," leaving a balance of $2,052.50 alleged to be due. The appellee is sued as "a body corporate," but it is not stated where it was incorporated or what powers it possessed, although the appellant testified it was organized to sell coal and timber lands and unlisted stocks and bonds. He said that a Mr. Maegher, of Richmond, Va., was president, he (the appellant) vice president, and Mr. Beveridge, secretary and treasurer, and he added, "but Mr. Beveridge was the man behind the gun of the company." Those three officers and Mr. Berner, of Mt. Washington, were directors, and each of the three had 3,000 shares of preferred and 3,000 of common stock, of the par value of $1 per share. Mr. Berner and a Mr. Lawrence, of Dakota, also held some stock. The Gliroux Company agreed to pay 25 per cent. commissions to the appellee for sale of its stock at $5 per share. The appellant claims that he made an agreement with Mr. Beveridge by which he "was to receive one-half of the commissions accruing from the sales of all Gliroux stock either sold by Mr. Beveridge, as secretary and treasurer of the American Finance Company, or myself as its agent." That was in Baltimore, but after the fire there in February, 1904, he went to New York and was to be paid his expenses, in addition to his commissions. Before he went to New York he sold 10 shares to one person, and there was a sale by Beveridge of 100 shares to Mrs. Center—the commissions upon which he said he received one-half, and "Mr. Beveridge got half." On March 21, 1904, he claims to have sold to Mr. and Mrs. Center, who were then in Boston, 3,500 shares for $17,500—$3,000 cash and the balance to be paid in 90 days. He admits that their subscription included 1,000 shares which Mrs. Center had ordered through the appellee. On the face of the subscription, which was in writing, addressed to the Giroux Company, there was an indorsement that it included all previous subscriptions made through the American Finance Company during the month of March, 1904. The $3,000 was drawn from some savings institutions by the appellant for Mrs. Center, and paid over to the Giroux Company, and afterwards $6,500 was paid to that company through him, and the balance to the appellee (through Beveridge), for the Giroux Company. At the conclusion of the plaintiff's testimony the court below granted a prayer "that there is no evidence legally sufficient to show that the plaintiff was employed by the defendant to act as the agent or servant of the defendant in procuring purchasers for the stock mentioned in the evidence, and the verdict of the jury must be for the defendant." An exception to that ruling is the only one presented by the record.

This case is certainly a peculiar one. Apparently the principal business actually done by the appellee was the sale or attempted sale of Giroux stock—of which it seems to have been authorized to sell 30,000 shares; but, so far as shown by the record, it sold less than 4,000 shares, including those to Mr. and Mrs. Center. Yet we find the appellant, who was the vice president, a director, and a large stockholder, demanding more than one-half the appellee was to receive, as he was to get one-half the commissions and his expenses. If we take his statement literally, Mr. Beveridge, the secretary and treasurer, was to receive the balance, but assuming that he meant that Mr. Beveridge was to receive it for the appellee, does the record show such facts as would entitle the appellant to recover against the appellee? The appellant cited a number of authorities concerning the powers of officers and agents of corporations, ratification by the corporations of their acts, etc., but here we have a vice president and director (not to refer to his being a large stockholder) who presumably knew, and certainly ought to have known, the powers of the officer of the company with whom he was dealing. There is no excuse for his not knowing, and, if he did, he was surely under obligation to furnish more evidence of the powers of Mr. Beveridge than appears in the record. Without some affirmative proof that the secretary and treasurer of the company was authorized to give him, not only one-half of the commissions on sales of this stock made by him, but according to his testimony one-half of the commissions on all sales of this stock, whether made by him or not, in addition to his expenses, he should not be permitted to recover from the company on such a promise. There is no presumption of law that one who is secretary and treasurer of a corporation has such power, and merely because the appellant spoke of Mr. Beveridge as "the man behind the gun," or even as "general manager," is not sufficient unless there be more than we have in this record to inform us of the nature of his duties and the extent and character of the business of the company he was representing. The office of general manager in many corporations is one of very large powers, but so far as we are informed Mr. Beveridge seemed to have had but little to manage. The appellant testified "there were no other agents in the employ of the American Finance Company but myself," and up to the time he went into the employ of the company no timber or coal lands had been sold, and it is not shown that any were afterwards sold. There is nothing to inform us what the president did, or was supposed to do, and there is no intimation that he ever approved of, or even knew of, the alleged arrangement between the appellant and Beveridge. Nor is there the slightest suggestion that the board of directors had authorized it, or that any member thereof, excepting Waters and Beveridge, knew that they were thus entering into an agreement by which one of them was to get more than one-half of the profits coming to the company from the sale of this stock, which, as we have already said, seems to have been its principal business—certainly up to the time Waters claims to have been employed. He was in the employ of the appellee according to his claim for less than three months, yet, if they had succeeded in selling the 30,000 shares of stock he would have been entitled to one-half of $37,500, as his share of the commissions. Well might Beveridge say to him in one of the letters, offered by appellant: "You know that 30,000 shares means $37,500 for us, and we don't want to lose this great opportunity."

One circumstance disclosed by the testimony is very remarkable, in view of the fact that the appellant seemed desirous of giving the impression that Beveridge was "the company practically." The subscription to the stock of the Giroux Company by Mr. and Mrs. Center is dated March 21, 1904, yet on March 22d, he got from the Giroux Company what is spoken of as a duebill, which reads: "Due to Mr. Thos. S. Waters, Jr., as vice president of the American Finance Company, of Baltimore, Maryland, $4,375 as commission on the sale of thirty-five hundred (3,500) shares of stock of this company, upon the payment by the subscriber, Mrs. Helen C. Center, of the balance of $14,500 due upon the said subscription, $3,000 having been paid by the subscriber to apply on the subscription as an incentive for this company to hold the same." If Beveridge had such powers as the appellant would have us believe, and he, as vice president, had none, upon what possible theory could he justify his conduct in taking the duebill in that form? Under no circumstances was he entitled to more than one-half of the commissions (in addition to his expenses), and the treasurer was entitled to collect all of them. The Giroux Company owed the appellee whatever commissions were due by the former, and it had no right to pay them to the appellant. He did collect $135 when he turned over the $3,000 for Mrs. Center, and when asked whether he had any authority to collect any money for the appellee he replied: "I had no absolute authority in writing, but as vice president of the American Finance Company I drew this $135 and reported it to the American Finance Company at the time I inclosed the report of sale." It is not shown just when it was, but apparently some time after Waters had ceased his connection with the appellee as agent, Mr. Kennedy, treasurer of the Giroux Company, got the duebill from him, and turned it over to Beveridge. In a letter written to the Giroux Company by Beveridge on March 23, 1904, which was offered in evidence by the appellant, Beveridge said that appellant was sent to New York "by the writer at the writer's personal expense to sell the stock of your company. He failed to sell the stock and was requested to come home two weeks ago." He stated in that letter that appellant had not sold one dollar's worth of the stock, and that "Mr. Waters was employed temporarily as an agent only, and he is not authorized to receive the company's money. He was not requested to spend my money to go to Boston, and he has been acting contrary to my wishes for the past 10 days." He indignantly denied the right of the Giroux Company to give Waters "any duebills issued by you or by your company for any so-called commissions on account of this company." Just why that letter was offered by the appellant is not clear, but he admits that he saw it the day it was received by Mr. Giroux, and then went into the employ of the Giroux Company. He also admits that Beveridge had notified him, before he visited the Centers at Boston, that he thought it would be well for him to come back to Baltimore. It is therefore, to say the least, very doubtful whether the appellant had not been discharged by Beveridge before the subscription of stock was made by the Centers.

But, without regard to that, is the plaintiff entitled to recover on this express contract, as it is alleged to be? To permit two officers, who were also directors of the corporation, to make an arrangement or contract so questionable, if not manifestly inequitable as this, without clear and unquestioned authority on the part of the one undertaking to bind the company, would establish a precedent which would be most dangerous. It is true that in this state an officer or director of a corporation can recover for services rendered his corporation, even if the services for which he claims compensation are within the line and scope of his duties, as such officer or director, provided he proves an express contract, and that, if he renders services which are not within the scope of, and are not required of him by, his duties as such officer or director, but such as are properly to be performed by an agent, broker, or attorney, he may recover compensation for such services upon an implied promise. Santa Clara Mining Ass'n v. Meredith, 49 Md. 380, 33 Am. Rep. 264. But in this case there is no evidence or pretense that any one connected with the company had any knowledge or intimation that such an arrangement had been made, excepting Beveridge, and his powers to employ agents or fix their compensation, or bind the company in other ways, are left utterly uncertain and indefinite in the evidence—too much so to justify recovery by one connected with the company, as appellant was, on such a remarkable agreement as the one relied on. It might require less evidence to sustain a claim by a stranger, but the appellant's connection with the company was such as to give him full information as to the powers of Beveridge, and he could not be imposed on or deceived by an apparent authority, even if it be conceded there was such, which cannot be done. There is nothing to show a ratification by the company of the alleged contract, for whatever was done was by Beveridge, and of course he could not ratify his own acts—if he had power to ratify them he had power to act in the first place, and there would then be no necessity for ratification. We are therefore of the opinion that the appellant failed to show such authority in Beveridge as was necessary to support the action on the alleged express contract.

But, although we so find as to the alleged contract set out in the account, we are of opinion that there was error in granting this prayer. There was evidence tending to show that the appellant did sell at least 2,500 of the 3,500 shares of stock to Mr. and Mrs. Center—included in the subscription we have spoken of. It is further shown that the appellee actually had in hand at least $5,000 of the money of the Giroux Company for stock sold Mrs. Center, and in a statement written on the back of a check of the American Finance Company, dated April 11, 1904, payable to the Giroux Company, it credited itself with the commissions on the sale of the 3,500 shares of stock. If then the appellant did sell part of that stock, as he claims he did, and the appellee has in hand the fruits of the labors of the appellant, it would seem to be just that he should receive such compensation as may be found to be reasonable for any services thus rendered by him outside of his duties as vice president or director. There is nothing in the record to show that the sale of the stock was a part of his duties in either of those capacities, and it certainly could not have been required of him to go to Boston for such purpose. He received no compensation as vice president or director, and these services were such as an agent, attorney, or broker might perform. He would therefore be entitled to recover compensation on the implied promise to pay for these services, which resulted in the appellee's receiving commissions on the sales of at least 2,500 shares of this stock, provided, of course, the jury believed his statement to be correct, Meredith's Case, supra.

The court ought to have submitted these questions, including the value of appellant's services, to the jury; for, although we are of opinion that there was not sufficient evidence of the authority of Beveridge to make such a contract as that spoken of in the first part of this opinion, that would not preclude the appellant from recovering for services actually rendered and accepted by the appellee by the receipt of the commissions on stock sold by the appellant—not in the line of his duties as vice president or director. As the granting of the prayer prevented the jury from passing on those questions, the judgment will be reversed.

Judgment reversed, and new trial awarded; the appellee to pay the costs.

SHIPLEY v. FINK.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Nov. 23, 1905.)

1. PLEADING—BILL—SUFFICIENCY ON DEMURRER.

A bill should not be dismissed on demurrer, if by any reasonable construction of its averments a case is stated entitling plaintiff to the relief sought.

2. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—BILL—SUFFICIENCY.

A bill for specific performance of a contract for the conveyance of land, which alleges that defendant "offered to give" plaintiff certain land, provided plaintiff would not erect a building in a certain place and manner, and that plaintiff accepted the offer, changed the plan of the building, took possession of the land, and erected the building in accordance with the agreement, states a cause of action as against a demurrer; the allegation of an agreement "to give" being construed as an agreement to convey.

3. SAME—CONTRACT TO CONVEY LAND—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence in a suit to compel the specific performance of a contract to convey land examined, and held insufficient to establish a contract with clearness essential to justify a decree for the conveyance of the land.

4. LICENSES—RIGHTS IN REAL PROPERTY.

Where an owner orally offered to give land to another, provided the latter would not construct a building in such a way as to cut off the light to a window in the owner's house, and the offer was accepted and a building erected according to the plans agreed on, the owner merely gave a parol license for the erection of the building, which license was revocable, so far as any future enjoyment of the land was concerned.

5. SAME—REVOCATION—REMEDY OF LICENSEE.

An owner, revoking a parol license for the construction of a building after the construction thereof, must make compensation to the owner of the building.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 32, Cent. Dig. Licenses, § 122.]

6. EQUITY—RETENTION OF JURISDICTION.

Where, in a suit for specific performance of a contract for the sale of land, the evidence fails to prove the contract, but shows that defendant granted to plaintiff a parol license for the construction of a building on defendant's land, and the building was erected, equity should retain the bill and award to plaintiff proper compensation on defendant preventing the future use of the building.

7. LICENSES—RIGHTS IN REAL ESTATE—PURCHASE OF REAL ESTATE—REVOCATION—REMEDIES AGAINST PURCHASER.

An owner granted to another a parol license for the construction of a building on his land. The building was erected, and the land was sold under a judicial decree, without reference to the license. Held, that the purchaser, on preventing the future use of the building by the owner thereof, could not be compelled to compensate him; but he could be compelled to give him a reasonable time in which to remove the building without unnecessary injury.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Carroll County; Wm. H. Thomas, Judge.

Suit by Charles E. Fink against Grove A. Shipley. From a decree for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BRISCOE, BOYD, PAGE, PEARCE, and SCHMUCKER, JJ.

Jas. A. C. Bond, for appellant. Charles E. Fink, for appellee.

PEARCE, J. This appeal is from a decree of the circuit court for Carroll county, enforcing specific performance of an alleged contract for the conveyance of real estate.

Charles E. Fink and Henry B. Reigel in the year 1899 were owners of adjoining properties in the town of Westminster; the property of Mr. Fink being then in the tenancy of John T. Thompson, since deceased. Both these properties were improved by brick dwellings; that of Mr. Reigel being three feet and three inches south of the dividing line between the two properties, which line ran at right angles to Pennsylvania avenue, upon which the lots fronted, and the dwelling upon Mr. Fink's property being about five feet from said dividing line. Thompson, desiring to go into business as a butcher, arranged with his landlord for the erection of a meat shop upon the space between his dwelling and the said dividing line, to stand upon said line, and to run back to the rear of Thompson's dwelling, where it was to be widened, so as to give additional room and convenience for the business. This would have darkened the dining room window of Reigel's property, and upon discovering this fact Reigel, as the plaintiff alleges in his bill, "earnestly solicited the plaintiff not to extend said building so far back as to interfere with the light to his said window, and offered to give the plaintiff the land between Reigel's house and the dividing line, from the west side of said dining room window to Pennsylvania avenue, and the use of the wall on the north side of his said house for the same distance, * * * provided the plaintiff would not erect a building on said line of division opposite said window, so as to cut off or interfere with the light to said window, which offer was accepted by the plaintiff," who in consequence changed the plan of said building accordingly, "and the plaintiff took immediate possession of said strip of land, and said building was immediately erected, in accordance with said agreement, upon the space between the two said houses and against the wall of said Reigel's house; the dimensions of said building being about $8\frac{1}{2}$ feet wide by $21\frac{1}{2}$ feet deep, and not extending further back than the western edge of said dining room window." Reigel died in November, 1900, and his said house and lot was sold in February, 1903, under a decree of the circuit court for Carroll county, and was conveyed by the trustees under said decree to the purchaser, the defendant, being described in the advertisement as containing one-fourth of an acre, more or less, without giving the lines, though at the sale it was stated to front on Pennsylvania avenue 60 feet, with a depth of 198 feet, and being conveyed to the defendant by metes and bounds conforming to said statement, and being designated in said deed as lot No. 3 of Hopper's addition to Westminster; the plaintiff's lot being lot No. 4 of Hopper's addition. No reference was made in the advertisement, or at the sale, to the said meat shop, or to any agreement or understanding under which the same was built partly upon Reigel's land.

The defendant demurred to the plaintiff's bill, and the court overruled the demurrer. We think this ruling was correct. Upon demurrer a bill should not be dismissed, if by any reasonable construction of the language of its averments a case is stated entitling the plaintiff to the relief sought; and we think the allegation of an agreement "to give the land" may be construed as an allegation of an agreement "to convey the land," under which proof may be offered of such an agreement. Upon the overruling of the demurrer the defendant answered, denying the alleged agreement between plaintiff and Reigel, and averring that he was a bona fide purchaser for value, without notice of any claim of the plaintiff, and that plaintiff stood by and saw said property sold, without setting up any claim. He also relied upon the statute of limitations and the absence of any written contract or deed, and admitted that after giving notice to plaintiff to remove that part of said building which was erected upon his land, and plaintiff's failure to comply with said notice, he began to tear down and remove said part of said building, as alleged in plaintiff's bill, until stopped by the injunction issued thereunder.

We have carefully examined the testimony to determine if it will warrant us in finding an agreement to convey the land, and will briefly state the substance of the evidence upon this question. Mrs. Thompson, the widow of the tenant of Mr. Fink's property, says: That her husband went to Reigel and told him in her presence that he was too ill to keep up his trade. That he was going to put up a meat shop on the demised premises, with his landlord's consent, and stated how the building would be located, and that he did not want Reigel to think hard of him. That Reigel said: "Don't do that. If you pass my dining room window, it will darken my room. Take my ground, John. I will give it to you, but don't run it past my window." That her husband said he would see Mr. Fink about it, and afterwards told Reigel Mr. Fink said it was all right, and he should go ahead and build the shop, which he did, and that Mr. Fink allowed him for the labor and material out of his rent. That nothing was said as to when Thompson was to remove the shop, or for what period of time he was to have the land. James H. Thompson, a son of John T. Thompson, said his father told Reigel he was going to put the building on the line and run it back, and Reigel said: "Don't do that. Put it on my land, but don't run it back further than my dining room window." There was nothing said as to the time his father should have the land, only, "I will give you this land for your shop, but don't run it past my window." His father said he would see Mr. Fink, and later told Reigel Mr. Fink said: "All right. Go ahead and build your shop." Mrs. Sheeler, who lived next to Reigel, says Reigel told her they were going to build a butcher shop on the avenue, and it would be handy, and that "he gave him the right of way, the privilege to put the building partly on his land." Mr. Whitmore, who lived opposite to Reigel, says that, while the shop was being erected, Reigel told him that he told Thompson, if he would not go past his dining room window, "he might have that space," but he did not say how long he was to have it. Mr. Bankert, a near neighbor, says Thompson told him he was going to have an opposition to Whitmore, and just then Reigel came up and said the ground was no use to him, and he would rather have Thompson build there; but there was nothing said about deeding the land, or how long Thompson was to have its use. Mr. Wynert, another neighbor, says that, when the lumber was on the ground, Reigel said he had told Thompson that, if he would not go past his window, "he could use his wall as one of his side walls. He could put up the building there, and he would never give him any trouble." Mr. Fink testified that Thompson informed him "that Reigel said he would give the entire space between his brick house and the southern line of my lot, and the use of the wall of his brick house, if the building was not extended further back from the avenue than the nearest window to said avenue, which was his dining room window," and that he accepted the proposition, and the building was erected accordingly. He did not state there was any offer to convey the land, or any reference by any one to a conveyance, and there is nothing in the record to show that there was any personal communication upon this subject at any time between Reigel and Mr. Fink. There was no other testimony relating to the agreement or understanding as to the erection of the building upon Reigel's land, and we do not think that which we have stated affords the character or degree of proof required to justify a decree for the conveyance of the land in question, which is the specific relief sought by the bill.

"Specific performance is never a matter of right, and always rests in sound judicial discretion, controlled by established principles of equity. The contract sought to be enforced must be so clearly proven as to satisfy the court that it constitutes the actual agreement between the parties." Horner v. Woodland, 88 Md. 512, 41 Atl. 1080. "Its terms must not be ambiguous. They must be accurately stated in the bill, and the proof must correspond therewith, so as to have no room for reasonable doubt." O'Brien v. Pentz, 48 Md. 577. And in contracts for the conveyance of land the contract alleged must be established by clear, satisfactory, and convincing proof. 26 Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) 181. So far as appears from the record, Mr. Fink never exchanged a word with Reigel on this subject, and he does not say that Thompson, in reporting to him Reigel's proposition, represented any agreement for a conveyance. No one of the five witnesses who testified to the arrangement between Thompson and Reigel referred to any such agreement. Bankert says there was nothing in the conversation he heard about deeding the land. Mrs. Sheeler says Reigel told her he gave Thompson "the right of way, the privilege to put the building on his land," and Wymert says Reigel told him he told Thompson he would never give him (Thompson) any trouble. There is a very material difference between an agreement to allow the erection of a building by another upon one's land and a contract to convey the land to that other, or, as in this case, to a third party; between a parol license for an easement in land and an agreement to convey the land in which the easement is to be enjoyed. If Reigel intended to bind himself to execute a deed to Mr. Fink for this land, it was unnecessary and meaningless for him to assure Thompson he would never give him any trouble. But this assurance was entirely consistent with the purpose of allowing the use of the land to Thompson so long as he continued the tenant of Mr. Fink, and his declaration that he had given Thompson the right of way, the privilege, was consistent with the same purpose; but both were inconsistent with a purpose or obligation to convey the land to Mr. Fink. Such evidence, whatever may have been Mr.

Fink's understanding of the proposition, as reported by Thompson, cannot be accepted by the court as clear and convincing proof of an actual agreement on Reigel's part for a conveyance of the land, without which understanding on Reigel's part the alleged contract lacks the essential element of mutuality, and is marked by an ambiguity as to the subject of the agreement, from all shade or color of which, as was said in Dixon v. Dixon, 92 Md. 488, 48 Atl. 152, the contract must be free.

Nor is there a word of evidence from any one that Reigel required of Mr. Fink a "covenant not to erect any building or buildings on his land opposite the dining room or kitchen windows of the defendant's house, which could or might darken either of said windows or obstruct the light thereof." Reigel's only requirement was that the particular building which Thompson was about to erect for his own use and convenience should not go beyond his dining room window, and the requirement by the decree of the covenant on Mr. Fink's part, to be inserted in the deed, goes beyond the specific performance of any term of the contract established by the evidence, and is the introduction of a new term not agreed upon by the parties. All that we find to be established by the evidence in this case is a parol license from Reigel to Thompson to enjoy an easement in his land and the wall of his house. In Cook v. Stearns, 11 Mass. 533, the court said: "A license is, technically, an authority given to do some one act or series of acts on the land of another without passing any estate in the land. But licenses which in their nature amount to granting of an estate, for ever so short a time, are not good without deed. The distinction is obvious. Licenses to do a particular act do not in any degree trench upon the policy of the law [which is the same in Maryland as in Massachusetts in this respect] which requires the bargains respecting title or interest in real estate shall be by deed or in writing. They amount to nothing more than an excuse for the act, which would otherwise be a trespass. But a permanent right to hold another's land for a particular purpose is an important interest, which ought not to pass without writing, and is the very object provided for by our statute." In Houston v. Laffee, 46 N. H. 507, where a lead pipe to convey water had been laid in defendant's land, under a verbal license from a former owner, and defendant cut the pipe, the court said: "A parol license to do a certain act, or a series or succession of acts, on the land of another, does not convey any interest in the land, but simply a privilege to be exercised on the land. It has been held that, where a license like the one in this case has been given to plaintiff to enter upon defendant's land and do acts which involved expenditure of money, and the license becomes executed by an expenditure incurred, it is irrevocable, on the ground that a revocation under such circumstances would be fraudulent or unconscionable.

But we think the later decisions sustain the doctrine that the license is in all cases revocable, so far as it remains unexecuted, or so far as any future enjoyment of the easement is concerned; for, to hold otherwise, would be giving to a parol license the force of a conveyance of a permanent easement in real estate, and no such right or interest in real estate can be created by parol." In Hays v. Richardson, 1 Gill & J. 383, 384, it was decided that an easement to be used in the land of another (in that case a road and bridge) can only pass by a deed acknowledged and recorded, and the court referred with approval to Thompson v. Gregory, 4 Johns. 81, 4 Am. Dec. 255, in which the Supreme Court of New York (of which Kent and Spencer were judges) held that a right to overflow the land of another by the erection of a milldam was an incorporeal hereditament, which could be transferred by deed only, and not by parol permission to use it, and that, if it were otherwise, the assignment of such an interest, since the statute of frauds, must be in writing. The same was decided in Carter v. Harlan, 6 Md. 27-28, where Judge Leland cited Cook v. Stearns, supra, and Wallis v. Harrison, 4 Mees. & Wels. 543, and said: "When Harris, who was then the owner of the land now belonging to the plaintiff, disposed of and conveyed it away, such disposal and conveyance, ipso facto, by mere operation of law amounted to a revocation of the license; and so, likewise, with all the subsequent sales of it, until the plaintiff in this action became seised of it."

It is true, as contended by the appellee, that the fact of the possession of a party whose rights are involved in a purchase is a sufficient intimation of his right to put the purchaser upon inquiry into the nature of those rights, and that, failing to make it, he is in equity vested with all the consequences of a knowledge of the plaintiff's rights. Baynard v. Norris, 5 Gill, 483, 46 Am. Dec. 647; Duval v. Wilmer, 88 Md. 66, 41 Atl. 122. But this doctrine is only applicable to a case where the possession is under a claim of right or title to some estate in the land, which is established by proof, and not where there is a mere easement under a parol license which is subject to revocation at the will of the licensor, and which, as declared in Carter v. Harlan, supra, is in fact revoked by sale and conveyance, as in this case. It follows from what we have said that the decree appealed from, which requires a conveyance by the appellant of the strip of land in question, and which makes perpetual the preliminary injunction restraining the appellant from destroying or interfering with said building, must be reversed. It does not follow, however, upon the facts of this case, that the injunction should have been dissolved at once. When a court of equity has once acquired jurisdiction of a cause, it will retain such cause in order to do full and complete justice between the parties as far as possible, with respect to the subject-matter. Pomeroy on Contracts, § 474. Accordingly, if Reigel, the licensor, were still the owner of the land and the defendant in this suit, he would not be allowed to withdraw his consent and prevent the future use of the building, erected for the enjoyment of the easement, without making compensation to Mr. Fink, and the court would retain the bill to enable it to ascertain and decree a just compensation, in order that he should not be put to the trouble and expense of a second suit in another tribunal. Carter v. Harlan, supra; Green v. Drummond, 31 Md. 84, 1 Am. Rep. 14; Addison on Torts (6th Ed.) § 310. This relief, however, cannot be granted against the appellant under the circumstances of this case.

But we think the evidence shows that the appellant acted with undue haste, in view of all the circumstances, in starting to tear down and destroy that part of the building on his land at the time he did so. The testimony of both parties shows that at that time the removal of the building was a subject of negotiation between them; Mr. Shipley requiring, either that it be removed or an agreement made for payment of rent for the land on which it stood. While this discussion was in progress, Mr. Shipley served a written notice on Mr. Fink, November 28, 1903, requiring him to remove the building on or before December 3, 1903. Mr. Fink testifies that they had previously agreed to meet on the premises on December 5, 1903, at 4 p. m., to adjust the matter, an earlier meeting being impracticable, owing to the pressure of his professional engagements, and that he went there at 4 p. m., and found that Mr. Shipley had begun to tear the building down before 2 o'clock, but was not then there. Mr. Shipley denies this agreement. Without, however, undertaking to reconcile their testimony, we are of opinion that, under all the circumstances of the case, Mr. Fink was entitled to a reasonable opportunity to remove the building without unnecessary injury to it, and that the notice given, in view of all the facts, was not such reasonable notice. The proper course, in our opinion, would have been to retain the bill and continue the injunction for such period as would, in the judgment of the court enable Mr. Fink to remove the building from Mr. Shipley's ground without unnecessary injury thereto; and we are of opinion that 10 days will be a sufficient period therefor.

Decree reversed, and cause remanded, that a new decree may be passed in conformity with this opinion. The costs above and below to be paid equally by the appellant and the appellee.

JONES v. DAY et al.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Nov. 16, 1905.)

1. TRUSTS—SALE OF PROPERTY—DISTRIBUTION OF PROCEEDS—CONSTRUCTION OF DEED.

Where a deed conveyed property to the grantor's son, in trust for the grantor's use during her life, and provided that after her death the property should go to the grantee for life, with power to sell the same and divide the proceeds "equally between himself and each of his children, share and share alike," but, in case he failed to sell, the power of sale was on his death to vest in his wife, the proceeds of sale to be divided "equally between herself and each of her children share and share alike," the grantee was not entitled to one-half, but he and his four children were each entitled to one-fifth of the proceeds arising on a sale by him.

2. SAME—COMPENSATION OF TRUSTEE—ALLOWANCE OF COMMISSION—AMOUNT OF.

The property having been sold for $4,000, it was not error to allow the trustee a commission of 2½ per cent. as compensation.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Baltimore County, in Equity; N. Charles Burke, Judge.

Controversy between Owen D. Jones and Annie B. Day and another as to the proper construction of a deed. From the decree, said Owen D. Jones appeals. Affirmed.

John P. Poe and Edwin Higgins, for appellant. D. G. McIntosh, Jr., for appellees.

PAGE, J. In 1885 Sarah Jones conveyed by deed to her son, Owen D. Jones, certain property, in trust for the grantor's own use during her life, with power reserved to herself to sell and dispose of the same, or any part thereof, as she might see proper, and apply the proceeds thereof to her own use and benefit, and from and after her death the said property, or so much thereof as had not been disposed of by her, should go to her son, Owen, for life, with power to him to sell the same or any part thereof and to divide the proceeds of the same "equally between himself and each of his children, share and share alike." Should he, however, not sell as authorized by the deed, upon his death, the power of sale was vested in his wife, Annie Jones, with directions to divide the proceeds of sale "equally between herself and each of her children, by the said Owen D. Jones, share and share alike." And should neither Owen D. Jones nor Annie E. Jones sell the property or only a part of it, then it and the remaining part, upon their deaths, shall pass to their children, to be "equally divided between them, share and share alike," etc. Annie, the wife of Owen, died four years ago, leaving four children, all of whom are still living. Sarah Ann Jones, the mother of Owen, died many years ago. Owen Jones in December, 1904, made sale of the property for the sum of $4,000, and the same is now in court for distribution among those entitled thereto. Two of the children it appears have assigned their respective interests in the fund to the appellant. The lower court decreed that by a proper construction of the deed Owen Jones and his four children each take one-fifth of the proceeds of sale, and that the trustee was entitled to a commission of 2½ per cent. as compensation. From this decree this appeal was taken.

The terms of the deed indicate a purpose on the part of the grantor to devote the property, first, to the use and enjoyment of her son during his life, and, afterwards, to that of his wife, if she should survive. But such use was limited only to the property itself or that part of it that remained unsold. So soon as the property was sold, either by the son Owen or by his wife, under and by virtue of the powers conferred by the deed, then a rule of distribution of a different character was imposed. In that event, the person invested with the power of sale was not to be entitled to the entire proceeds, but to only a share. He or she (as the case might be) was to share "equally" with "each of the children, share and share alike." This seems to be the clear meaning of the words of the deed; and, if that be correct, and if it be correct, the decree of the lower court must be affirmed. Larmour v. Rich, 71 Md. 369, 18 Atl. 702.

There was some stress laid at the argument upon the use of the word "between." The deed provides that the proceeds of sale shall be divided "equally between himself [the appellant] and each of his children," and it was contended that by the employment of this word there was indicated the purpose to require the fund to be divided into two parts, one of which to go to the appellant, the other to be equally divided among his children. But we cannot accept this view. It has been held that the word "between" ordinarily refers to two only and not more, though, as was said in Leary's Appeal, 162 Pa. 372, 29 Atl. 750, "it is not unfrequently used, especially by the uneducated and colloquially, in the sense of among, as referring to more than two objects." To construe it here as indicating that the grantor in the deed intended to be understood as meaning there were to be only two parties to the distribution, one of them being the appellant and the other his children, does violence to the proper import of all the words when taken together. It absolutely ignores the word "each," as used by the grantor more than once. Her direction is explicit, and so clear as to leave no room for doubt that the division is to be made "equally" between himself and each of his children, "share and share alike." Thus the division is to be "equal," and each child and the appellant should take, "share and share alike." Where the language is so clear as in this case, grammatical construction of a particular word and even the authorities applicable to cases not exactly similar to the one under consideration are not important.

The counsel for the appellee has referred to several cases in Maryland, but we do not deem it necessary to discuss them. Brittain v. Carson, 46 Md. 189; Brown v. Ramsey, 7 Gill, 352.

There was no error in the allowance of commissions as compensation.

Decree affirmed.

BERNEI et al. v. SAPPINGTON et al.
(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Nov. 23, 1905.)

1. EASEMENTS—GROUNDS—OBSTRUCTING ALLEY—IRREPARABLE INJURY.

A party seeking the aid and protection of a court of equity to enjoin the obstruction of an alley must show a clear title, or at least a fair prima facie case in support of the title he asserts, and in addition thereto he must show that irreparable or serious injury will result from the invasion of his legal rights.

2. SAME—OBSTRUCTION OF WAY—ESTABLISHMENT OF TITLE AT LAW.

Where the evidence in a suit to enjoin the obstruction of a way discloses a real dispute as to plaintiffs' title to the easement claimed by them, and tends strongly to support the grounds of defense asserted by defendants, so that the question of title to the way, as dependent upon the construction of title deeds and upon asserted adverse holding and user, is drawn in controversy, an injunction will not be granted until the question of title is settled in an action at law.

3. SAME—PROTECTION PENDING LITIGATION.

A temporary injunction restraining the obstruction of a way, the title to which is involved in great doubt, will not be granted pending proceedings at law to establish the title, unless the mischief threatened or impending from such obstruction is likely to be ruinous or irreparable.

4. SAME.

Where a way alleged to exist in plaintiffs' favor had been completely closed for 50 years, and during that time had been in the uninterrupted and exclusive control of defendants and their predecessors in title, and plaintiffs had allowed defendants to make valuable improvements which obstructed the way without making any objection thereto, an injunction would not be granted to restrain the making of further improvements obstructing the way, which were practically completed before any protest was made by plaintiffs.

Appeal from Circuit Court No. 2 of Baltimore City; George M. Sharp, Judge.

Suit by Ferdinand Berner and others against Lizzie C. Sappington and others. From an order dismissing the bill, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BRISCOE, BOYD, PAGE, PEARCE, SCHMUCKER, JONES, and BURKE, JJ.

Louis B. Berner, and Geo. R. Willis, for appellants. Charles J. Bonaparte and Paul N. Burnett, for appellees.

BURKE, J. This is an appeal from an order of the circuit court No. 2 of Baltimore city, dismissing the bill of complaint without prejudice to the right of the plaintiffs to institute appropriate proceedings at law respecting the subject-matter of this controversy. The bill sought to procure an injunction restraining the defendants from obstructing and closing the alley therein mentioned, and to require them to reopen the alley to the extent to which it may have been closed by them. A somewhat detailed statement of the issue raised by the pleadings will make more evident the grounds upon which we rest the decision of the case.

The bill alleges: That the plaintiffs are possessed of a certain lot of ground with improvements thereon situated in the city of Baltimore at the southeast corner of Eutaw and Lexington streets. That said lot was devised to the complainants' ancestor, Seligman Berner, in 1881, by H. Marcus Denison. That in said conveyance the lot was described as follows: Beginning for the same at the southeast corner or intersection of Eutaw street and Lexington street, and running thence east, binding on Lexington street, 63 feet, to a 3-foot alley, running from Lexington street, parallel with Eutaw street, of the depth of 78 feet, laid out and left open by Christian Miller for the benefit of the purchasers of his lots; thence south, parallel with Eutaw street and binding on said alley, 38 feet; thence west, parallel with Lexington street, 63 feet, to Eutaw street; and thence north, binding on Eutaw street, 38 feet, to the place of beginning—with the right and privilege of said alley, in common with said Miller and his assigns, but subject to the right and privilege heretofore granted by Hezekiah Claggett to a certain John Daly and his assigns, by indenture bearing date the 25th of March, 1824, of the use of said alley, and also the right of building over the same, so far as the said Hezekiah Claggett then had the right thereto, against, in, and upon the wall of the house then owned by him adjoining said alley. That the defendants Lizzie C. Sappington and Coale S. Brennan, are seised in fee of a certain lot of ground, with improvements thereon, adjoining the plaintiffs' property, known as 323 West Lexington street, and that as such owners they have the right to the use and privilege of the alley as now laid out and used on the west side of the property, and the right of building over the same so far as a certain Hezekiah Claggett has a right thereto, against, in, and upon the wall of the house once owned by him adjoining said alley, so as not to injure said wall. The bill then alleges that on February 14, 1901, the defendants Lizzie C. Sappington and Coale S. Brennan leased their said property to Benjamin F. Spink for a term of 15 years, with the understanding that said lessee should tear down the improvements on the lot and erect a new three-story house, to cost not less than $4,500, and that said Spink recently proceeded to have the old buildings torn down, and for that purpose employed the defendant Jones, who is also under contract with said lessee, to erect a three-story house in place of the old building; that the work of erection of said house is now progressing, and that, although they have warned the defendants not to encroach upon said alley, to the common use and privilege of which the plaintiffs have a right, they, the said defendants, have nevertheless begun to close up and build upon said space of three feet covered by said alley, and, unless restrained, will completely close the same and appropriate said alley to their own use; that the deprivation by the defendants of the plaintiffs' use and privilege of said alley is not susceptible of adequate compensation in damages at law, and will work irreparable injury to the plaintiffs' property, unless the defendants be restrained by the court, and be directed to remove the obstructions from the alley and restore said alley to its original condition as an alley. The prayer of the bill is that the defendants or their agents may be enjoined from placing any brick, stone, or other building material in or upon said alley, and from closing the same as an alley, and that an order may be passed commanding the defendants to remove any such building material therefrom, and to reopen the same to the extent to which it may have been closed by them.

To this bill the defendants filed separate answers. The answer of the defendant Jones alleges that on the 28th of March, 1901, he entered into a contract with Benjamin F. Spink to tear down an old, and erect a new, building, on the lot No. 323 West Lexington street, and that on July 2, 1901, he had completed said improvements; he denied that he ever received any notice from the plaintiffs as alleged in the bill. The answer of Benjamin F. Spink avers that he originally leased the premises No. 323 West Lexington street in February, 1881; that he has occupied the premises continuously since that date; that on February 14, 1901, he entered into a new lease with the present owners; that pursuant to the provisions of said lease he has since the date thereof torn down the old improvements on said lot and has erected a new building thereon, the new building covering the same part of the lot upon which the old building stood; that on June 7, 1901, after the building was under roof and practically completed, he received a notice from Louis B. Bernei to desist from further obstructing the said alley. The answer denies the existence of the alley claimed by the plaintiffs, and avers that since he has been a tenant of the property the improvements thereon have covered the entire front of the lot, and that a hallway or entrance way of the width of about three feet on the west side of said lot has, during his occupancy of said premises, been entirely closed by a door under lock and key in the front, and a stairway of the entire width of said entrance way leading to the second floor of said building. It avers that during the time he has occupied said property—that is, since February, 1881—no easement in any part thereof has been enjoyed by the plaintiffs or any one else; that, if the alley mentioned in the bill ever existed, the same has been completely closed; and that the same has been continuous, complete, uninterrupted, visible, adverse, notorious, and hostile to any rights the plaintiffs may have had therein. The answers of Lizzie C. Sappington and Coale S. Brennan deny the existence of the alley asserted by the plaintiffs, and claim title to the strip of land which the plaintiffs claim to be an alley. They deny the receipt of any notice from the plaintiffs until after the improvements of their said lot had been practically completed. They aver title by adverse possession to said strip of land claimed by plaintiffs to be an alleyway, and further allege that any easement which the owners of the lot described in paragraph 1 of the bill have as grantees of George Smith and Thomas Mummey has long since been abandoned and extinguished.

The circumstances under which a court of equity may be invoked to aid or protect a legal right have been fixed by numerous decisions in this state. The party seeking the protection of the court must be able to show a clear title, or at least a fair prima facie case in support of the title he asserts; and, in addition thereto, he must show that irreparable or serious injury will result from the invasion of his legal rights; the irreparable or serious nature of the injury to which the property in question is subject, and will likely sustain, before the legal right can be fully vindicated in the proper forum, being the equity on which the application for injunction is founded. Whalen v. Dalashmutt, 59 Md. 250; Gullick v. Fisher, 92 Md. 353, 48 Atl. 375. In the case of Clayton v. Shoemaker et al, 67 Md. 216, 9 Atl. 635, it is said that when an application is made for an injunction to prevent waste or trespass, it is incumbent on the plaintiff to make out a prima facie title to the property; but if his title to the extent it is set up by him is denied and contested by the respondent, and evidence enough is offered to show some ground for the denial, the injunction will not be granted till the disputed title between the parties is first settled on appropriate pleadings and full testimony. In cases where the legal title to the property is in dispute, and it appears by the pleadings and proof that serious loss or injury will result, or is likely to result, to the plaintiff before the disputed title could be established at law, the court will grant a temporary injunction preserving the present status until the title has been decided in a court of law. Lanahan v. Gagan, 37 Md. 105; Amelung v. Seekamp, 9 Gil & J. 468.

The record contains quite a large amount of testimony introduced to support the contentions of the respective parties; but, in the view we take of the case, we do not feel called upon to enter upon an extended discussion or analysis of the evidence. It is sufficient to say that the testimony dis-closes a case in which there is a real dispute as to the plaintiffs' title to the easement claimed by them, and that the evidence produced by the defendants tends strongly to support the grounds of defense relied on in the respective answers. Upon the state of pleadings and proof disclosed by the record, has a court of equity jurisdiction to grant the relief prayed for in the bill? It is apparent from the pleadings and evidence that the determination of the title to the strip of ground in controversy, and of the rights of the parties therein, depend largely upon the true construction of the title deeds under which the respective parties claim, and upon the question of adverse holding and uses of the owners of the respective premises. These are all purely legal questions, not appropriate to a court of equity. The plaintiffs' title to the easement being denied and involved in great doubt, the question arises whether the record presents a case in which a temporary injunction should have been granted pending proceedings at law to establish the title. Such an injunction will not be granted in cases like the one under consideration, unless the court can see that the mischief threatened or impending is likely to be ruinous or irreparable. We do not find anything in the evidence in this case to take it out of the general rule.

The plaintiffs claimed that the easement which they seek to establish as appurtenant to their property was created in 1804, under the assignment from Christian Miller to George Smith and Thomas Mummy under whom they claim. The leasehold title to the lot described in said assignment (being the lot now owned by the plaintiffs) was acquired by Hezekiah Claggett in 1818. Claggett, in 1824, being then the owner of the leasehold estate in the property now owned by the plaintiffs, conveyed to John Daly, the ancestor of the defendants Sappington and Coale S. Brennan, lot No. 6 shown on the plat filed in this case. This deed in its granting clause contains the following words: "And particularly the use and privilege of the alley as now laid out on the west side of the above described ground, and the right of building over the same, so far as the said Claggett has a right thereto, against, in, and upon the wall of the house now owned by him adjoining said alley, so as not to injure said wall." Whether at the date of said deed lot No. 6 was improved or unimproved does not appear from the testimony. But, in 1881, when Spink took possession of said property, 57 years after the date of said deed, the entire front of said property was found to be improved by a building which indicated that it has been erected many years, the joists of which ran into the Bernel wall on the west, and the stairway and west door of which completely closed said alley and street to all access thereto. It is apparent from the evidence that this condition must have existed for many years before Seligman Bernel, the plaintiffs' ancestor, acquired possession in 1871 of the property now owned by them. The testimony indicates that the strip of ground, called an "alley" in the bill, has been completely closed for 50 years, and that during that time has been in the uninterrupted and exclusive control of the defendants Lizzie C. Sappington and Coale S. Brennan, and their predecessors in title. It is shown that Seligman Bernel allowed valuable improvements, which obstructed the alleged alley, to be made upon the property in 1881, without objection, and that the plaintiffs, with full knowledge, permitted Spink to expend a large sum in the erection of buildings mentioned in the evidence, by which the alley in question was entirely closed without a word of protest until the improvements were practically completed. Under these circumstances, to grant the prayer of the plaintiffs' bill would be to do an act of injustice and oppression. We are of the opinion that the decree of the court below should be affirmed.

Decree affirmed, with the costs to the appellees.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Nov. 4, 1905.)

INJUNCTION—TRESPASS—RAILROADS—INTERFERENCE WITH TRACKS.

Where a railroad company, organized under the general laws, has entered upon a certain land and laid its tracks thereon with the consent of one who had long been in possession under a claim of title, and thereafter takes a deed from the person in possession, another railroad company which has acquired an adverse title to the land will be enjoined from entering on the land and tearing up the tracks of the first company.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Washington County.

Bill by the Donora Southern Railroad Company against the Pennsylvania Railroad Company and others. Decree for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

A. M. Todd and Jas. A. Wiley, for appellants. Samuel McClay, J. H. Murdoch, T. F. Birch, and Reed, Smith, Shaw & Beal, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. This was a bill for injunction against a threatened repetition of the action of defendant in tearing up the tracks of the plaintiff, and incidentally for assessment of the damages for the acts already committed. The title to the land was in dispute. In 1902 plaintiff, a Pennsylvania corporation, located its route and constructed a portion of it on this land by agreement with one Bamford, who was then, and had been for many years, in possession under claim of title. On May 21, 1904, Bamford conveyed the land to plaintiff, which had previously constructed additional tracks to those built in 1902. In 1903 the defendants' lessor acquired an adverse title to the land, but, as found by the court below, with knowledge of Bamford's possession. And the defendants made no claim to title prior to 1903, and no effort to take possession until May 16, 1904, when it entered and tore up complainant's rails.

On these facts the court found as conclusions of law: "(1) That in 1902 the plaintiff company had power to take and condemn a right of way across the land, without regard to who owned it, and, having found Bamford in long possession, it had entered and built part of its tracks with his consent. (2) That defendants' lessor, when it acquired title in 1903, took subject to a visible easement thereon, 'and cannot now call in question the legality of the plaintiff's previous entry and appropriation.' (3) That this is not an ejectment suit, and that it is not necessary for the court to adjudicate the title to the land. (4) That the plaintiff company was in possession of its right of way under permission from one who was in possession under color of title, and who made a claim of title that had such a reasonable basis as would put the defendant companies who never were in possession, at least so far as the ground covered by the right of way was concerned, to an action at law to test their rights. The defendant companies took the law into their own hands and undertook by force to redress what they claimed was an invasion of their rights, and, in addition, they threaten a repetition of this force if the plaintiff company should attempt to restore the tracks destroyed. In doing so they committed a wrong, the repetition of which should be restrained. (5) That an injunction should issue, and damages should be assessed at $1,000, but that the injunction granted and the findings of fact and conclusions of law, which are held to justify it being granted, are not to prejudice the right of either of the parties hereto to establish, maintain, or defend in a court of law its title and right of possession to the said 6.73 acres of land described in the fourth paragraph of the plaintiff's bill, or any part thereof, or its legal or equitable right of possession to the strip of land over and across said tract of land covered by the location of the plaintiff company's main line and branch B."

On these findings and conclusions the decree is affirmed.

In re HOLBROOK'S ESTATE.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Oct. 30, 1905.)

WILLS — CONSTRUCTION — VALIDITY OF CONDITION.

Testator by his will gave the income of a fund during the beneficiary's life, or so long as she remained unmarried, with a gift over in case of her death or marriage. Held, that the gift was upon a limitation in favor of the beneficiary while she remained unmarried, and was not invalid as an unlawful restraint of marriage.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 49, Cent. Dig. Wills, § 1533.]

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Philadelphia County.

In the matter of the estate of Margaretta R. Holbrook. From a decree sustaining exceptions to adjudication, Helen Morton Bunker appeals. Affirmed.

The testatrix by will directed as follows: "I give and bequeath to my niece Helen Morton, the interest on the sum of $30,000, the said $30,000 to be held in trust by the Philadelphia Trust, Safe Deposit & Insurance Company for her use, she to receive the net income arising therefrom paid semiannually during the term of her natural life, or so long as she remains unmarried. In case of her death or marriage I direct that half of the principal be given to the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, and the other half to the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children." The niece married in 1904. The adjudicating judge (Penrose, J.) held that the bequest was for life, upon condition of forfeiture in case of marriage; that the condition was void, because against the policy of law; and that the niece, notwithstanding the marriage, continued entitled to the income. The court in banc held that there was a limitation in favor of the niece during the period of her nonmarriage, which was valid.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, POTTER, and ELKIN, JJ.

John G. Johnson, for appellant. N. Dubois Miller, John J. Wilkinson, and Joseph Mellors, for appellees.

MITCHELL, C. J. In Pennsylvania the right of a man to do as he will with his own has always been liberally construed. Accordingly a donor, not under any obligation to give, may give with such conditions as he pleases, subject only to the restriction that the conditions shall not be clearly illegal. Thus a man may not settle his own property on himself, so as to keep it out of the reach of his creditors, for that would lead directly to fraud. But a parent or other person, not bound to give at all, may give on a spendthrift trust, though the gift is thus placed beyond the reach of the donee's creditors. In considering any restriction, there is no presumption of illegality. On the contrary, the presumption is in favor of innocence and validity. The particular restriction which we have in this case belongs to the class known in general terms as in restraint of marriage, and is claimed to be void as against the policy of the law. The general rule must be conceded. But it has no sound basis, either historically or logically, as is apparent from the various origins assigned to it and the refinements, subtleties, and inconsistencies in its application. The old lawyers used to say there were three favorites in the law, life, liberty, and marriage, and Coke attributes the origin of the rule to this favor. Other authorities find its origin in the civil law; others again in the canon law; and finally, in some of the more modern cases, it is based on the policy of the law for the promotion of morality, which is certainly a far-fetched and unsubstantial reason in view of the admitted exceptions. Thus, for example, it is difficult to see why such a restriction tends to immorality in a gift of personality, but does not in a gift of realty, or, if the divestiture of an estate by marriage has the same tendency, why a limitation of the estate to a continuance unmarried should not. Yet these distinctions are as firmly settled as any in the law. Lancaster v. Flowers, 198 Pa. 614, 48 Atl. 896; Hotz's Estate, 38 Pa. 422, 80 Am. Dec. 490. The curious will find this subject learnedly discussed in the argument of Mr. Hare and the opinion of Kennedy, J., in McIlvaine v. Gethen, 3 Whart. 575, and the opinion of Chief Justice Gibson in Com. v. Stauffer, 10 Pa. 350, 51 Am. Dec. 489.

Nor does the rule stand any better considered logically. It started apparently with a prohibition of all restrictions against liberty of marriage. McIlvaine v. Gethen, 3 Whart. 575. Distinctions and exceptions one after another sustained prohibitions which went merely against time or place, or particular persons, conditions with a gift over on breach, conditions in a gift of land, and finally the distinction between conditions subsequent, working a divestiture, and conditions limiting the estate given. This last distinction is logical enough, for where there is an estate given, and the condition is held void, there is still the estate which may continue; while, where the estate itself is to last only so long as the condition is fulfilled, there is nothing left after the breach. But, while this distinction is logical, it is dry, technical logic, with no basis of substantial reason for application in the affairs of life. It is a reproach to the law that, of two donors intending to do exactly the same thing, one shall succeed and the other fail, as a violator of law, merely because one scrivener knew what he was about, and wrote "so long as the donee remains unmarried" and the other was ignorant or careless, and wrote "for life, if so long the donee remains unmarried." Hoopes v. Dundas, 10 Pa. 75. So strongly have the courts of Pennsylvania felt the undesirability of interference with the right of free disposition of property by the rule invoked in this case that the steady tendency has been to recognize and encourage exceptions which substantially eat out the rule itself. We share the views which have produced this result, and, while we will recognize and follow the adjudicated cases which may be properly regarded as having settled rules of property, yet we are not disposed to enlarge the scope of the principle, or to apply it to new and questionable cases.

The present controversy arises over the legacy of the testatrix to the appellant of the income of a fund "during the term of her natural life, or so long as she remains unmarried," with a gift over "in case of her death or marriage." The primary rule is to give effect to the intention of the testatrix and the presumption is that the intent was lawful. The form in which she expressed her will is unimportant, except as indicating her intent. There is nothing in this will clearly indicating an intent to prohibit marriage. The words are equally appropriate to express an intent to supply an income to the legatee so long as she was unmarried and presumably dependent on her own exertions for her maintenance. This is a perfectly lawful intent, though its practical effect may be to discourage marriage. Even regarding the language of the gift as ambiguous in being equally capable of two constructions, we must give it the one that will preserve the testatrix's right to dispose as she pleased of her property. There was a gift over on the happening of death or marriage. In Cornell v. Lovett's Ex'r, 35 Pa. 100, and Mickey's Appeal, 46 Pa. 337, restrictions much more clearly conditions subsequent divesting the legacies than that in the present case were expressly held to be valid.

The decree is affirmed.

COMMONWEALTH v. HINE.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Oct. 30, 1905.)

1. HOMICIDE—NEW TRIAL.

Defendant, who had been convicted of murder in the first degree, moved for a new trial, on the ground that he had been induced to go to trial without having made proper preparations, because the district attorney represented to defendant's counsel his willingness to accept a plea of guilty of murder in the second degree. Held, that the new trial was properly denied, on a finding by the trial judge that there had been no misunderstanding as to the plea which was to be entered, and the defendant had been allowed at his own request a week to prepare for trial.

2. SAME—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

A new trial, on conviction of murder, for newly discovered evidence merely cumulative as to the mental and physical condition of the prisoner before the homicide, was properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 2328; vol. 20, Cent. Dig. Homicide, § 687.]

Appeal from Court of Oyer and Terminer, Philadelphia County.

Louis O. Hine was convicted of murder in the first degree, and appeals. Affirmed.

The following is a portion of the opinion of Audenried, J., in the court below:

"The second reason advanced for a new trial is the allegation that the assistant to the district attorney who tried the case, by representing to defendant's counsel his willingness to accept a plea of guilty of murder of the second degree, induced him to go to trial without having made proper preparations. By the report of the trial judge it appears that when this case was first called for trial, defendant's counsel offered at side bar to enter a plea of guilty of murder of the second degree; that to the acceptance of this plea the assistant district attorney in charge of the case objected, saying that he had evidence which made it seem to him that the defendant was guilty of murder of the first degree; that thereupon defendant's counsel stated that if the question of murder of the first degree was to be tried out, he was not prepared to go on with the trial, and, being asked by the trial judge how long a time he would require for his preparation, replied, 'One week;' that thereupon, with the consent of the assistant district attorney, the trial of the cause was postponed for a week; that when the case was called the second time for trial, defendant's counsel made no objection to proceeding; that it was understood by counsel on both sides that the case was to be tried on the day when the trial took place, and that the question of the degree of the defendant's guilt would be left to the jury. With the negotiations in relation to the change of plea which went on before the day when the case was first called for trial, we have nothing to do, nor have we anything to do with what may have gone on between the assistant to the district attorney, who had charge of the case, and defendant's counsel after the arrangement had been made which is reported by the trial judge. That arrangement contemplated a careful trial of the case and was assented to by both parties. Counsel for the defendant was well aware that the court, in view of what had been said by the assistant district attorney, would not receive a plea of guilty of murder of the second degree, and intended to throw the responsibility of deciding the question of fact in the case on the jury. It is fair, however, to observe that the assertions of counsel for the defense in relation to the arrangements alleged by him to have been made between him and the assistant district attorney are denied by the latter.

"At the argument of the motion for a new trial the only point advanced with seriousness on behalf of the defendant was that the possession of after-discovered evidence throwing light upon the issue tried by the jury, which he could not have obtained at the time the trial took place, entitles him to have the case tried over again, so that this evidence may be presented to the jury. The evidence referred to is the testimony of Victor J. Hamilton, the proprietor of a saloon at No. 1603 Lombard street, Philadelphia. By his affidavit, which has been presented to us, it appears that Hamilton saw Hine between 3 and 4 o'clock in the afternoon of August 3, 1903. This was about eight hours before the shooting took place. Hamilton swears that although the defendant's condition did not seem so much that of one who had had too much liquor, it appeared to be that of one 'who was getting the rams, or was under the influence of both drugs and liquors.' In our view of the matter, this testimony is merely cumulative. It relates to the mental condition of the accused at a point of time appreciably antecedent to the shooting of his wife. That condition was testified to by Thomas O'Toole and Elizabeth R. Dougherty, and their testimony is to the same practical effect as Hamilton's. The trial judge properly told the jury that the important question for them to determine related to the condition of the defendant's mind at the moment when the shooting took place. Upon that question the testimony of Hamilton bears only remotely. A man may be so benumbed mentally by drink in the afternoon as to talk vaguely and incoherently, but be quite himself again within eight hours.

"We are of the opinion that the defendant was fairly tried, and that the verdict of the jury is supported by the evidence in the case; and we accordingly refuse to grant the motion for a new trial."

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

Thomas Raeburn White and Walter Thomas, for appellant. John C. Bell, Dist. Atty., and Joseph H. Taulane, Asst. Dist. Atty., for the Commonwealth.

PER CURIAM. The single assignment of error is that the court below abused its discretion in refusing a new trial. There is nothing in the case that justifies such a charge or that even requires discussion.

The judgment is affirmed, and the record remitted that the sentence may be executed in accordance with law.

Rule for new trial under Act April 22, 1903 (P. L. 245), refused.

In re MACE'S ESTATE.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Oct. 30, 1905.)

APPEAL—REVIEW—AUDITOR'S FINDINGS.

Where the questions of fact as to the correctness of the trustee's accounts in the matter of the settlement of an estate of a decedent were considered by the auditor, and his findings were approved by the court, the decree will be affirmed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 8, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, §§ 4015-4018.]

Appeal from Orphans' Court, Westmoreland County.

In the matter of the estate of Laura C. Mace. From a decree dismissing exceptions to auditor's report, the Safe Deposit & Trust Company and others appeal. Affirmed.

The following is the opinion of Steel, P. J., in the court below:

"A careful examination of the testimony, exceptions, papers, and report in the case convinces us that all the interest that could fairly have accrued on the money and securities in the hands of the accountant has been charged against him, and that the proper amount of premium on the bonds sold has been accounted for. There is no proof that he improperly received anything for transferring the $10,000 of 4 per cent. government bonds for the longer term 5 per cent. school bonds. And there can be no doubt but that the trade was of advantage to the estate, both in the amount of interest to be received and the ultimate value of the bond. The contestants had their day in court, and, as the time for the review of the original account had expired, they were not entitled to have that decree opened. And now, to wit, May 6, 1906, the exceptions are dismissed, and the auditor's report is confirmed absolutely."

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

John E. Kunkle and Edward E. Robbins, for appellants. James S. Moorhead and John B. Head, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. The questions of fact as to the correctness of the trustee's accounts, and the claims to surcharge him, were carefully considered in detail by the auditor, and his findings have been approved by the court. We have not been shown any valid ground for differing from the conclusions, and there is nothing else in the case. The decree is affirmed on the opinion of the court below.

Decree affirmed. at the costs of the appellant.

STARK v. BYERS.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Oct. 30, 1905.)

1. WILLS—CONSTRUCTION—CHARGE ON LAND.

Testator gave all his estate to his wife for life, with remainder to his executor, and charged the remainder with certain legacies, and directed a monument to be erected on his grave, not to exceed a sum stated. Held, that the cost of the monument was not a charge on the land.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 49, Cent. Dig. Wills, §§ 2114-2116.]

2. LIFE ESTATES—INCUMBRANCES—FORECLOSURE.

Testator devised certain mortgaged real estate to his widow for life. The widow before testator's death had acquired by assignment a part of the mortgage, but neglected during her life tenancy to pay the interest on the other portion. Held, on foreclosure, that such interest could be deducted from her share of a fund created by the sale.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 33, Cent. Dig. Life Estates, § 36.]

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Westmoreland County.

Action by Mrs. C. H. Stark, assignee of W. R. Barnhart and others, against W. S. Byers. From an order dismissing exceptions to auditor's report, the executor of Mrs. C. H. Stark appeals. Affirmed.

From the record it appeared that the fund for distribution before the auditor was raised in foreclosure proceedings under a mortgage created by Caleb H. Stark in his lifetime. The mortgage originally amounted to $20,000, and $4,000 of this had been assigned by Barnhart to Mrs. C. H. Stark in her husband's lifetime. Stark by his will gave his wife a life interest in his real and personal property. Other facts appear by the auditor's report which was in part as follows:

"In the verdict fixing the amount due Mrs. C. H. Stark, the court refused to allow any interest to her, except up to the time her life estate began, and it further decided that she was liable for the payment of the interest accumulated on this mortgage during her life tenancy. That portion of the opinion of his honor Judge McConnell, which bears on this question, and was filed at that time, is as follows: 'There is no dispute between the parties about the fact that Mrs. C. H. Stark, through these assignments, became possessed of the right to $4,000 of the mortgage debt, and is yet the owner of it. The verdict ascertains that she is the widow of C. H. Stark, deceased, and through his will is possessed of a life estate in the mortgaged premises. It also ascertains that this life estate vested in her by the death of her husband on January 1, 1899. There is but one question of law involved in this special state of facts, and that is, whether Mrs. C. H. Stark can collect interest on her share of the mortgage since the time she became tenant for life of the mortgaged premises through her husband's will. It is the duty of a life tenant to pay the interest falling due on incumbrances; interest on a mortgage is payable by the life tenant whether the mortgage was created by the testator who devised the life estate or by a former owner. Derr's Estate, 13 Phila. 224; Pennock v. Imbrie, 3 Phila. 140; Gross' Estate, 18 Phila. 154; Fidelity Ins., etc., Co. v. Dietz, 132 Pa. 36, 18 Atl. 1090; Stoops' Estate, 31 Pittsb. Leg. J. (O. S.) 34; Lang's Estate, 31 Pittsb. Leg. J. (O. S.) 173; School's Estate, 1 Pittsb. R. 358; McDonald v. Heylin, 4 Phila. 73; Jewell's Estate, 1 Wkly. Notes Cas. 404; Schurr's

Estate, 13 Phila. 353. Mrs. Stark was therefore liable for the payment of the interest that has accumulated on this mortgage during her life tenancy of the mortgaged premises. The original mortgagee and his assignees, other than Mrs. Stark, are not compelled to regard the existence of this duty which had its inception since the making of the mortgage, but may enforce the mortgage against the entire title as it existed in the mortgagor when the mortgage was given. A widow, tenant for life, is bound to keep down incumbrances, pay taxes, water rent and repairs in exoneration of those entitled in remainder. Schurr's Estate, 13 Phila. 353. When a life tenant neglects to pay the taxes and the remainderman pays the taxes, the latter may recover the amount of such payments from the estate of the deceased life tenant. Shue's Estate, 5 York Leg. Rec. 25. There is no apparent reason why this would not be true of interest which it was the duty of the life tenant to pay. The law does not favor such circuity of action.

"The question arises whether, if Mrs. Stark, the life tenant, neglected to pay the interest due during her life estate on that part of the mortgage assigned to Mrs. Mary M. Barnhart, to wit, the sum of $1,277.20, and the interest on that part of the mortgage assigned to W. R. Barnhart to wit, the sum of $3,057.89, for the same period, under the law and the direction of the court at the time of the rendition of the verdict aforesaid the auditor can deduct this amount of interest from the sum coming to the estate of Mrs. C. H. Stark out of this fund. The estate of Mrs. C. H. Stark is liable to the remainderman for these amounts of interest, and they could be collected by him out of her estate, if they had been collected from him. It is from the estate of Mrs. C. H. Stark as represented in this distribution that the auditor proposes to deduct these amounts of interest. It is simply having her estate do that which the law compels her to do. If her executor had paid it he would be entitled to repayment from the funds of the estate afterwards coming into his hands. Gross' Estate, 18 Phila. 154; McKerrahan v. Crawford, 59 Pa. 390."

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

H. Clay Belstel and James E. Keenan, for appellant. James S. Moorhead and C. E. Heller, for appellee Jacob Byers. Paul H. Gaither and Cyrus E. Woods, for appellee William S. Byers.

PER CURIAM. Two questions are raised by the amended assignments of error. As to the first, the auditor reported:

"As to the claim for $1,500 for the erection of monuments at the graves of C. H. Stark and his wife. The claim is made that it was the intention of the testator, C. H. Stark, to give to W. S. Byers only what was left after paying all legacies and performing all duties in the will. The testator is very careful to designate the legacies that are charged on the land. He uses the following language: 'I give, devise and bequeath unto my beloved wife, Ann Lavina Stark, all my estate, real, personal and mixed, of what nature or kind soever and wheresoever the same may be at the time of my decease for and during the term of her natural life, and at her death I give, devise and bequeath all of my estate as aforesaid, unto my friend William S. Byers, attorney at law, of Greensburg, Pa., to him, his heirs and assigns forever, subject, however, to and charged with the payment of the following legacies and bequests.' There can be no doubt that the legacies which follow are charges on the land. But the direction as to the above claim of $1,500 is not in this list. Before making the explicit charges on the land, the testator uses the following language as to this claim: 'I direct that my executor hereinafter named shall erect or cause to be erected at my grave and at that of my wife when she shall depart this life, suitable monuments, the costs of which shall not exceed the sum of $1,500. He, my said executor, shall use his discretion and best judgment in regard to the erection of the monuments for myself and wife. * * * he having an intimate knowledge of my wishes and desires in regard thereto. I further direct that in the settlement of his accounts he shall have credit for all moneys expended by him in the carrying out of my wishes and desires.'

"There is no specific amount mentioned. The will seems to fix only an amount which is to be determined by the executor, not to exceed $1,500. How much could be impounded for this purpose? One hundred dollars? Five hundred dollars? One thousand dollars? Or fifteen hundred dollars? In the brief submitted by the learned counsel for this claim the law does not exactly fit the facts of the present case before us. The words used after certain directions are "rest, residue and remainder," clearly showing that what was left was given under the will. In this case the testator, C. H. Stark, gives to his wife all his estate, real, personal and mixed, and at her death to W. S. Byers all his estate as aforesaid, charged with certain specific legacies. The auditor is of the opinion that this claim is not a charge on the land and should not be allowed out of the fund here for distribution."

On the other question the auditor quoted the opinion of the learned judge below filed at an earlier stage of the case.

On that opinion and the portion of the auditor's report quoted the decree is affirmed.

BEGGS v. JAMES HANLEY BREWING CO.

(Supreme Court of Rhode Island. Nov. 22, 1906.)

1. CONTRACTS—OFFER AND ACCEPTANCE.

Where plaintiffs by letter offered to install certain grates and blowers under defendant's boilers, and defendant wired acceptance, there was an express contract, excluding any contract by implication.

2. SALES—WARRANTIES.

Where plaintiffs by letter offered to install certain grates and blowers under defendant's boilers, saying that prompt acceptance would be necessary so that the apparatus could be installed the next Sunday, and that part of the work might have to go over till the next Sunday, but that there would be no delay in the operation of the plant, there was no warranty that after the apparatus was installed it would so operate that there would never be any delay in the operation of the plant because of it.

3. SAME.

Where a letter in which plaintiff offered to install certain grates and blowers under defendant's boilers stated that the apparatus was "adapted to the burning of fine anthracite fuel," there was no warranty that the apparatus would, with the use of such fuel, produce as much steam as the boilers previously produced, or enough steam to run defendant's plant; and hence in an action for the price of the apparatus, evidence that plaintiff knew that defendant desired the apparatus to produce as much steam as was produced before was not admissible.

4. SAME—IMPLIED WARRANTIES.

Where a known, described, and defined article is ordered of a manufacturer, although it is stated to be required by the purchaser for a particular purpose, still if the known, defined, and described thing be actually supplied, there is no implied warranty that it shall answer the particular purpose intended by the purchaser.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 43, Cent. Dig. Sales, § 773.]

5. SAME—ACTION FOR PRICE—TRUTH OF REPRESENTATIONS—EVIDENCE.

In an action for the price of certain grates and blowers installed by plaintiff under defendant's boilers, evidence held to show that the apparatus was "adapted to the burning of fine anthracite fuel," as represented.

Action by James Beggs against the James Hanley Brewing Company. On plaintiff's petition for a new trial after judgment for defendant. Petition granted.

Argued before DOUGLAS, C. J., and BLODGETT, JOHNSON, and PARKHURST, JJ.

Cooke & Angell, for plaintiff. Gorman, Egan & Gorman, for defendant.

JOHNSON, J. The plaintiff delivered and installed in the defendant's brewery certain grates and blowers on the contract made by the following proposition and acceptance:

"New York, May 25, 1903.

"James Hanley Brewing Co., 33 Jackson St., Providence, R. I.—Gentlemen: We have received communication from Mr. D. N. Rothermel stating that you desire a proposition for the installation of the McClave apparatus under your three boilers. We have also received communication from our Mr. Reyhner giving us definite furnace measurements, and we herewith submit you proposition for the above installation. We will furnish and place in position ready for use, exclusive of mason work, the McClave apparatus, consisting of the McClave Improved twin-lever grate and the McClave Argand blower, under each of your boilers, for the sum of $706.75—seven hundred sixty-six & 75/100 dollars net. The McClave system is adapted for the burning of fine anthracite fuel; workmanship and material first class in every particular. Should you wire us the acceptance of the above proposition, we will have the apparatus shipped the latter part of this week, so that same can be installed on Sunday. We must, however, have your prompt acceptance in order to do this, and it might be possible that part of the work would have to go over until the following Sunday; but there will be no delay in the operation of your plant. Hoping to receive your confirmation, which shall have our prompt attention, we are, Yours very truly, James Beggs & Co. [Signed] per Ellis."

"Providence, R. I., May 26, 1903.

"To James Beggs and Co., 9 Dey St., New York: Will accept your proposition for the McClave apparatus for our boilers according to your letter of the twenty-fifth. Ship at once. The James Hanley Brewing Co."

The apparatus was put in on May 31, June 7, and June 14, 1903, said dates falling on Sunday, and one set being installed on each date. Each set was used from the time it was installed, and several trials were made with fine anthracite coal, in mixtures of various proportions with soft coal. The apparatus remained under the boilers until about October 20, 1903, when it was taken out by the defendant on the ground that the contract had not been fulfilled by the plaintiff, because with the grates and burners in use, and burning fine anthracite coal, the boilers did not produce enough steam for the successful operation of the brewery. Suit was brought, and, jury trial being waived, the case was tried before a single justice in the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, and a decision was rendered for the defendant.

The plaintiff petitioned for a new trial on the grounds: (1) That the decision was against the law and the evidence and the weight thereof; (2) that the presiding justice erred in the admission of certain testimony; and (3) that he erred in certain rulings and decisions upon the construction of the contract. The presiding justice ruled at the trial, and embodied the same ruling in his decision, that the proposition and acceptance constitute an express contract, and that the contract thus being express, no contract is raised by implication. This ruling was correct.

1. He then proceeds, however, to say: "The proposition is to furnish and place in position ready for use under each of the three boilers of a brewing plant in active operation, without delay in the operation of the plant, the McClave apparatus, consisting of the McClave twin-lever grate and the McClave Argand blower, adapted for the burning of fine anthracite fuel, for a certain sum of money. This fairly may be said to mean that the new grates and blowers were to displace grates already burning fuel under said boilers in the operation of the plant, and that they were to continue such operation by the burning of fine anthracite fuel for which they are adapted; and furthermore, that there will be no delay in the operation of the plant. This assumes that when the McClave system is introduced, installed, and burning fine anthracite fuel under the boilers, there will be no delay in the operation of the plant, by the proper use of such apparatus and fuel. If it does not mean that, it simply means that they will not delay the operation of the plant while they are taking out the old system and installing the new one; but what advantage would that be if the new system itself proved to be a perpetual hindrance to the successful operation of the plant?" We think this construction is erroneous. The portion of the plaintiff's proposition to which the above language of the decision applies is as follows: "Should you wire us the acceptance of the above proposition, we will have the apparatus shipped the latter part of this week, so that same can be installed on Sunday. We must, however, have your prompt acceptance in order to do this, and it might be possible that part of the work would have to go over until the following Sunday, but there will be no delay in the operation of your plant." This clearly applies to the work of installing the apparatus, which it is proposed shall be done on Sunday, in order that the operation of the plant may not be delayed thereby. To construe this language as applying to the operation of the plant after the completion of the work of installing the McClave apparatus is, in our opinion, to give to the words in question a meaning which the context forbids. The presiding justice in his decision construed the statement in the proposition that "the McClave system is adapted for the burning of fine anthracite fuel" as follows: "I am of the opinion that the words 'adapted for the burning of fine anthracite fuel' in the contract is a warranty that the McClave system is suitable and fit to successfully burn such fuel under such boilers; that is, that it is capable of doing the work for which and in the place where it was installed." He made the same ruling at the trial. At the first glance this construction does not seem to give any added meaning to the words in question, as it may be said that, if the apparatus was adapted for the burning of fine anthracite fuel, it would be so adapted wherever it might be placed. In one sense this is true, as the apparatus could not lose its adaptability for the burning of the fuel named simply from the fact of being moved. It might, however, be placed in such a position and subjected to such conditions as to reduce or destroy its power of operation. It certainly might be placed under boilers where, although it did operate so as to successfully burn fine anthracite coal, the boilers might not produce a given amount of steam, to say nothing of producing the amount required for the successful operation of a brewery. If the decision in this regard does not so construe the words in question as to make the apparatus practically responsible for failure on the part of the boilers under which it was installed to produce the amount of steam required by the brewery, then it does not mean anything. Under this ruling, however, the presiding justice admitted evidence tending to prove that the contract between the parties was that, with the McClave apparatus installed under the boilers in the defendant's brewery, and burning fine anthracite fuel, such boilers would produce the amount of steam required for the successful operation of the brewery. James Hanley, a witness for the defendant, referring to an interview with George Ellis, general manager of plaintiff, testified: "Q. 25. I will ask you if, as a matter of fact, Mr. Hanley, you didn't communicate to him a knowledge of the horse power of your then boilers; did you not communicate that fact? A. I did. Q. 26. Did you not also inform him that the demands of your business at the brewery demanded all of the steam that you were then producing? A. I did. Q. 27. Did you make any statement to him that you were unwilling to change the grates that you were then using unless you were assured that the same results by the grate and blowers he proposed to sell you would produce a similar result? A. I did." He further testified: "Q. 58. Was there any reason for you not to continue the McClave system except for its incapacity to continue the results you anticipated? A. No, sir." The prospectus of the plaintiff was also admitted in evidence.

2. The admission of this line of testimony illustrates the construction given to the words in question by the presiding justice more clearly than the language of the decision. The admission of this testimony appears to rest upon the rule that, where a manufacturer or dealer contracts to supply an article which he manufactures or produces, or in which he deals, so that the buyer necessarily trusts to the judgment or skill of the manufacturer or dealer, there is in that case an implied warranty that it shall be reasonably fit for the purpose to which it is to be applied. The apparatus contracted for in this case, however, was shown by the evidence, without contradiction, to be well known and in use in other places. It was defined and described in the contract, and it is the rule that where a known, described, and defined article is ordered of a manufacturer, although it is stated to be required by the purchaser for a particular purpose, still if the known, defined, and described thing be actually supplied, there is no implied warranty that it shall answer the particular purpose intended by the purchaser. Benj. on Sales, § 657; 1 Parsons on Contracts, 589; Chanter v. Hopkins, 4 M. & W. 899; Seltz v. Brewer's Refrigerating Machine Co., 141 U. S. 510, 12 Sup. Ct. 46, 35 L. Ed. 837; Grand Avenue Hotel Co. v. Wharton, 79 Fed. 43, 24 C. C. A. 441. In Parsons on Contracts, supra, the rule is stated as follows: "If a thing be ordered of the manufacturer for a special purpose, and it be supplied and sold for that purpose, there is an implied warranty that it is fit for that purpose. This principle has been carried very far. It must, however, be limited to cases where a thing is ordered for a special purpose, and not applied to those where a special thing is ordered, although this be intended for a special purpose. For if the thing is itself specifically selected and ordered, then the purchaser takes upon himself the risk of its effecting its purpose. Nor can he rely upon statements and assertions made by the maker in circulars and advertisements concerning the article as a warranty that it will do what is stated." In Chanter v. Hopkins, supra, which is a leading case on the subject, the defendant wrote to the plaintiff, the patentee of an invention known as "Chanter's smoke-consuming furnace," the following order: "Send me your patent hopper and apparatus, to fit up my brewing copper with your smoke-consuming furnace. Patent right £15 15s., ironwork not to exceed £5 5s.; engineer's time fixing 7s. 6d. per day." The plaintiff accordingly put up on the defendant's premises one of his patent furnaces, but it was found not to be of any use for the purposes of the brewery, and was returned to the plaintiff. It was held (no fraud being imputed to the plaintiff) that there was not an implied warranty on his part that the furnace supplied should be fit for the purposes of the brewery, but that, the defendant having defined by the order the particular machine to be supplied, the plaintiff performed his part of the contract by supplying that machine.

The construction given to the words "adapted for the burning of fine anthracite fuel" was erroneous, and it follows that the line of testimony admitted under that construction was erroneously admitted. The plaintiff took numerous exceptions to the admission of this testimony, but, as they were only pressed generally, it is not necessary to consider them in detail. It is not disputed that the apparatus was the identical thing ordered, and was first-class in workmanship and material.

There remains for consideration the question of fact: Was the McClave apparatus adapted for the burning of fine anthracite fuel, as stated in the contract? The evidence showed that the McClave apparatus had been on the market for several years prior to the making of this contract, and that it was in use in several plants in Providence, one in Phillipdale, and one in Worcester, Mass.; that there were six sets at the Nicholson File Company, on which fine anthracite coal was burned exclusively for three or four weeks, and afterwards mixtures of said coal with soft coal were used, because such mixtures were found to be more economical, and produced more steam; that there were eight sets at the Glenlyon Dye Works, on which No. 3 buckwheat coal was used, and that the apparatus was satisfactory.

Alexander Ogg, a machinist there, testified: "Q. 12. Has the work been satisfactory that you obtain in the use of those grates and blowers, the time when you refer to when you were using this fine anthracite coal? A. It is satisfactory to us. When we started in with one, then went to three, then to five, and then to eight. That suited us." It appeared in evidence that at these works the Argand blower was removed about eight months after it was put in, and a system of exhausting from the dyehouse substituted for it. Mr. Ogg testified in regard to the change: "X. Q. 20. Why did you substitute this system you speak of for the McClave Argand blower? A. There was a double object. These fans had to blow to exhaust the steam, and the only place to put it was under the boiler, and we didn't want to use the live steam for that purpose." It was shown that the apparatus was started at the pumping station at the Hope reservoir in Providence June 22, 1903, and was tried first with No. 3 buckwheat, then with Nos. 2 and 3 and a little pea coal, and finally used with No. 2 buckwheat exclusively. Witnesses both for the plaintiff and defendant testified that fine anthracite coal mixed in various proportions with soft coal was used with the apparatus in defendant's brewery, and that fair steam was maintained in the morning in each case, but that it receded in the afternoon. The load at the brewery was shown to be very uneven. The evidence for the defendant showed that there was a particularly heavy draft on the steam when the brewer was boiling his beer.

Warren B. Lewis, an expert witness for the defendant, testified that he had made tests of the McClave apparatus in the Manufacturers' Building in Providence. On the question of the adaptability of the apparatus, he testified: "Q. 21. I will ask you whether the McClave system as installed and operated in the Manufacturers' Building is adapted to burn fine anthracite coal? A. Any grate will burn coal; any grate might burn fine anthracite coal. I should say that question would be limited entirely by the conditions imposed." As to the conditions in defendant's brewery, the same witness testified: "Q. 49. What were the conditions existing at the Hanley brewery which militated against the adaptability of the McClave system to this plant? A. What conditions did I ever find? Q. Yes. A. Why, I found on a test made there that the maximum demand upon the boilers was about 430 horse power, the boilers being rated at 320, and that would be, in my mind, a sufficient reason for saying that a steam blower could not maintain a high enough air pressure in the air pit to consume sufficient anthracite coal to give any such overload of capacity in the boiler." He further testified: "X. Q. 87. Suppose that the James Hanley brewing plant commenced in the morning with a certain variety of coal—fine anthracite coal, for instance—and was operated right through until say one or two o'clock in the afternoon, with a pressure of 80 or 85 pounds, from six in the morning until two in the afternoon, and then suddenly, within a few minutes, it dropped to 40 pounds; how would you explain that? A. If the violent pressure [depression?] was very sudden, I should think first that it was a sudden draft of steam from the boiler that caused it."

The testimony of the defendant's witnesses that, with the apparatus in use and burning mixtures of fine anthracite and soft coal, the boilers in the defendant's brewery did not maintain sufficient steam to meet all the demands of the brewery, does not militate against the adaptability of the apparatus for the burning of fine anthracite fuel. The defendant did not exact a warranty that, with the apparatus in use under the boilers at its brewery, the boilers would produce sufficient steam for the operation of the brewery. That the apparatus was adapted for the burning of fine anthracite fuel is shown, not simply by a preponderance of the evidence, but without contradiction. In fact, the evidence for the plaintiff on this question is corroborated by that introduced by the defendant. There was no testimony in the case that the combustion of coal in the apparatus was imperfect.

The decision was against the law and the evidence. Petition for new trial granted. Case remitted to the superior court, with directions to enter judgment for the plaintiff for $766.75, with interest from August 18, 1903, date of demand, and costs.

GALLIGAN v. WOONSOCKET ST. RY. CO. (two cases).

(Supreme Court of Rhode Island. Nov. 6, 1905.)

1. APPEAL — VERDICT — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Where plaintiff's evidence, if believed, is sufficient to support the verdict, it cannot be interfered with on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 3, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, §§ 3928-3934.]

2. DAMAGES—PERSONAL INJURIES—FRACTURED KNEECAP.

Twelve hundred dollars is not excessive damages for a fractured kneecap.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Damages, §§ 359, 377.]

3. PARENT AND CHILD—EARNINGS OF INFANT.

A father is presumptively entitled to the earnings of an infant son.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. Parent and Child, § 70.]

4. SAME—LOSS OF SERVICES—DAMAGES.

In an action by a father for injuries to his child, the measure of damages is the son's full earning capacity, and not merely the "net result" of his earnings.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Damages, § 240.]

5. NEW TRIAL—EXCESSIVE DAMAGES.

In an action by a father for injuries to his son, the fact that the verdict for $400 was $1.50 in excess of the damage proven did not require the granting of a new trial on the ground of excessiveness of the verdict.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. New Trial, § 153.]

6. SAME—DISREGARD OF INSTRUCTIONS.

The fact that in estimating damages the jury disregarded an erroneous instruction is not ground for a new trial, the verdict being justified by the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. New Trial, § 133.]

Separate actions by Peter Galligan and Peter A. Galligan against the Woonsocket Street Railway Company. On defendant's petition for a new trial after judgments for plaintiff in each case. Petitions denied.

Argued before DOUGLAS, C. J., and DUBOIS, JOHNSON, and PARKHURST, JJ.

George W. Greene, for plaintiff. John J. Heffernan and James H. Rickard, Jr., for defendant.

PARKHURST, J. These are two actions of trespass on the case for negligence, which were tried together at Woonsocket before a jury in February, 1905. The plaintiff Peter A. Galligan was a passenger on a car of the defendant which ran off the rails, and he was thrown from the running board, and struck upon a macadam roadway upon his hands and knees. He claimed to have fractured his right kneecap, and for that injury he brought suit. The plaintiff Peter Galligan, the father of Peter A. Galligan, who was a minor, sued for loss of his son's services and for the expenses of his son's illness. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff in each case, with damages of $1,200 for the son and $400 for the father. The defendant has petitioned for a new trial in each case, alleging in each that the verdict is contrary to the evidence, contrary to the law, and that the damages are excessive. In the father's case an additional ground is alleged, namely, that the court erred in refusing to instruct the jury as requested by the defendant. At the trial no defense was made upon the issues of negligence of the defendant and due care on the part of Peter A. Galligan, so these questions are not before the court.

We find in the record sufficient evidence, if believed by the jury, to support the verdicts in both cases.

1. In the case of Peter A. Galligan, the son, while there is a sharp conflict of testimony between plaintiff's and defendant's experts as to the nature and extent of the plaintiff's injuries, we cannot say, as a matter of law, that the verdict is against the evidence, or contrary to law or excessive. It is not disputed that the plaintiff was injured, and there is sufficient evidence adduced by the plaintiff as to the nature and extent of the injury to warrant the jury in believing that he was injured substantially as he claims. Both of the plaintiff's experts testify as to the facts as they saw or found them immediately after the accident. Only one of the defendant's experts testifies as to such facts as he saw or found them immediately after the accident. The other two experts for defendant testify only as to matters of opinion founded upon the history of the case and an examination made December 30, 1904, more than three and a half months after the accident. No attempt is made to impeach the plaintiff's physicians in the usual way, but counsel argue that they are unworthy of belief. This argument might well be addressed to the jury, whose peculiar province it is to judge of the credibility of witnesses; and the jury having, after hearing all this testimony, found a verdict for the plaintiff, this court cannot disturb it. If the jury believed (as they evidently did believe) that the plaintiff was injured to the extent claimed by him and his physicians, then the sum of $1,200 was not excessive.

In the case of Peter Galligan, the father, we find sufficient evidence to support the verdict of the jury for the plaintiff for the sum of $400. The plaintiff sues for the loss of services of his minor son.

2. The record shows affirmatively that the plaintiff is the father of Peter A. Galligan, and that Peter A. Galligan was a minor at the date of the accident, September 13, 1904, and that he became of full age July 11, 1905. Presumptively, the father was entitled to the wages of the son during his minority; and, if the defendant had intended to contest the right of the father to recover, it should have done so by evidence in defense, which it has not seen fit to offer. The record shows that the son, by reason of the injury which he sustained, would be unable to work for 258 working days, between September 13, 1904, and July 11, 1905, when he became of age, and was earning $1.25 per day when injured. There would be then a loss to the father of the sum of $322.50 in actual wages. Doctor's bills to the amount of $76 were proved to have been incurred, and although they appear to have been incurred at the request of the mother, we are of the opinion that she was presumptively acting as the agent of the father, and that he (the father) would be legally liable to pay them. This makes the damage proved $398.50. The jury gave a verdict for the plaintiff for the sum of $400. It is true that the trial judge instructed the jury that the father was entitled to recover only the net result of the son's labor, and appears to have charged further that, as proof was wanting as to this net result, the jury would "have to leave it absolutely out." This instruction was erroneous, because the father is not only entitled to the son's earnings, but he is bound also to support the son during minority. He was just as much bound to support the son after the accident as before, and there is no evidence that he did not. The measure of damages is therefore the total earning capacity of the son, which, as has been shown, was $322.50, plus the doctor's bills ($76), making a total of $398.50. As the verdict only exceeds this by the sum of $1.50, we cannot say that a new trial should be granted on the ground of excessive damages.

3. The fact that the jury disregarded an erroneous instruction, provided they found a verdict which was justified by the evidence, furnishes no ground for a new trial.

The petitions for new trials are denied, and the cases are remanded to the superior court, with instructions to enter judgments upon the verdicts.

OLDHAM v. HUSSEY.

(Supreme Court of Rhode Island. Nov. 10, 1905.)

ANIMALS—INJURY BY DOG—LIABILITY.

Gen. Laws 1896, c. 111, § 5, makes one harboring a dog liable for all damages done by the dog as if he were the owner, and section 3 makes the owner or keeper liable for all injuries to a person on the highway, irrespective of any knowledge of the owner or keeper. Held, that section 5 does not impose a liability for acts of a dog committed within the inclosure of the owner or keeper beyond his common-law liability, upon proof of knowledge of a vicious propensity.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 2, Cent. Dig. Animals, § 233.]

Action by John T. Oldham against Catherine Hussey. Heard on petition of defendant for a new trial. Petition granted.

Argued before DOUGLAS, C. J., and DU-BOIS, BLODGETT, JOHNSON, and PARK-HURST, JJ.

Lellan J. Tuck, for plaintiff. Hugh J. Carroll and Thomas F. Vance, for defendant.

PER CURIAM. The defendant's first, fifth, and sixth requests to charge were as follows: "(1) The court is requested to instruct the jury that the words of section 5 of chapter 111 of the General Laws of 1896, making persons keeping or harboring dogs liable in the same manner as the owners of, is to be construed as referring to section 8 of said chapter 111, and that such person keeping or harboring a dog that does damage is only liable under our statutes when the injury or damage is done outside of the premises or inclosure of such person; and further, that if the injury complained of was done in this case within the inclosure of the defendant, the plaintiff cannot recover unless the jury is satisfied that the defendant had knowledge or reasonable grounds to believe that the dog was vicious or liable to bite." "(5) The court is requested to charge the jury that if the defendant had no ground to apprehend that her dog would bite a person peacefully approaching or stepping out of the door of her home, within her inclosure, then the verdict must be for the defendant. (6) The court is requested to instruct the jury that the gravamen and essence of this case is that the defendant knowingly kept a vicious dog, and, if they are not satisfied that the defendant had such knowledge, the verdict must be for the defendant."

Sections 3 and 5 of chapter 111, referred to in the first request, are as follows:

"Sec. 3. If any dog shall kill, wound or worry, or assist in killing, wounding or worrying, any sheep, lamb, cattle, horse, hog, swine, fowl, or other domestic animal, belonging to or in the possession of any person, or shall assault or bite, or otherwise injure, any person while traveling the highway or out of the inclosure of the owner or keeper of such dog, the owner or keeper of such dog shall be liable to the person aggrieved as aforesaid, for all damage sustained, to be recovered in an action of trespass on the case, or in an action of trespass, with costs of suit; and if afterwards any such damage be done by such dog as aforesaid, the owner or keeper of such dog shall pay to the party aggrieved double the damage, to be recovered in manner as aforesaid; and an order shall be made by the court before whom such second recovery shall be had, for killing such dog, which order shall be executed by the officer who shall be charged with the execution thereof; and it shall not be necessary, in order to sustain any such action, to prove that the owner or keeper of such dog knew that such dog was accustomed to do such damage."

"Sec. 5. Every person keeping or harboring in his house or on his lands any dog, or knowingly suffering the same to be done by any other person, shall be liable for all damages done by said dog in the same manner as if he were the owner thereof."

These requests the court refused to grant, and the defendant's exceptions thereto must be sustained. The error of the trial justice seems to have been based upon his construction of section 5, c. 111, supra, which he instructed the jury imposed liability irrespective of such knowledge, as follows: "Our law says, gentlemen, that any party owning a dog. * * * 'Every person keeping or harboring in his house or on his lands any dog.' Then it goes on to say, 'or knowingly suffering the same to be done by any other person, shall be liable for all damages done by said dog in the same manner as if he were the owner thereof.' So it does not make any difference. If he keeps a dog, harbors it, or permits some other person to do it on his premises, he is responsible for whatever damage the dog commits." In Kelly v. Alderson, 19 R. I. 545, 37 Atl. 12, the court says: "The evident purpose of the statute is to give a remedy to a person who is bitten by a dog upon a highway, without reference to the defendant's knowledge of the viciousness of the dog; in other words, if the dog gets upon the highway, the owner is liable for whatever damage he may do. It is the risk which he takes from the fact that the dog is on the highway. The statute plainly extends the liability of an owner beyond his liability at common law, which was only for habits of which he had reason to know." And see, also, Peck v. Williams, 24 R. I. 583, 54 Atl. 381, 61 L. R. A. 351. This section of the statute imposes upon the keeper or harbinger of a dog the same liability as theretofore imposed upon the owner, without, however, further defining that liability, and does not impose a liability for acts of the dog committed within the inclosure of the owner or keeper of such dog beyond his common-law liability; that is to say, except upon proof of knowledge of a vicious propensity.

Petition for new trial granted, and case remitted to superior court for further proceedings.

BROWN v. CUMMINGS.

(Supreme Court of Rhode Island. Nov. 10, 1905.)

1. WORK AND LABOR—SERVICES BETWEEN PERSONS IN SUNDRY RELATIONS.

Services rendered by a stepdaughter to her stepfather, in whose family she was not living, are not presumed to be gratuitous.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 50, Cent. Dig. Work and Labor, § 19.]

2. SAME—ACTION FOR SERVICES—EVIDENCE—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

Where a stepdaughter sued for services rendered to her stepfather at his request, the question whether the circumstances were such as to show a reasonable expectation that the services would be paid for should have been submitted to the jury; though the stepdaughter was a member of the stepfather's family at the time the services were rendered.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 50, Cent. Dig. Work and Labor, § 61.]

Action by Hortense M. Brown against Eugene D. Cummings, as administrator. On plaintiff's petition for new trial. Petition granted.

Argued before DOUGLAS, C. J., and DUBOIS, JOHNSON, and PARKHURST, JJ.

Samuel W. K. Allen, for plaintiff. Albert D. Bean, for defendant.

PER CURIAM. The plaintiff brought suit to recover compensation for services rendered in nursing her stepfather, the defendant's intestate, during his last sickness, at his special request, when she was not a member of his family, but without any express promise to pay for the same. At the conclusion of the testimony for the plaintiff, the court granted the defendant's motion for a nonsuit, upon the ground that the relationship of the plaintiff to the deceased precluded her recovery in the action, without proof of an express and definite promise of the deceased to pay for her service.

In the absence of any evidence, the presumption arises that services rendered between members of the same family are gratuitous, but this presumption yields to evidence; so that, "if the circumstances in which the services are rendered are such as to show a reasonable and proper expectation that compensation is to be made, the plaintiff will be entitled to recover." Fuller v. Mowry, 18 R. I. 426, 28 Atl. 607. But the doctrine of the presumption is, by its terms, limited to services rendered between members of the same family. If the persons are related, but not living together, this doctrine has no application. Page, Contracts, § 783; Williams v. Williams, 114 Wis. 79, 89 N. W. 835. If the plaintiff was not a member of the family of the defendant's intestate during the time the services in suit were being rendered, she was not subject to the rule invoked by the court, and if she was a member of his family at that time, then the circumstances in which the services were rendered should have been submitted to the consideration of the jury, for their determination as to whether they do or do not show a reasonable and proper expectation that compensation was to be made. It follows that the court erred in granting the nonsuit.

Plaintiff's petition for a new trial granted, and case remitted to the superior court for further proceedings.

DAME v. WOODS.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire. Belknap. Nov. 7, 1905.)

1. SUBMISSION OF CONTROVERSY — APPEAL — AGREED CASE — AMENDMENT — JURISDICTION.

Where a case is submitted on appeal on an agreed statement of facts, the court has no jurisdiction to amend the agreed case to prevent ambiguity, but can only decline to consider the questions of law involved until the facts are clearly presented.

2. SAME.

Where the Supreme Court considered an appeal, believing that it was based on facts found and not on an agreed case, so that the facts could not be made more explicit without a further agreement, the only remedy of the defeated party was to apply to the superior court to be relieved from his agreement and for a trial of the questions of fact, of which the superior court had sole jurisdiction.

3. SAME — AGREED CASE — SETTING ASIDE.

An application to the trial court of a party to an agreed case submitted to the Supreme Court to be relieved from his agreement and for a trial of the questions of fact is to be considered under the rules of law applicable to petitions for a new trial.

On rehearing, after an amendment of the case showing that the parties agreed on the facts without a hearing on the merits. Motion denied.

For former opinion, see 73 N. H. 222, 60 Atl. 744.

George B. Cox and Walter S. Peaslee, for plaintiff. Jewett & Plummer, for defendant.

CHASE, J. The original case purported to be transferred upon a finding of facts by the superior court; and this court, so understanding it, made the suggestion in the opinion relating to an amendment of the case (73 N. H. 224, 60 Atl. 744), in accordance with the well-established practice when there is ambiguity in the record, which can be readily cured without a new trial. It now appears that the facts were not found by the court, but were agreed to by the parties. This change in the case renders the suggestion relating to an amendment inappropriate, as the court does not have authority to amend an agreed case. Bell v. Twilight, 17 N. H. 528. The only course open to the court for removing ambiguity in such a case is to decline to consider the questions of law until the facts involved in them are fully and clearly presented. Kaulbach v. Kaulbach, 63 N. H. 615; Preston v. Cutter, 63 N. H. 616; Sargent Invalid Furniture Co. v. Sargent, 65 N. H. 672, 23 Atl. 630; State v. Lewis, 66 N. H. 623, 32 Atl. 151; Adams v. Varney, 67 N. H. 596, 29 Atl. 406; Martin v. Livingston, 68 N. H. 562, 39 Atl. 432; Laton v. Balcom, 70 N. H. 635, 50 Atl. 100; Morse v. Morse, 71 N. H. 622, 53 Atl. 1124. If the court had understood that the facts were agreed to by the parties, and consequently could not be made fuller and more explicit without a further agreement, they might have thought that justice required them to avail themselves of this privilege. But having considered and decided the questions, this course is not now open. The only course left to the plaintiff is to apply to the superior court to be relieved from his agreement and for a trial of the questions of fact (Heywood v. Wingate, 14 N. H. 73; Bell v. Twilight, 17 N. H. 528; Wells v. Iron Co., 48 N. H. 491, 526; Id., 50 N. H. 85, 89; Beals v. Hill, 58 N. H. 61), a matter of which that court alone has jurisdiction. If such application is made, it is to be considered, of course, under the rules of law applicable to petitions for a new trial. The case emphasizes the necessity of a definite statement in transferred cases of the manner in which the facts are settled. The court are still divided upon the main question in the case, as stated in 73 N. H. 224, 60 Atl. 744.

Motion denied. All concurred.

LAMPREY v. H. P. HOOD & SONS.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire. Rockingham. Nov. 7, 1905.)

1. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION—TERMINATION OF PROSECUTION—MODE—NOLLE PROSEQUI—DEFENDANT'S CONSENT.

Where the entry of a nolle prosequi was procured by accused, or made in consequence of a compromise to which he was a party, it was not such a termination as to enable him to maintain an action for malicious prosecution. [Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 33, Cent. Dig. Malicious Prosecution, § 74.]

2. SAME—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action for malicious prosecution, evidence held to warrant a finding that the entry of a nolle prosequi in the prosecution was the act of the state solicitor, induced solely by the advice of the court as to the law.

3. SAME—ADMISSIBILITY—DOCKET ENTRIES IN PROSECUTION.

In an action for malicious prosecution, the docket entries in the prosecution are admissible in evidence.

Transferred from Superior Court.

Action for malicious prosecution. Verdict for plaintiff, and case transferred to the Supreme Court on exceptions. Exceptions overruled.

The malicious prosecution alleged was an indictment found by the grand jury against the plaintiff for the use of milk cans belonging to the defendants and duly registered by them, in violation of the provisions of chapter 120, p. 120, Laws 1903. A jury was impaneled to try the indictment. After the state had introduced some evidence, a conference was had between the presiding justice and the solicitor concerning the law under which the indictment was found, as a result of which the solicitor entered a nolle prosequi in the case. The plaintiff's counsel was present at the conference, and did not object to the entry or say anything in reference to it. The solicitor testified that "the trial got to the point where the presiding judge announced his interpretation of what the law meant, and his interpretation of it was such that I told him that the state could not prove a condition of things that he said must be shown under the law." The defendants' motions for a nonsuit and for an order directing a verdict in their favor were denied, subject to exception. In the absence of an extended record of the state case, the docket entries of the clerk were received in evidence, subject to the defendants' exception.

Page & Bartlett and Ernest L. Guptill, for plaintiff. G. K. & B. T. Bartlett and Samuel W. Emery, for defendants.

CHASE, J. The exceptions to the denials of the defendants' motions for an order of nonsuit and an order directing a verdict in their favor raise the question whether the entry by the solicitor of a nolle prosequi in the state case was, under the circumstances, a sufficient termination of the case in the plaintiff's favor to enable him to maintain this action. The answer to this question depends upon the answer to the further question whether the entry was procured by the plaintiff or was made in consequence of a compromise to which he was a party. If it was caused in either of these ways, it was not such a termination of the case as will support this action; but, if it was not so caused, it will support the action. Woodman v. Prescott, 66 N. H. 375, 22 Atl. 456. The latter is a pure question of fact. The circumstances under which the entry was made do not conclusively show that it was procured by the plaintiff, or was occasioned by a compromise to which he was a party. There was evidence from which the jury could find that the entry was the act of the solicitor, induced solely by the advice of the court as to the law governing the case. The defendants' motions were properly denied.

The exception to the admission of the docket entries in the former case as evidence is not insisted upon. State v. Cox, 69 N. H. 246, 41 Atl. 862.

Exceptions overruled. All concurred.

HALLWOOD CASH REGISTER CO. v. ROLLINS.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire. Strafford. Nov. 7, 1905.)

1. TRIAL—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE—REBUTTAL.

Where, in an action for the price of a cash register, defendant proved a conversation with plaintiff's agent in regard to the machine before defendant opened his place of business, as bearing on the question of fraud and rescission, whereupon the agent testified that the conversation occurred after the saloon was opened, and stated that there was money in the register and that a customer bought a cigar at the time, defendant could not, either in rebuttal or sur-rebuttal, testify that there was no money in the register at that time and that no customer bought a cigar there.

2. SAME.

Where, in an action for the price of a cash register, after defendant had rested, plaintiff introduced evidence that a certain conversation with plaintiff's agent occurred in the afternoon, defendant could not, as of right, show in rebuttal the time of day such conversation occurred; the witness having already testified on cross-examination that it was early in the morning.

3. SAME—MISCONDUCT OF COUNSEL.

Where, in an action for the price of a cash register, defendant claimed that it had been sold under fraudulent representations, it was not error for plaintiff's counsel in argument to operate the machine and to comment on the manner in which defendant tried to operate it.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trial, § 283.]

Exceptions from Superior Court.

Action by the Hallwood Cash Register Company against Cyrus Rollins. A verdict was rendered in favor of plaintiff, and the case was transferred to the Supreme Court on defendant's exceptions. Exceptions overruled.

The plaintiff introduced evidence of a written contract of sale, and rested. The defendant introduced evidence tending to show that he had certain talks with the plaintiff's agent in regard to the machine before he opened his place of business, as bearing upon the question of fraud and rescission. In rebuttal, the agent testified that the talks were after the saloon was opened, that there was money in the register, and that a customer bought a cigar. The defendant then offered evidence that there was no money in the register at the time or times referred to, and that no one bought a cigar there as the agent testified. The evidence was excluded, subject to exception. After the defendant rested, the plaintiff introduced evidence tending to prove that the conversation with the plaintiff's agent occurred in the afternoon. The defendant then offered to show the time of day it occurred, by a witness who had already testified on cross-examination that it was early in the morning. The evidence was excluded, and the defendant excepted. During the trial the machine was operated by the plaintiff's agent and by the defendant. In his argument to the jury the plaintiff's counsel operated the machine and commented upon the manner in which the defendant tried to operate it. To this the defendant excepted.

Mitchell & Foster, John Kivel, and George T. Hughes, for plaintiff. William S. Pierce and Orrin R. Fairfield, for defendant.

WALKER, J. It appears that at the trial it was material to determine whether the defendant had begun doing business in his saloon when the plaintiff's agent called on him, and whether he was then using the cash register. Evidence of the existence of these facts had some tendency to show that the defendant was satisfied with his purchase of the register and had not been defrauded by the plaintiff, as he claimed, and it was received in answer to the defendant's evidence upon the issue of fraud. It did not constitute a new substantive position on the part of the plaintiff, but merely tended to deny the defendant's claim of fraud. The proffered evidence of the defendant, in denial of the plaintiff's evidence was not, therefore, strictly in rebuttal or surrebuttal, and the defendant had no absolute right to its reception at that stage of the trial. Supreme Court Rule No. 50, 56 N. H. 589; Supreme Court Rule No. 45, 71 N. H. 683; Gerrish v. Whitfield, 72 N. H. 222, 55 Atl. 551. The exclusion of the evidence under the circumstances presents no error of law. King v. Bates, 57 N. H. 446, 448. For similar reasons the defendant was not entitled as a matter of legal right to introduce further evidence to show the time of day the plaintiff's agent called on him.

The remarks of the plaintiff's counsel in his argument to the jury and his operation of the machine, authorizing the conclusion that the plaintiff did not defraud defendant, were, so far as appears from the case, based upon the evidence, and were legitimate.

Exceptions overruled. All concurred.

KING v. AMERICAN ELECTRIC VEHICLE CO.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Dec. 12, 1905.)

TAXATION—CORPORATIONS—FRANCHISE TAX—EXEMPTION.

Under P. L. 1901, p. 81, making every corporation liable to the franchise tax unless its annual return shows that it is within the exempted class, payment of such a tax must be made, no return having been made, though prior to the year for which it was assessed all the property of the corporation, which was insolvent, had been converted into cash by its receiver, and no business was thereafter carried on by it.

Suit by George F. King against the American Electric Vehicle Company. Heard on petition of the receivers of defendant for directions as to payment of franchise tax. Payment directed.

John R. Hardin, for petitioner. Robert H. McCarter, Atty. Gen., for the State.

BERGEN, V. C. The defendant company was organized under the laws of this state, and from the date of its incorporation was a manufacturing company with at least 50 per cent. of its capital stock invested in a manufacturing business carried on within this state. It was incorporated in 1899, and each year thereafter, to and including the year 1902, having made to the state board of assessors a proper return, no franchise tax was assessed against the corporation. On the 23d day of September, 1902, the corporation, under proceedings taken in this cause, was adjudged to be insolvent, and Charles J. Roe, the petitioner, was appointed receiver in the manner provided by the general corporation act of this state. Before the close of the year 1902, the petitioner, as receiver, had converted all of the property of the insolvent corporation into cash, and thereafter no business of any kind was carried on by said corporation or by the petitioner as its receiver in its behalf, yet no steps have been taken to procure the legal dissolution of the company, so that its corporate existence is still preserved. No return for the purposes of assessment for the franchise tax was made either by the corporation or by the receiver for it, for the year 1903, in the absence of which the state board of assessors levied an annual license fee or franchise tax against the corporation for that year, and, the state now demanding its payment, the petitioner requests the direction of this court as to his duty in the premises. It is admitted that the funds in the receiver's hands are insufficient to pay the debts of the corporation; the amount of the fund being $14,042.97, which will be reduced to the extent of $4,000 if the franchise tax be directed paid, while the amount of the debts proven, including preferred claims, is $28,076.56. The customary blank form for the making of a return for the purposes of assessing the state franchise tax for the year 1903 was mailed by the state board to the registered New Jersey agent of the defendant corporation; the form was mailed to him in March, 1903, at which time he was absent from the country and did not return until the month of June of that year; and for that, or some reason not known, the blank return never came under his notice. No form for a return for the purposes of such an assessment was sent to the petitioner, nor did one reach him from any source, and no appeal from such assessment was ever taken by the receiver or the corporation.

The claim which the receiver now makes on behalf of the creditors of this insolvent corporation is that, as it was a manufacturing corporation, the assessment would not have been made if a proper return of the character of the business of the corporation, and the fact of its insolvency, had been made to the state board; that the policy of the lawmaking power of the state is in favor of fostering manufacturing companies; and that the omission to make the return, upon which the state board allows the exemption, should not be permitted to overthrow this beneficent policy. With a desire to give effect to this liberal intention, I have sought for some logical reason upon which to rest a conclusion favorable to the claim of the petitioner, but have not been able to do so. The act under which franchise taxes are levied, as amended (P. L. 1901, p. 31), enacts that all corporations, other than those which are subject to the payment of a state franchise tax based upon gross receipts, shall make an annual return to the state board, which shall contain the amount of the capital stock of such corporation issued and outstanding on the 1st day of January preceding the making of said return; which shall be made on or before the first Tuesday in May in each year, and then declares that all corporations shall pay an annual license fee or franchise tax on such capital stock, in the manner and to the extent stated in the act. The act further provides that it shall not apply to certain corporations, of which a manufacturing company is one, where at least 50 per cent. of its capital stock issued and outstanding is invested in that business carried on within this state, provided that the corporation entitled to the exemption shall have stated in its return where the manufacturing establishment is located, the character of the goods manufactured, the total amount of its capital stock, and the amount of capital stock actually employed in New Jersey in carrying on such manufacturing business. It thus appears that all corporations are liable to the tax, unless its annual return shall disclose that it is within the exempted class.

It has been determined by our Court of Errors and Appeals that the assessment to be made against the franchise of a company incorporated under the laws of this state is an arbitrary imposition laid without regard to the value of its property, or its franchises, or whether it exercises the latter or not, and is imposed solely as a condition of its continued existence, and that without regard to solvency or insolvency. In re U. S. Car. Co., 60 N. J. Eq. 514, 43 Atl. 673. The defendant company had a corporate existence in 1903, it made no return and took no steps to put itself in a position to have the benefit of the proviso contained in the act of 1901, and, so far as the state board of assessors had knowledge, it fell within the class described in the act as "all corporations incorporated under the laws of this state." In Hardin v. Morgan et al. (N. J. Sup.) 57 Atl. 155, and affirmed by the court of last resort, 71 N. J. Law, 342, 61 Atl. 1118, it was adjudged that: "Four things at least are now necessary to secure exemption from the state franchise tax: First, that at least 50 per cent. of the capital stock of the company issued and outstanding on January 1st next, preceding the annual return, shall be invested in manufacturing carried on within this state; second, that the annual return to the state board of assessors shall state where the manufacturing is located, and the character of the goods manufactured. * * * The right to exemption is a matter of grace which the statute confers upon the compliance with its requirements. It is essential to secure the exemption that it shall be applied for within the time and in the manner pointed out by the statute; otherwise the exemption is lost." In the case just cited, the company was a manufacturing corporation and would have been entitled to the exemption if the proper return had been made.

As in the U. S. Car. Co. Case, supra, it was held that neither the levying of the assessment after the appointment of the receiver, nor the fact of insolvency, in any way affected the right of the state to the franchise tax so long as the company continued in existence, and as it has also been determined in Hardin v. Morgan et al., supra, that the making of the return is a prerequisite to exemption, I am of the opinion that the cases last cited must control the one under consideration, and that, as this corporation was subject to a franchise tax or license fee unless it made the return required by law, the assessment was properly levied, and the receiver will be so advised.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 16, 1905.)

1. PLEADING—COPY OF INSTRUMENT ANNEXED—VARIANCE.

Where, in an action for breach of covenants in a deed, there is a variance between the allegations in the declaration and a copy of the deed annexed thereto and made a part thereof as to what covenants the deed contains, the court will, on determining what the covenants are, consider the copy of the deed as setting them forth correctly; Prac. Act, § 119 (P. L. 1903, p. 570), providing that a copy of a writing annexed to a pleading shall cure any defect therein.

2. COVENANTS — WARRANTY — ACTIONS FOR BREACH—DECLARATION—SUFFICIENCY.

A declaration, in an action for breach of a covenant in a deed, which alleges the eviction of the grantee by a person unnamed who claimed a right of possession under a decree adjudging void a deed to the grantor and on which the grantee's title rests, and which shows that the grantor covenanted to defend title against the claims of the grantor, his heirs, and all persons "lawfully claiming * * * under him," states no cause of action.

Action by Walter B. Dick against Jane D. McPherson and another, as executors of John McPherson, deceased. On demurrer to declaration. Judgment for defendant.

Argued June Term, 1905, before GUMMERE, C. J., and FORT, PITNEY, and REED, JJ.

Thompson & Cole, for demurrant.

GUMMERE, C. J. The plaintiff brought an action on contract against the defendants, as executors of John McPherson, deceased, to recover damages for breach of certain covenants alleged to be contained in a deed of conveyance made by McPherson to the plaintiff, and which relate to the possession and use by the plaintiff of the premises embraced in the conveyance. The breach assigned is the eviction of the plaintiff by some person unnamed, who claimed a right of possession under a decree of the Court of Chancery which adjudged to be void and of no effect a deed made by the riparian commissioners to McPherson for the premises in question, and upon which the latter's title rested. The declaration recites the covenants alleged to have been broken, and then refers to and makes a part of the pleading a copy of the deed from McPherson to the plaintiff, which is thereto annexed.

An inspection of the recitals in the declaration and of the instrument annexed discloses a variance in the language of the covenants. In ascertaining, therefore, what covenants were actually entered into by the grantor named in the conveyance, the copy of the deed must be considered as accurately setting them forth. Prac. Act (Revision of 1903, P. L. 1903, p. 570) § 119. The only covenant in the deed relating to the possession and use of the premises by the plaintiff, which is found in the copy annexed to the declaration, is in these words: "And the said John McPherson, for himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators, doth covenant, grant, and agree to and with the party of the second part [the plaintiff], his heirs and assigns, that he, the said John McPherson, his heirs, all and singular the hereditaments and premises, hereinabove described and granted, with the appurtenances, unto the said party of the second part, his heirs and assigns, against him, the said John McPherson, his heirs, and against all and every other person or persons whomsoever lawfully claiming or to claim the same, or any part thereof, by, from, through, or under him, shall and will warrant and forever defend." It is obvious that the eviction of which the plaintiff complains was not necessarily an eviction either by McPherson himself, or his heirs, or any one claiming by, from, through, or under him. For aught that appears to the contrary, it may have been by a person claiming possession under a paramount title. In fact, this is the fair inference to be drawn from the averment of the declaration, irrespective of the elementary rule that upon a demurrer every allegation in a pleading is to be taken most strongly against him who makes it. An eviction under a paramount title does not constitute a breach of a covenant such as that contained in the plaintiff's deed. Woodhouse v. Jenkins, 9 Bing. 431.

The defendant is entitled to judgment on the demurrer.

FARR v. HAUENSTEIN et al.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Nov. 16, 1905.)

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE — OWNERSHIP OF PROPERTY.

Money used by a husband in paying taxes, interest on mortgage, and other incumbrances on the property of his wife held, under the evidence, his money, and not intrusted to him by another for that purpose, so that his creditors have a lien on such property to the extent of payments made.

Action by John C. Farr, Jr., against Theresa Hauenstein and another. Heard on application to settle decree. Decree for plaintiff.

Leon Abbett, for complainant. Jas. F. Minturn, for defendants.

GARRISON, V. C. The issues made by the pleadings in this suit were determined on the 29th of June, 1905, and the views of the court concerning the same will be found reported in 61 Atl. 147. It was decided that "with respect to the expenditures made by the husband of his own money in the payment of taxes, interest on the mortgage, and other incumbrances on this property * * * the complainant, as a creditor, has a right to have a charge against the property for such sums." The case was referred to a master to ascertain the moneys of the husband expended to pay taxes, interest on mortgage, etc., on this property. The master took the testimony, and has returned the same. The master did not definitely report with respect to the ownership of the moneys found by him to have been paid by Louis C. Hauenstein, the husband, on account of the interest, taxes, etc., due upon the property. A further order was then made referring the cause back to the master for a definite finding upon this point. The master was unable to make such definite finding because the testimony before him was mainly with respect to the fact of payment, while the testimony which had been previously taken before the court concerned the source of the moneys. The master properly did not consider the testimony which had been taken before the court, and was not able, from the testimony taken before him, to definitely report upon the ownership of the moneys. The matter was then brought before the court for final determination upon an application to settle the decree upon the pleadings and proofs, including the proofs taken before the master.

From such proofs I find the facts to be that since the date of the judgment Louis C. Hauenstein, Sr., has paid interest on the mortgage upon the property in question aggregating $1,475, and taxes and assessments upon the same property within the same period aggregating $697.29. The amount due upon the judgment held by the complainant is $1,292.22, with interest thereon from the 7th day of August, 1890. In the testimony of the defendant Louis C. Hauenstein it clearly appears that he obtained the money to make these payments either from his own funds—that is to say, money earned by himself—or from moneys borrowed by him from his son Louis. This is corroborated by the testimony of his son Louis, who testifies that he helped his father out by loaning him money, and that he advanced money to his father. The moneys which Louis C. Hauenstein, Sr., the husband, paid on account of his wife's property for taxes and interest were either his own moneys, earned by himself, or were moneys borrowed by him. He seeks to create the impression that these moneys were either moneys of a partnership composed of himself and his son Louis or were moneys of his son Louis, Jr., directly contributed by his son, through him, as a mere agent, for the purpose of paying these liens or incumbrances against the property, the title to which was in the name of Theresa Hauenstein. With respect to the alleged partnership between the father and son, the proofs show that, while the father carried on business under the name of Louis C. Hauenstein & Co., it was, as he termed it, a mere family arrangement, there being no shares, and was, I think it clearly appears, a mere guise under which the father did business. The son's testimony is that his father wanted to start in the business, and he set him up in it. He clearly states that he was not to get any salary or draw anything from the business; and while, as between him and his father, he may have some rights as a partner, it nowhere appears that the moneys which were used to pay the taxes and the interest were moneys of this alleged partnership. In fact, the son directly testifies that he has advanced his father, by way of loan, money in the neighborhood of $1,700, and negatives any idea that he was himself paying any taxes or other items through his father as an agent.

I therefore reach the conclusion that the moneys which Louis C. Hauenstein, Sr., paid for interest on the mortgage and for taxes and assessments upon the property were his moneys, and that to the extent of the aggregate of such payments the complainant has a lien against the property standing in the name of Theresa Hauenstein; and that, unless within 30 days after the service upon the defendants of a copy of the decree made in this suit they pay to the complainant the amount specified in said decree, the property in question may be sold to raise and pay the said sum.

HARPER v. ESSEX COUNTY PARK COMMISSION.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 16, 1905.)

1. PLEADING—ACTION ON CONTRACT—PROFEET.

Formal profeet of the contract, in an action thereon, is not necessary, where a copy thereof is annexed to the declaration, and referred to therein as so annexed; Prac. Act, § 119 (P. L. 1903, p. 570), making this part of the declaration.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 39, Cent. Dig. Pleading, § 914.]

2. SAME—INDEFINITENESS—DEMURRER.

It is not ground for demurrer, but for motion to strike out, that a count of a declaration does not specify with sufficient particularity the alleged breaches of contract.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 39, Cent. Dig. Pleading, §§ 409, 504.]

Action by Andrew Harper against the Essex County Park Commission. Heard on demurrer to first count of declaration. Judgment for plaintiff.

Argued June term, 1905, before GUMMERE, C. J., and FORT, PITNEY, and REED, JJ.

Hugh B. Reed, for plaintiff. Alonzo Church, for defendant.

GUMMERE, C. J. This is an action upon contract. The first ground of demurrer is that the count attacked is in assumpsit when it should be in covenant, for the reason that the agreement sued upon (a copy of which is annexed to the declaration, and referred to in the body of the pleading as so annexed) is under seal. An inspection of the copy, however, shows that this ground of demurrer is based upon a misapprehension. Although the agreement recites, in its conclusion, that the Essex County Park Commission has caused its corporate seal to be thereto affixed, and that the plaintiff has thereunto set his seal, this recital is not borne out by the fact. Neither the seal of the commission nor of the plaintiff is attached to the agreement.

The second ground of demurrer is that the plaintiff has failed to make profert of the contract sued upon. But formal profert is not necessary, even in an action upon a contract under seal, when a copy of the writing is annexed to the declaration, and referred to in the body of the pleading as so annexed. By force of section 119 of the practice act (P. L. 1903, p. 570) the effect of such annexation and reference is to make the writing just as much a part of the declaration as if it had been precisely set forth therein. Mershon v. Williams, 63 N. J. Law, 402, 44 Atl. 211.

The third ground of demurrer is that the count does not specify, with sufficient particularity, the breaches of the agreement alleged to have been committed by the defendant. But, assuming this to be so, such a defect is not within the reach of a general demurrer. It could only be taken advantage of, under the old practice, by special demurrer; and since the abolition of that pleading by statute it can only be dealt with on a motion to strike out the count.

The plaintiff is entitled to judgment on the demurrer.

HILL et al. v. HILL et al.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Nov. 17, 1905.)

EXECUTORS — ACCOUNTING — NEGLIGENCE — LACHES.

Complainants, as legatees of their father, charged defendants, as executors of his will, as if both defendants were alive, with having received $3,000 as the proceeds of his estate, and showed where in the ordinary course of business they ought to have received $400 from another source, and called on them to account. One of the defendants answered by showing that his coexecutor received all the money from the proceeds of the estate proper, and died a year thereafter, and with regard to the $400 disavowed all knowledge thereof, and stated that he paid no attention to the management of the estate and executing the will, either in the lifetime of his coexecutor, who, complainants knew, handled the money, and who had been dead 17 years, or afterwards, and that he was never called on to do anything in the premises till the filing of the bill, 17 years after the right of complainants to an accounting accrued. Held that, while the answer admitted culpable negligence, the cause of action was for mere nonfeasance, and was barred by laches.

Suit by Rhoda Hill and others against Samuel Hill, executor of James Hill, deceased, and others. Final hearing on bill and the answer of said Samuel Hill. Bill dismissed.

Freeman Woodbridge, for complainants. Frederick P. Pearse, for answering defendant.

PITNEY, V. C. The object of the suit is to hold the answering defendant liable as surviving executor of the will of the father of all the parties except Hoffman. The ground of the complainants' (who are legatees under a will) claim as finally developed is negligence on the part of the defendant. One of the answers to that claim is acquiescence and laches on the part of the complainants of such a character and degree as to bar them in their relief. The cause being heard on bill and answer, the statements of fact in the answer must be taken as true. I feel constrained to say that the case is not presented in a satisfactory shape. One cannot avoid the suspicion that the complainants may have a much better case than is stated by their bill, and that the defendant may have a much better case than is stated in his answer. No answer has been put in by Hoffman, who is charged as administrator cum testamento annexo of Samuel Hill, deceased, who was the grandfather of all the parties except Hoffman. The estate which is sought to be recovered consists (1) of the estate proper of James Hill, the father, which came to the hands of Jehu Hill, now deceased, as coexecutor with the defendant Samuel of James Hill, deceased, and (2) the share which James Hill was entitled to in the estate of his father, Samuel Hill, deceased, which came into the possession of the defendant Hoffman.

The facts are that James Hill, of Middlesex county, died December 23, 1885, testate of a will which, after giving several small legacies and providing for his widow, directed the residue of his estate to be equally divided between his five children, namely, the three complainants and the defendants Samuel and Jehu Hill. He appointed his brother Jehu (since deceased) and his son Samuel, the answering defendant, his executors. Those executors, in January, 1886, filed an inventory of personal estate amounting to $1,107.10. Subsequently, in March of the same year, they sold two parcels of real estate under a power in the will. One parcel sold for $1,575.55 and the other for $718.72. The defendant Samuel joined in these deeds, but never received any of the proceeds; the whole having been taken by his coexecutor, Jehu Hill, the brother of the testator. No accounting was ever made by either Jehu Hill, the executor, or by the defendant Samuel Hill. The bill alleges that one of the complainants has received $100 on account of a legacy of $150 given to her by her father's will, and that another one has received a like sum on account of her legacy of an equal amount. The bill makes no allegation as to the character of the dealings of the executors with the money of the estate as aforesaid received, but assumes that upon mere joining in the inventory by the answering defendant and by a like joining in the conveyances of real estate, he became absolutely at once bound to account for the whole, and prays such an accounting. In fact, the bill proceeds against Samuel Hill and his uncle, Jehu, as executors, as if each were alive, and takes no notice of the death of Jehu, which occurred, according to the answer, on the 14th of April, 1887, a little more than a year after the sale of the lands. It alleges no waste of the estate by either executor, nor any special neglect by either. It does not anticipate any defense which may be set up by the defendants, nor does it state the least reason why the complainants have rested for so many years without calling the defendants to account.

The executors were liable to account early in the year 1887. The bill was filed July 6, 1904, at least 17 years after the right accrued. The only indication of the respective ages of the children, found in the bill, is the order in which they are named, as follows: Mrs. Hayward, named as such; Mrs. Reed, named as Mary C. Hill; Rhoda Hill (the complainants); Samuel Hill; and Jehu Hill. The answer of Samuel shows that at the death of his father he was a little over 21 years old. Then, after stating the death of his uncle, Jehu, the defendant says: "Possibly by virtue of the extreme youth of this defendant" he never had anything to do with the actual control and management of said estate, and never had any of the moneys of said estate, which was wholly controlled by the said Jehu Hill, "all of which was fully known, and has been fully known for years, to the three above-named complainants." The answer proceeds to state that, since the death of Jehu, he (Samuel) never has had any of the moneys of the estate of said deceased; none ever having come to the defendant's hands, the defendant not knowing there was any estate to settle, supposing the said estate had long ago been settled and disposed of by his coexecutor.

I feel constrained to say that this section of the answer, which I have paraphrased, seems to me to admit gross negligence on the part of the answering defendant. His coexecutor died about 13 months after over $3,000 of the estate had come to his hands, in which he, the answering defendant, was interested, to the extent of a legacy of $200 and a share in the residue equal with his sisters and brother. In admitting in his answer the joining in the deeds for the two parcels of land, he says as to both that he knew nothing of the circumstances of the sale and received none of the moneys, except that he received $100 on account of his legacy, and (after dealing with the interest of his father in the estate of his grandfather, presently to be mentioned) he closes his answer with this allegation: "In conclusion, he says that he knows nothing whatever concerning the estate of his father, never having managed or directed the same, or any of the moneys, with the exception of $100, a part of his legacy; but this defendant believes, charges and insists that upon a settlement of the estate of Jehu Hill, his coexecutor, by his executors, it will be shown that there are no moneys in the hands of Jehu Hill, deceased, which have not been paid out in the settlement and distribution of the estate of James Hill, deceased." Upon this closing allegation I remark that it is quite insufficient to be treated by the court as a statement of fact which must be taken as true on a hearing on bill and answer.

The same remark applies to another statement in the answer, arising out of the provisions of the will for the testator's widow. It would seem that he had a second wife, and provided in his will that she should have "over and above her dower right of one-third of my property after my debts and expenses are paid, the interest of said one-third only to be paid to her as long as she shall remain my widow, one bedstead, one bed and bedding, one set of chairs, one table, one carpet, one looking glass, and the double picture of our photograph." The effect of this bequest is to give her outright the specific articles of furniture mentioned and the interest of one-third of his estate as long as she should remain his widow. The allegation of the will is that the widow married on April 18, 1889, a little more than three years after her first husband's death, and thereby her interest under the will ceased. It does not appear whether she accepted the bequest to her in lieu of dower. It may be supposed that she joined with the executors in the conveyance of the real estate. There is no allegation either in the bill or answer on that subject. The answer states that the answering defendant knows nothing concerning the remarriage of the widow, "but supposes the same to be true," by which I infer that he means to say that the allegation in the bill in that respect is true. The answering defendant further says that he "understands that the widow received the sum of $500." This allegation of the answer is subject to the same criticism as that with regard to the result of an accounting by the personal representative of Jehu Hill. It is altogether too vague and uncertain to be treated as an allegation of a fact, to be taken to be true on bill and answer. But it may well be supposed that, under the language of the will, the widow, when called upon within two months after the decease of her husband to join in the conveyance of his real estate, demanded and received the sum of $500 as her share of the proceeds, and perhaps in settlement of all demands against the estate, and that such a settlement would be approved by this court.

So much for the facts relating to the estate actually received by one or both of these defendants. With regard to the interest of the testator in the estate of his father, Samuel Hill, the allegations of the bill are that the grandfather died January 26, 1885, (about 11 months before the testator), and by his will appointed the testator and one Vanderipe executors, and that these executors proved the will in February, 1885 (but the bill does not allege that any of the funds of said estate came to their hands); that afterwards, in January, 1887, letters of administration cum testamento annexo de bonis non were issued to the defendant Hoffman; that in May, 1887, after the death of Jehu, Hoffman filed his account in the Middlesex county orphans' court, showing a balance of $1,279.53 in his hands, one-fourth of which, by the express terms of the will of Samuel Hill, set forth in the bill herein, was given to the testator, James Hill. The bill alleges in substance that Hoffman has never paid any part of that one-fourth share to either the executors of James Hill nor to the complainants, and that he has never been called upon by the defendant Samuel, or by his co-executor, Jehu, to pay the same. The defendant admits these allegations with regard to the death, will, and estate of their grandfather, Samuel; but he says he knows nothing about the accounting of Hoffman or the amount found by the accounting in his hands, and he asserts that he has never received any money from Hoffman, and says "that he has never been called upon to call the said Thomas H. Hoffman to account, and that he is as desirous of an accounting as the complainants, if the complainants' statements are true."

Here again I feel constrained to say that the defendant admits the utter neglect of his duty as executor. His co-executor, Jehu, died, as we have seen, in April, 1887. The final account of Hoffman as executor of their ancestor was filed in May, 1887, and allowed by the orphans' court on the 17th of July in that year. It does seem to me that, however the defendant may have been justified in leaving the execution of the will of his father and the administration of his estate to his co-executor and uncle during the latter's lifetime, surely upon his death it was his duty to look after it, and especially after the interest of his father in the estate of his grandfather. The case, then, may be briefly stated thus: The complainants, as legatees under the will of their father, charge the defendants, executors thereof, as if both were alive, with having received upwards of $3,000 as the proceeds of his estate, and showing where, in the ordinary course of business, they ought to have received over $400 from another source, and calls on them to account. One of the defendant executors answers by showing that his co-executor received all of the moneys from the proceeds of the estate proper, and died about one year after such receipt, and with regard to the $400 from the other source he disavows all knowledge of such money, and states in substance that he never paid the least attention to the business of managing the estate and executing the will, either in the lifetime of his co-executor or afterwards, and sets up that he was never called upon to do anything in the premises until the filing of this bill, 17 years after the right of the complainants to an account accrued. This answer admits, in my judgment, culpable negligence, and leaves the defendant liable to account, unless the mere lapse of time is sufficient to excuse him and bar the complainants' right.

The defendant, in his answer, does not specifically set up the lapse of time as a bar. He does not show specifically how he has lost anything in the way of evidence; nor, on the other hand, do the complainants anticipate the defense of lapse of time or give any excuse for their laches. They rest on their right to an account as if both executors were living and the transactions were of recent date. The defendant does not set up in his answer either the statute of limitations or, as before remarked, the delay of the complainants in bringing their suit, but rests himself solely on the ground that he never received any of the money of the estate, and in so doing admits a cause of action, namely, negligence on his part, which the complainants have not alleged. But, although the real question in the cause does not arise on the pleadings, yet it was dealt with by counsel in their arguments precisely as if it did so arise, and was treated by them as controlling the decision of the cause. I have therefore felt it to be my duty to consider it and act upon it precisely as if it did arise on the pleadings. It will be perceived that the cause of action does not arise out of an ordinary breach of trust by the trustees of an express continuing trust, such as making an improper investment whereby money is lost to the cestui que trust, or a misappropriation of the trust funds, and the like, where it has been held that the statute of limitations does not apply, and the court is lenient with the cestui que trust in dealing with the question of laches in bringing suit. The cause of action, as already remarked, arises out of the neglect of the defendant to give proper attention to the management of the estate, and to call the estate of his co-executor to account promptly after his decease, and in failing himself, after the death of his co-executor, in calling for and demanding his father's share in the estate of his grandfather. It is plainly a case of nonfeasance, and not misfeasance. Now all these causes of action arose at once. Complainants' right to an account arose within a reasonable time after the sale of the property. They are chargeable with notice of the amount of the inventory, with the amount of the proceeds of the sale of the real estate, and with the fact that their father was entitled to an interest in the estate of their grandfather. They are chargeable with notice that they were entitled to a prompt accounting, which is precisely the remedy which they are here asking. Not only do they not allege their ignorance in these matters, but it is quite impossible to believe that they were so far indifferent to their pecuniary rights as not to be informed that the time had arrived when they were entitled to receive from their father's estate more than they did actually receive, unless the same was absorbed in the payment of debts. Moreover, it is distinctly alleged by the answer that they knew that the moneys were handled by Jehu, and at his death it is impossible to suppose that they did not think that if there was anything coming to them from the estate they ought to look after it. The complainants, then, are chargeable with resting on their rights for about 17 years without the least excuse whatever. In the meantime it is fair, I think, to infer that the vouchers and papers relating to the estate, which must have been in the hands of their uncle, Jehu, have been lost or mislaid, and are not now available to the answering defendant. Under these circumstances it seems to me it would be a great hardship to call on the defendant to account for the moneys actually received by his coexecutor and which it is quite possible to believe may have been entirely and properly paid out by him for debts of the testator in the due course of the administration of the estate.

With regard to the claim against the defendant Hoffman, there can be no presumption of any money having come to the hands of the deceased executor from him; for he died before the account was settled and the balance determined. The complainants were chargeable with notice of their rights under the will of their grandfather, and that the money was in the hands of Hoffman, and it seems to me they should have taken some measures years ago to enforce them. Moreover, if the statute of limitations had been pleaded or distinctly set up in this case, I am inclined to the opinion that it should have prevailed by what is called analogy. As before remarked, there was here no continuing or express trust. Complainants' right to an account arose at least 17 years before bill filed. It was reasonable for the answering defendant to allow his uncle, Jehu, to have exclusive possession of the proceeds of the estate for the purpose of settling the same. No liability was incurred by him in that respect, unless there were facts brought to his attention, of which there is no proof, showing that he ought not to have trusted him. This is entirely clear under the course of decisions in this state. His liability, if any, must, as before remarked, rest solely upon his negligence in not calling his uncle's personal representatives to account and procuring from them the necessary materials for rendering an account of his uncle's dealings with the estate, and his negligence in failing, on his own motion, to demand from the defendant Hoffman his father's share of the estate of his grandfather. The complainants are chargeable with knowledge of this neglect and that any cause of action they had arising thereout accrued at once, and the principles which protect cestui que trust against the operation of the statute of limitations does not apply.

Upon consideration of the whole case I think that the bill should be dismissed as against the answering defendant, without costs; but it may be retained for the purpose of reaching the defendant Hoffman, if the complainants shall so desire.

STATE v. HUMMER.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 21, 1905.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE OF OTHER OFFENSES.

Where, on a prosecution for the carnal abuse of a female child, the chief of police testified on cross-examination that he had not reduced to writing the statement of the child, that it was the practice to reduce to writing statements of persons making grave charges, and that he did not reduce to writing more than a third of the statements of other girls making similar charges against other men, it was proper, to show whether his failure to reduce to writing the child's statement was due to his lack of belief in its truth or whether he was following his usual course under similar circumstances, to permit him to testify on redirect examination that there were other girls at the police headquarters making charges against accused, whose statements he did not reduce to writing.

2. CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where evidence on a trial for crime was competent for one purpose, it should not be excluded because it impressed the jury with the idea that the accused had a propensity to commit the crime charged; but the court should instruct the jury to consider it only for the purpose for which it was admitted.

3. WITNESSES—IMPEACHMENT.

It is not competent to impeach a witness by proof of prior statements, the making of which he does not deny when testifying.

4. CRIMINAL LAW—DECLARATIONS BY PERSON INJURED—ADMISSIBILITY.

On a trial for the carnal abuse of a female child, admissions made by the child are inadmissible; there being no privity between her and the state sufficient to render her admissions evidence for the accused.

5. SAME—APPEAL—PREJUDICIAL ERROR.

Where, on a trial for the carnal abuse of a female child, the evidence only proved that accused had unsuccessfully attempted to insert his penis into her private parts, causing her pain, the error, if any, in an instruction that carnal abuse means any abuse of the female child's genital organs, either by defendant's private parts or by rough handling of or use of her private parts by him in any way, was not reversible error; Criminal Procedure Act, § 136 (P. L. 1898, p. 915), declaring that no judgment shall be reversed for error, except such as may have been prejudicial to defendant.

Error to Court of Quarter Sessions, Hudson County.

William A. Hummer was convicted of crime, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Argued June term, 1905, before GUMMERE, C. J., and FORT, PITNEY, and REED, JJ.

Joseph M. Noonan, for plaintiff in error.
William H. Speer, for the State.

GUMMERE, C. J. The writ in this case brings up for review the conviction of the defendant upon an indictment charging him with the carnal abuse of one Ella Dennison, a female child under the age of 16 years.

The first assignment of error is directed at the ruling of the trial judge in permitting the chief of police to testify, in response to a question put by the prosecutor, that upon a certain occasion there were other girls at police headquarters making charges against the plaintiff in error. In order to make plain the reason upon which our conclusion upon this assignment rests, a recital of the circumstances under which the challenged evidence was admitted becomes necessary. The witness had been called by the state for the apparent purpose of proving the excited mental condition of the prosecuting witness, when before the chief for the purpose of examination with relation to the alleged criminal act of the plaintiff in error. On his cross-examination he was asked whether he had taken down the girl's statement in writing, and answered that he had not. He was then asked whether it was not the practice of his department to take statements in writing when the charges made were of a grave character, and admitted that it was. He was then asked if he could remember any other case of this kind of crime where he did not take a written statement of the prosecuting witness. His answer to this question was as follows: "Well, there were such few cases where there was such abundance of evidence that I don't suppose it is likely." He was then asked whether there were not other girls at police headquarters making charges against other men, and answered that there were, and, being then asked whether he took all their statements down in writing, he answered, "No," that he did not take down more than one-third of them. The obvious purpose of this line of cross-examination was to impress the minds of the jurors with the idea that, from the fact that the witness had not taken down the Dennison girl's statement in writing, he had given little credence to her story. His answer to the last of the questions which have been recited showed that the inference sought to be drawn from his nonaction lost much of its force where a number of such complaints were lodged by different girls against the same man. In this situation of the case it was manifestly proper that the jury should be able to determine whether the failure of the witness to take down the girl's statement in writing was due to his lack of belief in its truth or whether, in not doing so, he was following his usual course under circumstances similar to those which were present in the matter which he was then investigating. The prosecutor, therefore, at the close of the cross-examination, which followed immediately after the asking and answering of this last question, put the question which it is now argued was erroneously admitted. The basis of the argument is that it is incompetent on the trial of an indictment to prove that the defendant has been guilty of other crimes similar in character to that charged against him in the indictment, or even that he has a propensity to commit such crimes, and that the challenged testimony had this effect. That proof offered for the purpose indicated in this argument ought not to be received, and that its admission constitutes legal error must be at once conceded. But evidence which is incompetent if offered for one purpose is very frequently admissible when offered for another. A very common instance of this condition in a criminal trial is found in the admission of proof that the defendant (when he has offered himself as a witness in the case) has been convicted of other crimes, whether like or unlike that under which he is being then tried. Such proof is admitted solely for the purpose of affecting the credibility of the defendant, and the fact that it may leave upon the jury the impression that the defendant has a criminal propensity does not justify its exclusion. The evidence now under consideration was, in our opinion, competent for the purpose for which it was offered, and which has been already indicated, namely, to preclude the inference that the failure of the chief of police to take down in writing the statement of the prosecuting witness was due to a want of belief on his part of its truthfulness. This being so, it would have been an error, injurious to the state, to have excluded it because of its tendency to impress the jury with the idea that the defendant had a propensity to commit the crime for which he was then upon trial. The protection of the defendant against such a result was to request the court to instruct the jury as to the limitations of the evidence and of the purposes for which alone it could be considered by them.

The next assignment of error relates to the exclusion of certain testimony sought to be given by Mr. Doherty, the attorney of the defendant, while on the witness stand. The testimony excluded was a conversation had by the witness with the Dennison girl at an interview had some time before the trial. The object for which the excluded testimony was offered was not stated. It was not competent for the purpose of impeaching her credibility, for she had not denied, while upon the witness stand, making any of the statements which Mr. Doherty was asked to repeat. It was not competent to prove the statements as admissions made by her, for, as was pointed out by this court in State v. Brady, 71 N. J. Law, 300, 59 Atl. 6, there is no such privity between the victim of a criminal act and the state as to render admissions made by the former competent evidence in behalf of the party charged with the commission of the crime. This testimony therefore was properly excluded.

Another assignment of error is directed at the charge of the court as to what constitutes the carnal abuse of a female child. The instruction complained of was as follows: "Carnal abuse means any abuse of the female child's genital organs, either by the defendant's private parts, or by rough handling of or use of her private parts by him in any way." The contention made on behalf of the defendant is that there may be a rough handling of the private parts of a female child under such circumstances as to disprove that the person so doing was guilty of the crime of carnal abuse, and that therefore this instruction was erroneous. But, assuming that this contention is well founded, it affords no ground for reversing the conviction. By virtue of the 136th section of the criminal procedure act (P. L. 1898, p. 915), no judgment given upon any indictment shall be reversed for any error, except such as shall or may have prejudiced the defendant in maintaining his defense upon the merits. In the case before us the proof submitted by the state, in support of the charge laid against the defendant, was that he had unsuccessfully attempted to insert his penis into the private parts of this girl, causing her some pain by doing so. No evidence was introduced showing any rough handling of her parts, except this attempted entrance of her person. The abstract proposition complained of might possibly have been considered by the jury as an instruction that, in order to justify a conviction, there must have been a rough handling of the girl's private parts while attempting to effect an entrance into her person. It is not possible, it seems to us, that they should have based their verdict of guilty upon a conclusion that there had been no attempt on the part of the plaintiff to enter the girl's person, but that he had roughly handled her private parts, in the absence of any evidence whatever upon which to found such a conclusion.

Other errors have been assigned and have received due consideration. We do not, however, find them to be of sufficient merit to justify discussion.

The conviction under review should be affirmed.

BOROUGH OF WASHINGTON v. WASHINGTON WATER CO.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Nov. 22, 1905.)

1. WATERS—PUBLIC SUPPLY—CORPORATIONS—DUTIES.

A water company, which is the sole source of water supply for a borough, is a quasi public corporation bound to supply water to the borough at a reasonable price, to be fixed by a competent tribunal in case no agreement between the parties can be reached.

2. SAME—CUTTING OFF SUPPLY—INJUNCTION.

Where a water company, which was the sole source of supply of a borough, threatened to cut off the supply in case the borough refused to pay a sum for past service, which it claimed was unreasonable, the borough was entitled to a preliminary injunction restraining the cutting off of the supply pendente lite.

3. SAME—EQUITY JURISDICTION.

Where a water company which was the sole source of supply of a borough, threatened to cut off the supply unless the borough paid certain charges, which it alleged were unreasonable, for past service, the jurisdiction of a court of equity in a suit to restrain the cutting off of the supply and to fix a reasonable charge extended only to the determination of whether the price demanded was unreasonable, and, if so, to enjoin the cutting off of the supply for its nonpayment, but did not include the recovery by the water company of a reasonable sum for past service.

4. INJUNCTION—PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION—CONDITIONS.

Where, in a suit to restrain a water company, which was the sole source of a borough's supply, from cutting off the same because of the borough's refusal to pay a charge for past service which it claimed was unreasonable, the affidavits on an application for a preliminary injunction as to the reasonableness of the sum charged were conflicting, a preliminary injunction should be granted on condition that the borough should pay into court or secure three-fourths of the sum paid under the last contract with the company for water supplied pending suit, and stipulate to pay such further sum as the court should direct by final decree.

5. SAME.

The water company was not entitled to payment of any portion of the supply furnished prior to the filing of the bill as a further condition to such injunction.

Suit by the borough of Washington against the Washington Water Company. On application for a preliminary injunction to restrain defendant from shutting off complainant's water supply. Granted.

Oscar Jeffrey, for complainant. William A. Stryker and William H. Morrow, for defendant.

EMERY, V. C. Defendant has for over 20 years furnished a water supply to complainant for fire hydrants and other public purposes under 10-year contracts. Under the first contract, the annual sum paid was $1,000 a year, and under the second (expiring July 1, 1903), $800 a year. On the expiration of this contract, and during the last two years, the parties had negotiations for the continuance of the supply for another term of years, but have failed to agree on the sum to be paid. In the meantime the service has been continued as heretofore, but without any payment, and on August 17, 1905, the water company notified the borough that from July 1, 1903, to July 1, 1905, the water had been supplied under the original contract for $800 a year, that the borough was now indebted to the company for $1,600, which it had refused to pay, and that unless this indebtedness of $1,600 was paid by August 25, 1905, the public water supply would be cut off. The supply includes street hy-drants, the only source of supply for extinguishing fires. The borough thereupon filed this bill for an injunction against cutting off this supply, claiming that the price demanded was unreasonable, and praying also that this court fix the reasonable price to be paid. Defendant, on the other hand, insists that the price demanded is reasonable, and by its answer denies jurisdiction of this court for any purpose. Complainant is entitled to a preliminary injunction restraining this cutting off of its water supply pending the final hearing, for the following reasons:

The defendant, in respect to the rights and duties now involved, is a quasi public company, and is bound to make a reasonable price for the water supply to the borough. And the borough, on the other hand, is bound to pay a reasonable sum. Public Service Corporation v. American Lighting Co. (Pitney, V. Ch.; 1904) 57 Atl. 482, 485. The public duty of the officials controlling each of the parties is to agree on a reasonable price for this public service, but if they fail to agree on any price, the reasonable price must be fixed by a competent tribunal. The claim for water heretofore supplied is altogether legal in its nature, and an action brought solely for the purpose of recovering a reasonable sum for past services, or of determining what is such reasonable sum, is not within the equity jurisdiction. But such jurisdiction exists to maintain the status quo, and require the continuance of the supply pending the settlement of the question of reasonable price for past supply. If the water company demands an unreasonable price and threatens to cut off the public supply unless this unreasonable price is paid, the municipality has the right to enjoin the company from cutting off the supply, because of failure to pay such sum. Ordinarily, the scope of the decree in such equity suit would be the determination of whether the price demanded was unreasonable, and if so found, then to enjoin the cutting off of the supply for its nonpayment. The equitable jurisdiction in such suit would not extend to fixing either the reasonable sum to be paid for the past supply, or for the future. Such being the scope of the final decree, the complainant, if it can show on application for preliminary injunction, a fair case for trial on final hearing, of the unreasonableness of the price demanded, is, under proper conditions, entitled to a continuance of the supply pending hearing. In the present case, the water company demanded $1,600, the price of two years service under the last contract with the borough, which expired over two years before the suit. The affidavits show a case where the complainant is entitled to have the question as to the unreasonableness of this sum tried, and they further show that the decision of this question cannot be satisfactorily made on ex parte affidavits, but only upon full hearing and proofs. On proper conditions, complainant is therefore entitled to the preliminary injunction. The conditions to be imposed depend on the scope of the issues to be finally tried in the suit and the situation disclosed by the affidavits presented. As to water service or supply pending the suit, they should include payment into court (or securing payment) of at least a fair proportion of the amount previously paid, this amount, if taken out or recovered by the defendant, to be applied and credited as payment on account by defendant, for water supplied pending suit, without prejudice to either party. Three-fourths of the sum paid under the last contract should be thus paid or secured. As to water service or supply pending suit, the further condition should be imposed, that the complainant should stipulate to pay (or secure) such further sum as the court may by final decree, and as a condition, or otherwise, direct to be paid for such service or supply pending suit. Complainant's bill in terms offers only to pay a price fixed by a standard referred to, viz., the rate charged to private consumers for water actually supplied. Defendant on its answer and affidavits fairly contests the reasonableness of this standard as applied to public water service, and as it may establish its case on this point at final hearing, it has a right to be secured by this further condition for its supply pending suit.

The conditions in the present case should not require payment for any portion of the supply previous to filing the bill, for three reasons: First, under the present pleadings, this question of the amount to be paid as a reasonable price for the water supplied or ready to be supplied previous to the suit cannot be tried in this court, unless defendant consents. It has clearly the right to bring its action at law for past services or supply and cannot be restrained from so doing, and has in its answer objected to the jurisdiction of the court for any purpose. The objection is clearly valid as to the past supply. Second, so far as relates to past due bills, the company could at any time after the expiration of the contract have sued for the value of its supply, and its omission for two years to sue and test the question of reasonable price in this way, must, in the absence of any facts showing the defendant's financial irresponsibility, disentitle defendant to having payment of any portion now enforced by way of condition to supplying water pending the suit. As to the supply pending suit, the equity to payment rests on the fact that this court virtually orders this supply, and in equity it is therefore bound also to assure the payment for this service, by the exercise of its powers, i. e., by making the supply pending suit conditional on payment. In the third place, to make such condition, would require the borough to pay at once a considerable sum of money, and it does not appear that the money is in hand, or that the statutes regulating the borough would authorize the payment. Payment of the rate now fixed for the pending supply can be provided for by taxation, along with other annual burdens. Unless some money for the purpose of the past water supply has been already raised by taxation and is in hand, the amount finally recovered by decree or judgment must probably be met as such obligation. The order for payment of the past-due bills in the Long Branch Case, 62 Atl. 474, referred to by counsel, was, as I find, made by consent, and the money was in hand ready for payment. In that case, also, the pleadings were by consent so framed that the court of equity undertook the settlement of what was a reasonable price to be paid both for the past and future supply. Vice Chancellor Pitney in this case, in his opinion not yet filed, but which I have seen, proceeds upon the views of the power of the court of equity which I have indicated.

The terms of the order will be settled on notice, unless agreed on.

HEGEMAN'S EX'RS v. ROOME et al.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Nov. 23, 1905.)

1. CHARITIES—CHARITABLE BEQUEST—INDEFINITENESS.

A bequest to a trustee for the purpose of making such distribution among religious, benevolent, and charitable objects as he may select is void as vague and indefinite.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 23, Cent. Dig. Charities, § 45.]

2. WILLS—TRUSTS—FAILURE—EFFECT—TRUSTEE'S TESTAMENTARY DISPOSITION—VALIDITY.

A wife bequeathed property to her husband, who was directed to distribute it among such religious, benevolent, or charitable objects as he might select, which bequest was void for indefiniteness. The husband inherited the property as intestate property, but his will recited the conditions of the wife's will, and provided that for the purpose of carrying out the provisions thereof his executors should keep apart from his estate the property belonging to the estate of his wife and divide it among certain institutions. Held, that such provision was not operative, as the husband did not receive any property under his wife's will to which it would apply.

3. ADMINISTRATORS—SALES—STATUTES.

P. L. 1888, p. 395, vesting administrators with the same powers in respect to sales of land as executors named in the will, does not give a substituted administrator a grant of power to sell lands which are the subject of an express devise to the executor as trustee.

Bill by Benjamin A. Hegeman, Jr., and another, as substituted administrators with the will annexed of Catherine E. Hegeman, deceased, and as executors of the will of Benjamin A. Hegeman, deceased, for directions as to the execution of a trust created by the will of Catherine E. Hegeman. Decree advised.

Charles A. Reed, for complainants. Craig A. Marsh, for defendants Muhlenberg Hospital & Children's Home Ass'n et al. Hugh B. Reed, for defendants Roome and Harbough. John H. Van Winkle, for defendants Roome's executors.

BERGEN, V. C. The bill in this cause was filed by Benjamin A. Hegeman, Jr., and William J. R. Hegeman, substituted administrators, with the will annexed of Catherine E. Hegeman, deceased, and also as executors of the last will and testament of Benjamin A. Hegeman, deceased, for the purpose, among other things, of obtaining the direction of the court as to the proper execution of a trust which it is alleged was created by the last will and testament of Catherine E. Hegeman, in which, after numerous bequests of portions of her property, she ordered and directed as follows: "Thirteenth. I hereby give and bequeath to my husband, Benjamin A. Hegeman, for his own personal use and benefit during his life, all the net income, interest or revenue of my estate both personal and real, of which I may die seized or possessed, or which I may hereafter acquire, or to which I may be entitled at the time of my decease, giving him full power to manage and control my said estate both personal and real, the same as I might or could do if living. He to have full power to sell my real estate or personal property, and reinvest the proceeds for the benefit of my estate, or as he may deem for its best interest, and to give good and sufficient deeds and conveyances therefor to the purchaser or purchasers thereof. Fourteenth. At the death of my husband, Benjamin A. Hegeman, I hereby direct that the residue or remainder of my estate shall be divided as follows: [Succeeding this are eight different bequests, which it is not necessary here to recite.] Twenty-third. Should there be any residue or remainder of my estate left after providing for the payment of the legatees hereinbefore named, I hereby give and bequeath the same to my husband, Benjamin A. Hegeman, for the purpose of making such distribution among religious, benevolent or charitable objects, as he may select."

The important controversy arises over this last paragraph. Benjamin A. Hegeman, the husband of Catherine E. Hegeman, having been appointed the executor of her last will and testament, duly qualified as such, and retained in his possession until his death the property and estate, the income of which was devised to him for life, holding, as a part of such trust fund, certain real estate particularly described in the bill of complaint, as well as a considerable amount of personal property. The husband left a last will and testament, in which, after repeating the eight bequests as set out in paragraphs 15 to 22 inclusive of his wife's will, he devised as follows: "I give and bequeath to my executors hereinafter named, all the property which I shall receive, or which may come to my estate after my decease, under the twenty-third article of the will of my deceased wife, Catherine E. Hegeman, bearing date July 23, 1904, in trust, nevertheless, to take the same and divide such property into two equal parts or shares, and to transfer and pay over one of such parts or shares to the Muhlenberg Hospital, in the city of Plainfield, state of New Jersey, and the other of such parts or shares to the children's home association of said city; each of said parts to be known as the 'Catherine E. Hegeman Fund' of the respective beneficiaries above named, and to be held by them in trust to invest and receive the income therefrom, to use and apply such income only to and for the respective charitable objects for which they are organized." The persons entitled to the estate of Catherine E. Hegeman, had she died intestate, insist that the twenty-third section of her will, which authorizes her husband to distribute the residue of her estate, after providing for the payment to the legatees named in her will, the sums bequeathed to each, among such religious, benevolent, or charitable objects he may select, is void, and that they are entitled to such residue. After the death of the husband the complainants were appointed substituted administrators with the will annexed of Catherine E. Hegeman, and, having in possession such residue and remainder of her estate, now seek the direction of this court in the premises.

While in my judgment the appointment of the complainants as substituted administrators does not create them trustees under the will of the testatrix, still, as all of the parties in interest are before the court, and no objection has been raised by any of them, I will, in view of the fact that if the trust exists it would be the duty of this court to appoint a trustee, consider these complainants as occupying that position, and, if necessary, make an order appointing them thereto; and I feel justified in adopting this court, because the life tenant, to whom the power of disposition was given, has in and by his last will and testament bequeathed to the same parties the fund in question, in trust to divide and pay over to the beneficiaries named in his will. A careful consideration of the twenty-third paragraph of the will of Catherine E. Hegeman leads me to the conclusion that the bequest contained in that paragraph is void. A bequest to benevolent, religious, or charitable institutions, without qualification, has been so often held to be void by the courts of this state, as to place the question beyond successful argument. In the case of Thompson's Executors v. Norris, 19 N. J. Eq. 575, a bequest to "such benevolent, religious, or charitable institutions as she may think proper" was held void, because it was so vague and indefinite that it could not be enforced, and the case was affirmed on appeal after a most extensive and elaborate argument; Chief Justice Beasley, who wrote the opinion, saying: "That bequest is to 'benevolent, religious, or charitable institutions.' This is too broad. 'Benevolent' is wider than 'charitable' in its legal signification." The rule thus laid down has since then been repeatedly subjected to judicial consideration, and has always been maintained. De Camp v. Dobbins, 81 N. J. Eq. 671; Hyde v. Hyde, 64 N. J. Eq. 6, 53 Atl. 598. In the latter case the bequest was "for such religious, charitable, educational or other purposes as they may deem advisable, provided, nevertheless, that no portion thereof shall be given to, or distributed among, my wife or children, individually or collectively," and the bequest was declared void because it contained the words "or other purposes," and this, in spite of the fact that in declaring the bequest void the fund would be distributed among the wife and children of the testator, in direct opposition to a contrary proviso contained in the disputed paragraph.

On the argument it was strenuously urged that, as the testatrix had in and by her last will disposed of a large portion of the trust fund, to take effect after her husband's death, to eight recognized charitable purposes, such bequests ought to be taken as indicating and controlling the character of the objects which the husband must select in making distribution. I have carefully considered this insistence, but I can find no way to give it effect, because in the paragraph under consideration the residue is given and bequeathed to the husband, not for the purpose of carrying out the intentions of the testatrix as to the objects of her bounty, but for distribution by the husband in such manner as he may select, subject to the direction that the distribution shall be to benevolent as well as religious or charitable objects. My conclusion therefore is that, as to the property of Catherine E. Hegeman sought to be disposed of by the twenty-third section of her will, she died intestate, and it descended to the persons who would inherit the same under such conditions.

As Catherine E. Hegeman never had any children, the personal property which she sought to dispose of by this twenty-third paragraph would become the absolute estate of her husband, he having survived her; and the next question presented is, do the two beneficiaries of this fund, under the husband's will, take the personal property as a bequest from him? I can find nothing in the husband's will to support such a theory. All that the will contains on this subject is to be found in the eighth paragraph, which opened with a recital of the directions contained in the will of his wife with regard to this fund, and then continues as follows: "Now for the purpose of better carrying out the provision of the will of my deceased wife, since the whole of her estate will be in my hands as her executor, I direct my executors hereinafter named to keep separate and apart from my estate all the property which shall be in my hands and under my control at the time of my decease and belonging to the estate of my said deceased wife, and to make the division thereof as provided in her will." And then, after repeating, in the form contained in the will of the wife, the eight distinct legacies she had given to take effect after her death, he continued: "I give and bequeath to my executors all the property which I shall receive, or which may come to my estate after my decease, under the twenty-third article of the will of my deceased wife, * * * in trust, nevertheless, to take the same and divide such property into two equal parts or shares, and to transfer and pay over," etc. It does not seem to me that under this bequest the husband had any intention of doing more than what he supposed he was required to do under the will of his wife, and it cannot be said that he was bequeathing any property which he supposed belonged to him, for he distinctly limits it to such property as he may receive under the twenty-third paragraph of his wife's will. As he did not receive this property under the will of his wife, and only took because she died intestate, to hold that he intended to pass over to those worthy charities property coming to him from a source other than that described in his will would amount to the making of a testamentary disposition for the testator which he had not authorized, and which the law would neither support nor justify. My conclusion on this branch of the case is that, as to the personal property of which Catherine E. Hegeman died intestate, the husband did not dispose of it under the eighth paragraph of his will, and that the trustees are accountable to his estate therefor.

Another question presented is whether the trustees are vested with a power of sale of the real estate which constituted a part of the fund. This question arises under the thirteenth paragraph of the will of Catherine E. Hegeman, in which, after bequeathing to her husband for life the income of her estate both real and personal, and giving him full power to manage and control the same as she could if living, she preferred a power of sale as follows: "He to have full power to sell my real estate or personal property and reinvest the proceeds for the benefit of my estate, or as he may deem for its best interest." It will be observed that, while she appoints her husband executor of her will, she confers no power of sale on him as such; the power is limited to him as trustee. Under these conditions, in my opinion, the power of sale was a personal trust and confidence, and is not transmissible, for, where there is a direction to convert, coupled with a trust or confidence in one who is to sell "as he may deem best," it is a personal trust, which can only be exercised by the person in whom it is reposed. Chambers v. Tulane, 9 N. J. Eq. 146; Brush v. Young, 28 N. J. Law, 237; Lanning v. Sisters of St. Francis, etc., 35 N. J. Eq. 392, 400. The substituted administrator has not, under P. L. 1888, p. 395, any grant of power to sell lands which are the subject of an express devise in trust. The devise under consideration was to the husband, with a power vested in him alone to sell the lands if he deemed it advisable. He did not exercise a power, which was only given in connection with a trust which I have held to be void. The power of a substituted administrator to sell lands has been fully considered and defined by Chancellor Magie, in Varick et al. v. Smith (N. J. Ch.) 58 Atl. 168. The other matters set out in the bill of complaint, and as to which instructions were prayed, relate entirely to directions as to the administration of the estate, and fall within the rule laid down by the chancellor in Hoagland v. Cooper, 65 N. J. Eq. 407, 56 Atl. 705.

I will advise a decree in accordance with the views here expressed.

MANSON v. JACK et al.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Nov. 23, 1905.)

1. WILLS—CONSTRUCTION—INTEREST CREATED—ABSOLUTE GIFT.

Where the residuary clause of testatrix's will gave the executor, who was an old friend of hers, the residue of the estate, to be disposed of as he should think expedient, it amounted to an absolute gift.

2. SAME—SUIT FOR CONSTRUCTION—ISSUES.

In a suit for the construction of a will, the question whether a trust had been created by directions of testatrix to the executor was not open to consideration.

3. SAME—PARTIES.

A contention that a clause of a will, together with certain directions by testatrix to the executor, created a trust for certain persons, and that, the same being void for uncertainty, the estate was distributable among the heirs, cannot be considered in a suit to which such alleged beneficiaries are not parties.

Suit by John E. Manson, as executor of May Dalling, deceased, against John Bruce Jack and others, for the construction of the will of testatrix. Decree advised.

Vivian M. Lewis, for complainant. Charles C. Scott and Daniel L. Campbell, for defendants.

STEVENSON, V. C. The will of Mrs. May Dalling, deceased, contains the following residuary clause: "The balance of my estate, after paying all expenses and making such improvements on my burying lot as my executor deems advisable, erecting additional headstones or footstone, I leave to my executor to be disposed of as he shall think expedient. I appoint my friend John E. Manson, of Paterson, N. J., executor under this my last will and testament."

1. The complainant, the executor of this will, asks for a construction of the clause above set forth, in order that he may be instructed as to the disposition of the residue of the estate now in his hands. The testatrix made a very extensive and minute distribution of portions of her estate among nearly 40 legatees, including her own heirs and next of kin and the next of kin of her deceased husband, and a large number of other relatives and friends. There are 24 pecuniary legacies, ranging in amount from $100 to $1,000 each, and aggregating over $9,000. There are also 15 specific legacies of clothing, jewelry, watches, etc. All the legacies have been paid, and the fund now remaining in the hands of the executor, out of which considerable counsel fees and other expenses must be paid, amounts to about $3,800. This residuary clause is in sharp contrast with that large class of residuary clauses which have been before the courts, in which the intention is disclosed that the devisee or legatee named shall dispose of the property given to him as the testator has directed or will direct, or in accordance with the wishes of the testator in some way expressed or to be expressed. The executor is left free to dispose of the residue which may be left in his hands for his own benefit, or for the benefit of any other person or persons. The complainant was an old friend of the testatrix. He had managed her business affairs for many years, and had received no compensation. The testatrix was 80 years of age when she made her will, and was a widow with no living descendants. She was intimate with the complainant's family. It was very natural, under the circumstances, that the testatrix should desire to make a testamentary gift to the complainant, and the form of that gift, so far as the words by which it is manifested call for consideration, may have resulted from the fact that the legatee in this case was to be the executor of the will. The testatrix is contemplating that she is leaving her estate in the hands of her old friend, whom she makes her executor, to be disposed of to a large extent by him according to her directions among 40 different persons, and with this idea in her mind she passes on immediately to say that she leaves the residue to this friend, to be disposed of as he shall think expedient. When a man is put in possession of property, with the right of applying it to his own use or to any other use as he may think expedient, he is the owner of the property. The gift of the unqualified power to dispose of the property is a gift of the property. 30 Am. & Eng. Ency. p. 376 (b), and cases cited in notes; Knight v. Knight (1894) 162 Mass. 460, 38 N. E. 1181. Even if the complainant were not shown to be a very natural object of the bounty of the testatrix, if the complainant had been a stranger to her, I think there would be difficulty in construing this residuary clause so as to find an intention of the testatrix that she should die intestate as to about a quarter of her estate, and that the executor to whom she "left" this residue was not to take the same beneficially, but was to exercise what would practically be a delegated testamentary power of distributing this residue among beneficiaries to be selected by him. The only witness sworn on either side was the complainant, who was called on behalf of the defendants, the next of kin, and testified without objection to certain conversations which he had with the testatrix, in which she undertook to give directions or suggestions in regard to the disposition which he should make of the residue of the estate when he should receive the same, or of some part thereof. This testimony plainly is irrelevant to the question under examination—the question how this residuary clause is to be construed. The residuary clause, when construed in the light of the circumstances which surrounded the testatrix when she made her will, in my opinion makes an absolute gift to the complainant.

2. Counsel for the defendants, who are the heirs and next of kin of the testatrix, argue in their brief that the testimony of the complainant shows that an attempt was made by the testatrix to create a trust by a verbal communication to the executor, and that such trust is void for uncertainty and indefiniteness, and that therefore the residuary estate is distributable "among the heirs at law and next of kin according to the nature of the estate." The court cannot entertain such a claim on behalf of these heirs and next of kin in this cause. No such claim is suggested by the pleadings, and the parties are not before the court who are essential in order that a final disposition of such a claim could be made. The bill sets forth the entire will and the circumstances under which it was executed, and prays that the court "may make such construction" of the residuary clause "that the said residue of the said estate may be distributed." The only parties brought in as defendants are the heirs and next of kin of the testatrix. The bill does not contain the faintest suggestion that the testatrix gave the executor any instructions in regard to the disposition of the residue, or that the executor expressly or impliedly received the residue charged with a secret trust. The complainant does not ask the court for any instructions in regard to his duty in view of an alleged secret trust. The bill merely asks for a construction of the will according to rules which govern the construction of such instruments. Neither of the answers bases any claim to the residue upon the existence of a resulting trust. One of the answers merely submits to the court the construction of the residuary clause, precisely as such construction is submitted in the bill of complaint. The other answer alleges that the testatrix made no disposition of the residue of her estate, and that the residuary clause is "entirely inoperative," and that therefore this answering defendant is entitled to her share of the residue "as one of the heirs at law and next of kin" of the testatrix. Neither answer suggests that the residuary clause operated to pass the residue to the complainant, but that on account of conversations or agreements between the complainant and the testatrix he (the complainant) holds the residuary estate, which under the "operation" of the will passed to him, charged with a trust. In order to found any such claim on behalf of these defendants as the one under consideration, it is necessary to consider and decide a case which is altogether beyond the scope of the bill, and not in any way injected into this cause, or even suggested until the final hearing. The bill is merely for the construction of the will and for such directions to the complainant, the executor engaged in the work of carrying out the provisions of the will, as are proper in view of the construction which the court may place upon those provisions. Whether a legatee or devisee takes under a will for his own benefit, or upon some trust which is not in any way disclosed in or suggested by the will, is not a question of the construction of the will. It is a question whether or not a trust has been created by a transaction which is altogether independent of the will, or by a series of transactions of which the making of the will was merely a part. It is true that the conversations between the testatrix and the complainant disclose three possible beneficiaries of a secret trust, if there was such secret trust. Whether, however, the talk which is thus testified to between the testatrix and the complainant amounted merely to more or less vague advice or suggestions in regard to what the complainant should do with the benefaction which the testatrix intended to confer upon him, or whether such talk, while not defeating the beneficial interest of the complainant as residuary legatee, operated to charge his legacy to a certain extent with benefactions to these three parties named, or any of them, or whether such talk charged the entire residuary estate with a definite trust for the benefit of these three parties, or in default of such definite trust with a resulting trust for the benefit of the heirs and next of kin, are questions which are entirely beyond the scope of this present suit. The testimony of the complainant was offered in order to aid the court in construing the will, and it was so understood by the counsel for the complainant, who justly claims in his brief that such testimony is entirely incompetent for such a purpose.

If, however, under the allegations of this bill and in view of the fact that the testimony of the complainant, which was entirely incompetent on the question of construction, was admitted without objection, there are grounds for urging that as between these litigating parties an adjudication might be made in this cause in regard to this alleged secret trust, the insurmountable difficulty still remains that there are necessary parties to such a controversy who are not brought before the court. The complainant certainly cannot obtain a decree that he takes the residuary estate beneficially free from any trust or charge in favor of the three parties named in his testimony when those parties have not been heard. The defendants, these heirs and next of kin, certainly cannot have this court in this cause adjudge, first, that the complainant takes the residue as a trustee; second, that the trust "is void for uncertainty and indefiniteness," although the intended beneficiaries are known and named, but not brought into the suit or afforded an opportunity to be heard; and, third, that on account of the unenforceable character of the trust in favor of these parties, who are not afforded an opportunity to show that such trust is enforceable, a resulting trust exists for the benefit of these defendants. The result is that, as all the parties to the suit agree that instructions are necessary, the decree will instruct the complainant, as executor, to pay over the residuary estate to himself individually as legatee. Whether as residuary legatee the complainant will hold title for his own benefit, or for the benefit of these three parties named in his testimony, or some of them, or partly for his own benefit and partly for the benefit of these three parties, or wholly for the benefit of the heirs and next of kin, are questions which will not be in the slightest degree affected by any decree in this cause upon the pleadings and proofs as they now stand.

KLEB v. KLEB et al.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Nov. 28, 1905.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE—ANTENUPTIAL CONTRACT—EFFECT—PROPERTY SUBSEQUENTLY ACQUIRED—PROPERTY COVERED.

An antenuptial contract was made in Hanau, Germany, in the year 1861. It was stipulated as follows: "We voluntarily have engaged ourselves to be married. We are not related, and hereby wish ["wollen"], in case of the death without issue, to make a marriage contract to the effect that the surviving spouse shall be the sole heir of the predeceased spouse." The parties to this agreement were at the time domiciled in the then electorate of Hesse Cassel, and did not possess any property. Several years after their marriage they came to New Jersey, and there acquired real estate, title to which was taken in the name of the husband. The husband subsequently died in Germany. In a suit by the wife against her husband's heirs, based upon the above agreement, it was held that the New Jersey land was within the scope of the contract.

Semble, that in a suit against the heirs for the specific performance of the ancestor's contract the contractee complainant cannot testify as to transactions with or statements by the ancestor.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Suit by Maria Sophia Kleb against Jean Kleb and others to compel the performance of an antenuptial agreement. Decree for complainant.

Ernest F. Keer and the Attorney General, for complainant. John W. Queen, for defendants.

STEVENS, V. C. This is a bill to compel the performance of an antenuptial agreement, made between the complainant and her late husband, Peter Kleb. The defendants are his heirs at law. The agreement was made at Hanau in the year 1861, in the then electorate of Hesse Cassel. The original, signed by the parties and their parents, is contained in a court record of the town, and is translated as follows: "Marriage Record 1861, page 532. Hanau, this 29th day of April, 1861. In the presence of Assessor of the Court [Acting Judge] Schmedes, Clerk of the Court Michael, there appeared as the persons engaged to be married: First, former Peter Kleb, of Hanau, born on the tenth day of June, 1838, the legitimate son of Johannes Kleb, a driver, and of his wife Elizabeth, née Breitenberger, of this place; second, Maria Sophia Marx, of Hanau, born on the 17th day of November, 1838, as the legitimate daughter of George Friedrich Marx, master butcher, and of his wife, Susanne Franziska, née Kunz, of this place—who stated: 'We voluntarily have engaged ourselves to be married. We are not related, and hereby wish ["wollen"—a word importing obligation], in case of the death without issue, to make a marriage contract to the effect that the surviving spouse shall be the sole heir of the predeceased spouse.' The parents of the two engaged persons declared their consent thereto. The parties engaged thereupon submitted the following documents: First, their respective certificates of birth; second, certificates of the chief mayor of this place regarding the reception of the bridegroom to citizenship here, as well as in regard to his ability to make a living; third, certificate that notice had been given to the commander of the regiment; fourth, receipt for the citizen's money; fifth, receipt for the marriage tax; and, finally, the parents of the persons engaged declared that they are willing to waive, in reference to this marriage contract, their rights to their obligatory shares. Read and approved. Signed: W. P. Kleb. Sophie Marx. Fr. Marx. Johannes Kleb. S. Marx. Elizabeth Kleb. For certification of signatures, signed: Michael." At the time this agreement was made the parties had no property. The husband's trade was that of a brass founder. They resided at Hanau, and continued to reside there for four years. Then they went to Switzerland, where they lived four years more, and then they came to the United States. After living in New York for a year they came to Newark, where they had a restaurant and saloon. They labored together in the business, and were so successful that in August, 1882, Peter Kleb purchased the premises known as 842 Broad street for $30,000, paying $9,000 or $10,000 in cash. They continued in this business, which was conducted in Peter's name, until 1888, by which time they had paid off the $20,000 mortgage which secured a part of the purchase money. Then they rented the property, which rapidly increased in value, and went back to Germany, where they continued to reside until September, 1901, when Peter Kleb died. Mrs. Kleb received the rents after his death until, desiring to sell, she discovered that the deed was in Peter's name, and that on the record she had no title except to dower. It may be proper to add that the bill alleges that a will was made and proved in Germany, but the evidence, or perhaps I ought to say the colloquy between counsel, shows that it was not executed in such manner as to transfer title to real estate here.

The question argued was whether the antenuptial agreement made in Hanau operates upon real estate subsequently acquired in New Jersey. Story, in his work on the Conflict of Laws, § 184, in a passage that has been frequently cited with approval, thus formulates the rule: "(1) When there is a marriage between parties in a foreign country, and an express contract respecting their rights and property, present and future, that, as a matter of contract, will be held equally valid everywhere, unless, under the circumstances, it stands prohibited by the law of the country where it is sought to be enforced. It will act directly on movable property everywhere. But, as to immovable property, it will, at most, confer only a right of action to be enforced according to the jurisprudence rel sitæ. (2) Where such a contract applies in terms or intent only to present property, and there is a change of domicile, the law of the actual domicile will govern the rights of the parties as to all future acquisitions." In the third edition of Wharton on the Conflict of Laws, Vol. 1, § 199a, the editor thus states the law as he gathers it from decisions, made mostly since the above passage from Story was written: "The statement in the last section that a change of domicile does not work any change of law governing the construction of the contract is undoubtedly true with respect to property, wheresoever situate, which is within the scope of the contract. It is often a question, however, what property is within the scope of the contract. The question is, in its last analysis, one of the intention of the parties. When the contract expressly, or by clear implication, covers future acquisitions after a change of domicile, its construction and effect with reference to such property, as well as property acquired before such change of domicile, are undoubtedly to be governed by the law of the original matrimonial domicile, but when the contract applies in terms or intent only to present property, or is to be performed only in the country where made, and there is a change of domicile, the law of the actual acquisition will govern the rights of the parties as to all future acquisitions; for, upon this assumption, the contract is eliminated, so far as such property is concerned."

Counsel for the defendants, in support of their contention that the contract in question is to be construed as applying only to property that the spouses might have acquired in Germany, refers to the following cases: Fuss v. Fuss, 24 Wis. 256, 1 Am. Rep. 180; Castro v. Illies, 22 Tex. 479, 73 Am. Dec. 277; Besse v. Pellochoux, 73 Ill. 285, 24 Am. Rep. 242; Long v. Hess, 154 Ill. 482, 40 N. E. 335, 27 L. R. A. 791, 45 Am. St. Rep. 143. In each of these cases it was held that a marriage contract, executed abroad by spouses domiciled there, did not apply to or bind lands, acquired subsequently, situate within their new domicile. In the Wisconsin and Illinois cases it was held that the language of the contract indicated an intention to localize it. The Texas case was put on other grounds. I have not been referred to any case, and I have found none, which decides that where there is nothing in the contract evincive of an intention to give a restricted operation to it, where it relates only to after-acquired property, and where its terms are sufficiently comprehensive to include all such property, the mere failure to declare, in so many words, that it is to operate on property without the matrimonial domicile, will prevent it from so operating. In Besse v. Pellochoux, the antenuptial agreement had been made in Switzerland, the matrimonial domicile of the spouses. It provided, among other things, as follows: "(1) The future husband associates and renders his future wife partaker of half of the property acquired during their marriage. * * * (3) Joseph Nicholas Besse, as well for his wife as himself, both present, and natives of Orsiere, where they now live, desiring to prove to the young couple their approval of the union to be contracted, give to their son, Joseph Nicholas, half of their immovable, as well as their movable, property, on the close conditions that the conjoints will work the other half still retained and belonging to said parents." They subsequently emigrated to Illinois. The husband there purchased real estate. The wife died, and the heirs of the wife claimed title to one-half of it. Scott, J., after adverting to the fact that the word 'partaker' was one of doubtful signification, that no words were used which, in their ordinary or legal import, defined what estate the wife took, and that none were used that conveyed the idea that the estate should descend to her heirs, goes on to say: "The contract associating the parties thereto as joint partakers in the property to be acquired by the marriage does not specify any place where it is to be performed. But we are not left in doubt on this point. An examination of its provisions shows that it could not be performed at any place other than the place where it was entered into, viz., the place of the matrimonial domicile." Long v. Hess, 154 Ill. 482, 40 N. E. 335, 27 L. R. A. 791, 45 Am. St. Rep. 143, is to the same effect. The marriage agreement, made in Grand Duchy of Hesse, provided, among other things, that the bride agreed "to receive the groom to live at her house," that the groom brought into the marriage a piece of land situated at Unter Beerfelden, and that the contracting parties subjected themselves to the general laws of Germany, especially the rules and customs of the country. Bailey, J., said that the evidence furnished by the contract was "all in the direction of showing that their intention was to make Beerfelden their permanent home," and that there was a total absence of express provision in the contract making it applicable to the future acquisitions of the parties; the case in that respect being as he said, distinguishable from Scheferling v. Huffman, 4 Ohio St. 241, 62 Am. Dec. 281, where "the contract by its express terms was made applicable, not only to the property then owned by the intended wife, but also to all property acquired during the continuance of the marriage." The express terms thus referred to were contained in the following clause: "If I should die first, my affianced, Ernestine, shall inherit all my property"—a clause which does not differ materially from that under consideration. It is evident that these two cases furnish no support to the defendants' contention. Castro v. Illies, 22 Tex. 479, 73 Am. Dec. 277, is another of the cases upon which defendants rely. There a judgment creditor sought to avoid, as fraudulent, a conveyance by a husband to his wife. It was attempted to support it by reference to the provisions of a marriage contract entered into in France by persons then subjects of that country. The agreement provided that there should be no community of property between husband and wife, that they should hold their respective properties separately and that they intended to submit themselves to certain provisions of the Code Napoleon. The consideration for the conveyance alleged to be fraudulent was a debt due from husband to wife, said to have arisen many years before, under the provisions of this agreement. The decision was that the verdict of a jury condemning the conveyance as fraudulent should stand. As I understand the case, the decision was put ultimately upon the ground (1) that the contract would not bind creditors who had no notice of it, and (2) that the conveyance was fraudulent in fact. Under the provision of the marriage contract that the spouses should hold their property separately, I do not see how the wife could have claimed that either in France or in Texas (if it operated on property in Texas) the marriage contract vested her with a title, legal or equitable, to her husband's lands. If she took at all, it was under her husband's conveyance, and this the jury found to be fraudulent. The case appears to have little or no relevancy to the question I am considering, although there are in the opinion dicta respecting it, whose bearing upon the facts of that case are not quite obvious. None of them, however, go to the length contended for.

The only case which appears to give any countenance to defendant's position is Fuss v. Fuss, 24 Wis. 256, 1 Am. Rep. 180. The agreement was made at Cologne. It provided, so defendants say in their brief (though the case as reported does not give the clause verbatim), that "The aforesaid John William Fuss hereby grants and transfers as a full irrevocable property, by a lawful warranty, and in the form of a donation among the living, to his wife, Anna M. Eichen, all and every personal and real property which shall belong to him, the donor, on the day of his death." This was a postnuptial and not an antenuptial contract. The wife had real property in Prussia at the time it was made. This was sold, and the spouses emigrated to Wisconsin. Some of the money arising from the sale was invested in real estate in Wisconsin in the name of the husband. The husband died, and the wife claimed it. Dixon, J., said: "There is nothing in the contract which speaks fully to the very point; nothing which manifests any intention of the parties to regulate or control it by and according to the laws of their matrimonial domicile, their future acquisitions and gains of property in any foreign state or territory, or any property which should be held or owned by them in such state or territory. The contract was obviously made with reference to its operation and effect within the kingdom of Prussia upon the property of the parties situate there, and with no reference to property situate elsewhere. It appears that they had no property elsewhere, and there is no ground for supposing that they, at that time, contemplated any change of domicile, or a removal to this country or any other." Had the opinion stopped here, it would have seemed that there were, in the estimation of the learned judge, two circumstances which tended to show that the intention was to make the contract operative only upon lands in Prussia. These were (1) the fact that the wife had real property in Prussia, which it was the design of the agreement to protect; and (2) the form of the transfer, viz., "donation among the living," an instrument unknown, both in its form and incidents, to the common law. But he adds these words: "The contract, to have operated upon the rights of the parties abroad, must have been made with express reference to such operation." If by this was meant that it must have been stated in the contract, in so many words, that it was intended to operate upon property without the domicile, then the statement is without support in any book referred to in the opinion. Story is the authority principally relied on, and Story says (section 184) that where the express contract "applies in terms or intent only to present property, and there is a change of domicile, the law of the actual domicile will govern the rights of the parties as to all future acquisitions." This is a very different proposition from that contained in the sentence last quoted.

The Fuss Case, and the three other cases above mentioned, differ from the case in hand in two important particulars bearing upon the question of intent: (1) In each of those cases the spouses, at the time of the making of the contract, possessed property. (2) The phraseology of the contracts was such as to indicate that all the property to which their provisions were designed to apply was to continue, subject to the law of the matrimonial domicile. Property without the domicile was, by implication, excluded from their operation. To use the words of Judge Story, it appeared affirmatively that the contract applied in terms or intent to present property, or to property to be acquired within the then domicile. In the case in hand neither of these indicia of intention appears. Mr. and Mrs. Kleb had no property when they made the agreement. They must, therefore, have intended it to operate upon after acquired property. But the terms used in reference to their future acquisitions are of universal application. They contain within themselves no implication that they were to be limited to Hesse Cassel. Instead of such expressions as "partaker of half of the property," "donation among the living," we find "death without issue," "marriage contract," "the surviving spouse shall be the sole heir of the predeceased spouse." Now "death without issue" and "sole heir" are as familiar to the common as to the civil law. Their meaning is definite and well understood, and they are used in all their generality. It is conceded that the question is one of intent. This is not an artificial intent, imputed without reference to the real wishes of the parties, but an intent such as we may reasonably attribute to them in the situation in which we actually find them.

In the construction of contracts it is proper to consider surrounding circumstances. In this connection there are two considerations not yet adverted to which seem to be of some weight. Spouses possessed of landed property are not as likely to think of bettering their condition by emigration as those who are possessed of none. At the period in question (1861) emigration from Germany to this country was, and for several years previously had been, taking place on a large scale. It is not unreasonable to suppose that an intelligent couple like Mr. and Mrs. Kleb might have regarded emigration as among the possibilities of their married life. But there is another, and, as it seems to me, a stronger, circumstance. In 1861 the town of Hanau lay in the electorate of Hesse Cassel, an independent principality. It was no part of the German Empire, for the German Empire did not then exist. It was an independent state, like Prussia or Saxony. Having, however, sided with Austria against Prussia in the war of 1866, it was, as one of the results of that struggle, incorporated into the latter state. Hanau, as may be seen by reference to any map published prior to 1866, lay in what may be described as a narrow neck of territory scarcely 10 miles wide, from which one might see, to the southeast, the territory of Bavaria, and to the north, the Duchy of Hesse Darmstadt. Such being the situation, is it reasonable to impute an intention to confine the marriage contract to such property as the spouses might acquire in Hesse Cassel, and to exclude from its operation land, the subject of possible acquisition, in Bavaria and Darmstadt? If it was the intention that the agreement should operate beyond Hesse Cassel, I do not know on what theory we could say that it would operate in some foreign states and would not operate in others. The question, then, being one of intention, intention to be deduced from the language of the contract and the surrounding circumstances, it seems to me more reasonable to credit Peter Kleb with an intention to constitute his betrothed, in default of issue, the heir of all his real estate than the heir of such real estate only as he might thereafter have acquired in the narrow territories of Hesse Cassel. If I devise my realty to A., this means, not only my realty in New Jersey, but my realty elsewhere. If, for valuable consideration, I covenant that I will devise my property to A., I presume that, in the absence of restrictive words in other parts of the instrument, no one would contend that the covenant did not extend to lands in New York or California, independent sovereignties, so far as this question is concerned. If, by an antenuptial agreement, I agree to make my wife, in default of issue, heir or devisee of my future acquired estate, I am quite unable to understand why she should not take such real estate as I may be seised of at my death, not only in New Jersey, but elsewhere. It seems to me that such an agreement does speak to the very point. The cases uniformly hold that where, by the antenuptial agreement, it is shown to be the intention of the parties that its provisions shall apply to property without the matrimonial domicile, effect will be given to it everywhere, unless its execution be incompatible with the laws or public policy of the country in which its enforcement is sought. De Couche v. Savetier, 3 Johns. Ch.

190, 8 Am. Dec. 478; Lebreton v. Miles, 8 Paige, 261; Crosby v. Berger, 3 Edw. Ch. 538; Murphy's Heirs v. Murphy, 5 Mart. (O. S.) 83, 12 Am. Dec. 475; Scheferling v. Huffman, 4 Ohio St. 242, 62 Am. Dec. 281.

But it is argued that the contract must be regarded as local, because of the provision that "the parents of the persons engaged declare that they are willing to waive, in reference to this marriage contract, their rights to their obligatory shares." The argument is that this stipulation was local, and that consequently the entire contract must be deemed local. But in the first place there is no proof that it was local. The right to such shares may have been, and was, no doubt, accorded by other states comprised within what was then geographically designated Germany. It existed under the Roman law, and was given by the Code Napoleon, section 915 of which reads as follows: "Les libéralités par acte entre-vifs ou par testament ne pourront excéder la moitié des biens, si à défaut d'enfant, le défunt laisse un ou plusieurs ascendants dans chacune des lignes paternelles ou maternelles; et les trois quarts, s'il ne laisse d'ascendants que dans une ligne." Aside from this, the agreement is the independent agreement of the parents. They stipulate that, whatever right they may have to their obligatory shares, they are willing to waive. This is by no means equivalent to a declaration that their right to obligatory shares will extend to all the property that their children may acquire, so far as it may be subject to the antenuptial contract. That would be a strange construction that would restrict a general grant to the limits of the actual operation of a release by third persons. The release means simply this: Whatever right, if any, we may acquire in our children's property, that we are willing to waive. I am of opinion, therefore, that the antenuptial agreement extended to the property in question. It plainly appears that the subsequent acquisitions of the spouses were quite as much the result of Mrs. Kleb's labors as of her husband's; and Frederick Struberg testifies that often, in conversation after Kleb's return to Germany, he (Kleb) would refer to the antenuptial agreement as giving to the longest liver "the benefit of all we are worth." This evidence cannot influence its construction; but it shows, at least, that the result reached is not in conflict with the opinion of Mr. Kleb as expressed in the latter years of his life.

There were other questions raised, but in the view that I have taken of the case only one need be adverted to. That is the question of the admissibility of Mrs. Kleb's testimony of transactions with and statements by her husband. It was admitted under objection. The situation is this: Mrs. Kleb sues the heirs at law of her husband to enforce his contract in respect of lands descended. Are they being sued in a representative capacity? The question has been twice before the Court of Appeals, and

It has declined to pass upon it. Wyckoff v. Norton, 60 N. J. Eq. 474, 46 Atl. 614; Kempton v. Bartine, 60 N. J. Eq. 412, 45 Atl. 966. In this court Vice Chancellor Van Fleet (Crimmins v. Crimmins, 43 N. J. Eq. 88, 10 Atl. 800), Chancellor McGill (Vreeland v. Vreeland, 53 N. J. Eq. 390, 32 Atl. 3), and Vice Chancellor Emery (McKinley v. Coe, 66 N. J. Eq. 70, 57 Atl. 1030) have thought the evidence admissible, while Chancellor Runyon (Colfax v. Colfax, 32 N. J. Eq. 206), Vice Chancellor Pitney (Greenwood v. Henry, 52 N. J. Eq. 448, 28 Atl. 1053), and Vice Chancellor Grey (Kempton v. Bartine, 59 N. J. Eq. 153, 44 Atl. 461) have deemed it inadmissible. In this conflict of authority any expression of opinion on my part can have but little weight. It has seemed to me, however, that the reasons for its exclusion are stronger than those for its admission. Vice Chancellor Van Fleet's decision seems to rest upon an erroneous conception of what was decided by Beasley, C. J., in Hodge v. Coriell, 44 N. J. Law, 456. That this latter case was correctly decided no one can have any doubt. It was a replevin suit, and the wrongful act alleged was that of the defendant, not that of the defendant's intestate. Beasley, C. J., said: "The defendant in this writ is called to account for a tort in his own person. With regard to any estate represented by him, the plaintiff has no concern. The defendant could not be sued in this matter in his representative capacity." How, from a decision put upon this ground, viz., that defendant was being sued for a tort of his own, not for the wrongful act of his testator, it could be legitimately inferred that the heir at law is not being sued in a representative capacity, when the suit is based upon the act or contract of the ancestor, I am at a loss to understand. The inference appears to me to be an entire non sequitur. Chancellor McGill simply followed Vice Chancellor Van Fleet without giving the matter, as far as appears, independent consideration, and Vice Chancellor Emery thought himself bound by their opinion. On the other hand, it seems to me that the principle upon which Joss v. Mohn, 55 N. J. Law, 408, 26 Atl. 987, was decided leads to the opposite conclusion. There the action was brought by plaintiff against the devisees of Mohn to recover money lent to testator in her lifetime. Mr. Justice Reed said: "The primary question is, are heirs or devisees under the statute representatives of the deceased debtor? I think they are. Mr. Bouvier, in his Law Dictionary, under the title 'Representative,' uses this language: 'The heir represents the ancestor; the devisee, his testator; the administrator, his intestate. It seems entirely undeniable that in an action like the present the heir or devisee stands instead of, and so represents, the deceased debtor. The object of the statute is to subject the real estate of the deceased debtor to a liability for all classes of debts left unpaid by such debtor." It was held, in New Jersey Insurance Company v. Meeker, 37 N. J. Law, 282, that an action of covenant would lie, under the heirs' act, against heirs and devisees for a breach of covenant against incumbrances contained in a conveyance by an ancestor: that that act was "applicable to every obligation growing out of contract." Consequently, if an ancestor has made an agreement to convey real estate, an action to recover damages will lie for breach of it, and, under Joss v. Mohn, the heir in such action will be sued in a representative capacity. Now, if, in a suit at law, the heir is sued in a representative capacity, it would at least be singular if it were held that in a suit in equity between the same parties to compel a specific performance of the same contract the defendant was being sued in a nonrepresentative character. Are not the obligation and the person the same? Have we not the same ground of liability, viz., the immediate devolution upon the heir of property bound in one form or another to answer for the ancestor's obligation? The court in which relief may be sought and the particular species of relief asked for seem to be irrelevant considerations. That the court may look at the real character of the parties to a controversy is conclusively settled by Smith v. Burnet, 35 N. J. Eq. 314, and Adoue v. Spencer, 62 N. J. Eq. 794, 49 Atl. 10, 56 L. R. A. 817, 90 Am. St. Rep. 484. Hodge v. Coriell did not decide otherwise. All that it decided was that, when a defendant was sued for his own tort, he could not, by pleading, change the issue to one involving the acts of his intestate. Smith v. Smith, 52 N. J. Law, 207, 19 Atl. 255, rests upon much the same ground as Haines v. Watts, 55 N. J. Law, 149, 26 Atl. 572, and does not touch the question under consideration; and Palmtree v. Tilton, 39 N. J. Eq. 40, and Rairdon v. Sampson, 67 N. J. Law, 346, 51 Atl. 696, merely decide that the record determines the question of competency; that, if the person offered as a witness is not a party to the record, he is competent, no matter what his interest may be. The Court of Appeals has never decided, nor, as far as I can find, so much as intimated, that, if a person called as a witness appears by the allegations of the pleadings to be really sued in a representative capacity, the court may not exclude him, because the pleader has not, in so many words, called him administrator or heir or devisee, and has not expressly alleged that he proceeds against him in that character. In Smith v. Burnet, it decided just the reverse. If the pleadings or record state facts which show that he is suing or being sued in a representative character, then he is disqualified.

For these reasons, and for those stated by Vice Chancellor Grey in Kempton v. Bartine, supra, I should be disposed to exclude the greater part of Mrs. Kleb's testimony. But there is one part of it which seems to be competent. It appears that, since her husband's death, Mrs. Kleb went to the record in Hanau and there compared a copy of the antenuptial agreement with the original. She says she knows her husband's handwriting, and that the signature "W. P. Kleb" is his. This, I think, she may testify to. It is not evidence of a transaction with or statement by the deceased. In the absence of evidence to the contrary, it may reasonably be presumed that her knowledge of his handwriting was at least partly acquired in other ways than by transactions with him. I think Mrs. Kleb is entitled to a conveyance from the heirs of the legal title to the Broad Street property.

STATE v. TWINING et al.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 18, 1905.)

1. STATUTES—TITLE—SUBJECT-MATTER.

Section 17 of the act entitled "An act concerning trust companies" (Revision of 1899; P. L. 1899, p. 461), which makes it a misdemeanor for any director, officer, agent or clerk of any trust company to knowingly subscribe or exhibit any false paper with intent to deceive any person, authorized to examine as to the condition of such trust company, is not in conflict with article 4, § 7, subd. 4, of the state Constitution, which provides that every law shall embrace but one object, and that shall be expressed in its title.

2. SAME.

A penal clause in a general statute embracing a given subject, which simply provides for the punishment of the violation of the provisions of such act, is not the intermixing in such act of things which have no proper relation to each other.

3. BANKS AND BANKING—TRUST COMPANIES—REGULATION.

It is within the power of the Legislature, in enacting a general law for the creation, government, and control of all trust companies, to impose, under given conditions, certain limitations upon the powers granted, or to reserve to existing trust companies, brought under the act, certain powers already possessed by them under existing laws; and, to make it a misdemeanor for the officers of companies, brought under the general act, to do the things prohibited by the general statute, although the things made misdemeanors by the general law were not such under the act under which the trust company so brought under the general law was incorporated.

4. SAME—SUPERVISION—EXHIBITING FALSE PAPER.

The exhibiting of a false minute of an alleged meeting of the board of directors of a trust company to an examiner appointed by the banking department, with the intent to deceive such examiner as to the financial condition of the company, is the exhibiting of a false paper under the statute, and is a misdemeanor under section 17 of the general trust company act of 1899 (P. L. 1899, p. 461).

5. SAME—COMPLICITY.

Where one of two officers of a trust company produces a false minute to the examiner, in the presence of the other, who by his silence acquiesces in such exhibition, although he knows of its falsity, both are guilty of exhibiting under the statute.

6. CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE—BEST AND SECONDARY.

It is not error to permit an examiner of the banking department to testify that he was acting as such examiner when the false paper was exhibited. A public officer may testify that he is such officer, without producing his certificate of appointment or official commission.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Court of Quarter Sessions, Monmouth County.

Albert C. Twining and another were convicted of violating P. L. 1899, p. 450, and bring error. Affirmed.

Argued February term, 1905, before GUMMERE, C. J., and FORT and GARRETSON, JJ.

E. W. Arrowsmith, for plaintiffs in error.
H. M. Nevins, for the State.

FORT, J. The defendants were convicted in the Monmouth quarter sessions of exhibiting to an examiner of the state banking department a certain false paper, knowing it to be false, with the intent to deceive such examiner as to the condition of the Monmouth Trust & Safe Deposit Company, of which company Twining was the president and Cornell the treasurer. The false paper consisted of a typewritten copy of a minute of an alleged meeting of the board of directors of the trust company, which meeting was in fact never held. The minute purports to be an authorization for the purchase of 381 shares of the capital stock of the First National Bank of Asbury Park which was found by the examiner among the assets of the trust company. The jury found that the paper was exhibited, and the proof was conclusive that it was false. The indictment is founded upon the violation of section 17, of the trust company act of 1899 (P. L. 1899, p. 450).

The first contention of the defendant is that the section of the act under which the indictment is found is unconstitutional, in that it is a subject-matter, in the body of the act which is not embraced in its title. Const. art. 4, § 7, subd. 4. The title of the act is "An act concerning trust companies (Revision of 1899; P. L. 1899, p. 450). The section in question reads as follows: "Every director, officer, agent or clerk of any trust company who willfully and knowingly subscribes or makes any false statements of facts, or false entries in the books of such trust company, or knowingly subscribes or exhibits any false paper, with intent to deceive any person authorized to examine as to the condition of such trust company, or willfully or knowingly subscribes to or makes any false report, shall be guilty of a high misdemeanor and punished accordingly." If we fully comprehend the suggestion of counsel, it is, that a criminal offense cannot be provided for under the title of the act in this case, or, in fact, under the title of any act which does not specifically relate to the fact that a criminal offense is created by the body of the act. Does the act in question have more than one object? An examination of its provisions will show that they all refer to trust companies. They do not relate to banks or insurance companies, or other corporations. The penalty imposed by section 17 is limited in its effect to directors, officers, agents, or clerks of any trust company. It seems to us that all matters of formation, management, control, regulation, offenses, and penalties are germane to a statute which covers, and is intended to cover, an entire subject-matter, and that a statute embracing the whole subject-matter of trust companies, which is entitled "An act concerning trust companies" may constitutionally include a provision making it an offense to do or fail to do certain named things in the operation and management of a trust company by its directors, officers, agents, or clerks. By the uniform course of legislation in the state, since the adoption of the Constitution of 1844, it has been the practice by the Legislature to embody in acts relating to an entire subject-matter, penal provisions for the doing of things not permitted by the statute, or the doing of acts prohibited thereby. Upon almost every subject of general legislation this condition of the statute law of the state will be found to exist. Sections making certain acts misdemeanors are found in the banking act (P. L. 1899, pp. 438, 439, 441, §§ 12, 14, 21); the savings bank act (Gen. St. pp. 3008, 3014, §§ 46, 47, 83); the trust company act (P. L. 1899, pp. 460, 461, §§ 15-17); the building and loan act (P. L. 1903, p. 476, § 52); the oyster act (Gen. St. pp. 832, 834-836, §§ 140, 156, 158, 172); the chosen freeholder act (Gen. St. p. 434, § 142); the bottling act (P. L. 1891, p. 218); the acts for protection of graveyards and cemetery associations (Gen. St. p. 355, § 84; Id. p. 361, § 57); the civil rights act (Gen. St. p. 804, § 2); the food and drug act (Gen. St. p. 1178, § 94); the dentistry act (P. L. 1898, p. 119), a conviction under which act was sustained in State v. Chapman, 69 N. J. Law, 464, 55 Atl. 94, affirmed 70 N. J. Law, 339, 57 Atl. 391; the fish and game act (Gen. St. pp. 1593, 1595, §§ 177, 182, 192); the health act (Gen. St. pp. 1672, 1673, 1674, 1675, §§ 206-210, 216); the labor act (Gen. St. p. 1904, § 42); the gunpowder act (Gen. St. p. 1634); the honey industry act (Gen. St. p. 1685, § 3); the itinerant vendors' act (Gen. St. p. 1828, § 13); the justices act (Gen. St. p. 1870, § 25); and the intoxicating liquor act (Gen. St. pp. 1814, 1824, §§ 150, 200). In the act to regulate elections (revised 1898) penal sections are found from sections 188 to 213, inclusive (P. L. 1898, pp. 321-330). In the medicine and surgery act (Gen. St. pp. 2081, 2082, 2084, 2086, 2089, §§ 4, 14, 25, 30, 50), the pharmacy act (Gen. St. p. 2459, § 9), the revision of the tax act (P. L. 1903, p. 434, §§ 61-62), the warehouseman's act (Gen. St. p.

3746, § 7), and the oaths and affidavits act (Gen. St. p. 2329), many penal sections will be found, as also in the harbor masters' act (Gen. St. p. 2323, § 64), the pilots' act (Gen. St. p. 2472, § 65), the weights and measures act (Gen. St. p. 3753, § 13), and many others.

We are not prepared to overthrow all the penal clauses in practically all the general acts of the state, after a uniform practice of over half a century of treating such clauses as germane to statutes embodying but a single subject. We think where a penal clause, in a statute embracing a given subject, simply relates to and provides for the punishment of violations of the provisions of such act, that such a provision is not in conflict with article 4, § 7, par. 4, of the state Constitution, and that it is not essential to valid legislation against offenses created by such acts, that they should be enacted under the title of "An act for the punishment of crimes." The case chiefly relied upon to sustain the contention of the plaintiff in error was Shivers v. Newton, 45 N. J. Law, 469. An examination of this case will show it to sustain the view we take. The title of the act there was "An act to prevent the adulteration and to regulate the sale of milk." Mr. Justice Reed points out that under this title only penalties for adulterating milk could be embodied in the act, while the second section of the act imposed a penalty for the production of unwholesome milk by other methods. He says: "The latter prohibition is, in my judgment, clearly outside the object of the legislation as expressed in the title." The penalty imposed by the trust company act under which the defendants were convicted, relates to the duties of the officers of a trust company conducting business under the act, and to the punishment for the violation of those duties in any of the respects provided for in the act. This does not seem to us to be within the reasoning of Shivers v. Newton, supra.

The next contention is that the defendants were officers of the Monmouth Trust & Safe Deposit Company and were organized under the act of 1885, entitled "An act for the incorporation of safe deposit and trust companies" (P. L. 1885, p. 270), and that section 17 of the act of 1899 entitled "An act concerning trust companies," under which this indictment was found, does not apply to "safe deposit and trust companies," created under the act of 1885. In 1899 there was a revision of all the acts relative to trust and safe deposit companies, and separate statutes were passed for the organization of each and all trust companies and safe deposit company acts, and acts for the creation of safe deposit and trust companies were repealed. P. L. 1899, p. 450, P. L. 1899, p. 468; P. L. 1899, p. 474. The act of 1885 is expressly repealed by section 4 of the statute last cited. By section 8 of the repealing act, all vested rights of the companies organized under the acts repealed, are reserved with the right in the companies to continue to enjoy the rights and advantages which they then enjoyed (P. L. 1899, p. 475); and by section 30 of the trust company revision of 1899, it is expressly enacted that "the provisions of this act shall be applicable to and the words 'trust companies' when used in this act, shall be construed to include all trust companies, and all safe deposit and trust companies, heretofore organized under the laws of this state, whether by special charter or under general act or otherwise, as well as corporations hereafter organized under this act." This section also reserves to trust and safe deposit companies the rights and privileges they now possess. It is within the power of the Legislature, in passing a general act, to reserve and preserve rights and privileges existing in any class of corporations brought under the provisions of a general law. Such an act is not open to the objection of being special. Dickinson v. Board of Freeholders, (N. J. Err. & App.) 60 Atl. 220. Nor, to the contention that such a reservation is not embraced within the title of the act. Limitations upon a power granted by an act, or the reservation of powers existing in certain corporations brought under the act, in addition to those granted, are proper subject-matters to be embodied in a statute, where the powers relate to the class concerning which the legislation is enacted. All such provisions are germane to the subject-matter of the legislation embraced within the statute. It is clearly within the right of the Legislature, while reserving powers existing in a corporation, to provide that in the future exercise of such powers, the company or its officers shall be subject to certain restrictions, and liable to punishment for their violation. That is all that is done by this statute.

It was further argued that, conceding the statute under which this indictment is found, to be valid, the document exhibited in this case cannot be said to be a false paper within the meaning of the act, the contention being that "knowingly subscribes or exhibits any false paper" means negotiable paper, or some paper which is a part of the assets of the bank. We are unable to give this narrow construction to these words, in the connection in which they stand in the statute. We think it means what it says "subscribes or exhibits any false paper, with intent to deceive the examiner." Any other construction destroys all force to the word "subscribes," and any construction which sustains the theory that an offense exists by subscribing a false paper also upholds the construction that to exhibit such false paper to the examiner, with intent to deceive, is within the statute. But it is further insisted that "the false paper must be one that can deceive the examiner as to the financial condition of the corporation." We agree with that view. We think under the proof that in exhibiting this paper it was the purpose of the defendants to deceive the examiner as to the financial condition of the bank. The proof was that the stock, the purchase of which the false minute purported to authorize, was in fact the stock of the defendant and other officers and directors of the trust company. That at the time they actually entered the transaction upon the books of the trust company, the stock was worthless, the First National Bank of Asbury Park having failed. If this action of the board of directors had actually taken place, and the purchase been made in good faith, the trust company had not only lost the value of this stock, but was liable to assessment, as the owner of this stock, under the national banking act, in case of a deficit in the funds of the Asbury Park National Bank, while the defendants were released, not only to the trust company, but as stockholders in the Asbury Park National Bank for any deficiency assessment. They had shifted their worthless asset, and its contingent liability, upon the trust company. Did not that affect its financial condition? If the transaction did not occur, as the false minute alleged, then the defendants and the others interested with them in the stock matter, were liable to the trust company to reimburse it for the stock which they as officers had sold to the trust company, and fraudulently taken $45,000 of its funds to pay therefor, to themselves. An agent, such as these officers, cannot deal with the company (his principal), and pass over stock to it and take its funds in payment thereof. Whether the directors had authorized it, therefore, was of vital importance to the financial condition of the trust company, and to the examiner in reporting upon its financial condition. Its acceptance covered the fraud of the defendants and held the trust company to a bargain not otherwise legal, and relieved the defendants from liability to the trust company, for the fraudulent depletion of the assets of the trust company to the extent of their unlawful act in the matter. Without the false minute to exhibit the trust company could repudiate the transaction and hold the defendants for the whole amount. Upon the question of what was the true financial condition of the trust company the false minute was vital to the examiner.

The evidence, it is claimed, does not prove that the defendant Twining exhibited the false minute to the examiner. The testimony of the examiner was that he asked for the authority for this purchase. The proof was that Twining had dictated the false minute to his stenographer, and after it was written had placed it in the minute book. That he was present in an adjoining room when the examiner asked for it, and that the defendant Cornell told the examiner that it was in the minute book, and that either the examiner himself went and got the minute book or that Cornell handed it to him. The examiner says specifically that Cornell was present when he received the minute book with this false minute in it, and he thinks he handed it to him; that on the 14th day of February, the day he first went to the company, Twining, he thinks, told him it was the minutes of the board, but, if he did not do so on that day, he is positive he did on the 16th, which was the Monday following, and was while he was still examining the bank. Any statement by Twining before or after the minutes came into the hands of the examiner, and while he was examining the bank, that that was the minute of the board authorizing the purchase, was an exhibition of the minute. To state to the examiner that that was the minute, for the purpose of deceiving him as to the truth, was to exhibit the minute within the statute. In this connection reference should be made to the exception taken to the charge of the trial judge, that: "If you are satisfied that one produced the false minutes, and that with the consent of the other, he being present and by his silence acquiescing in it, with full knowledge that it was being produced and exhibited for the purpose of deceiving the examiner, Twining is just as guilty as Cornell." There was no error in this. In misdemeanors all are principals. Standing by while a co-misdemeanant does the act of exhibiting, makes you guilty. Both will be deemed to exhibit under such circumstances.

We see no error in including in the indictment the prefatory matter which is objected to. It is at most mere surplusage. The charge upon which the defendants were tried and the evidence introduced, was the exhibition of the false paper only. The indictment was not offered in evidence, and did not go to the jury. It could not have prejudiced in any way the trial of the defendants.

We find no error in the suggestion that the witness Vredenburg, who was the examiner, was permitted to testify to the fact that he was an examiner, and that the court did not require him to show written authority that he was authorized to examine the bank. The statute does not require the banking commissioner to appoint his examiners in writing. That he was examining for and by the direction of the banking department, was proved. About the fact there was no question. An official may testify that he is such official, without producing his certificate of appointment. Denn v. Pond, 1 N. J. Law, 379; Potter v. Luther, 3 Johns. 481; Berryman v. Wise, 4 Term R. 366; Brewster v. Vail, 20 N. J. Law, 56, 38 Am. Dec. 547; Reeves v. Ferguson, 31 N. J. Law, 107 (119); 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, §§ 83, 82.

The Cornell confession was properly admitted as against Cornell, and the court expressly limited its evidential force to Cornell, in admitting the evidence, and again on the request of counsel at the end of its charge. In the charge to the jury the court referred to the fact that the defendants did not see fit to go upon the stand in their own behalf and said, "because a man does not go upon the stand, you are not necessarily justified in drawing an inference of guilt. But you have a right to consider the fact that he does not go upon the stand where a direct accusation is made against him." This was not objectionable. State v. Parks, 61 N. J. Law, 438, 39 Atl. 1023; State v. Wines, 65 N. J. Law, 31, 46 Atl. 702.

The entire record is returned in this case; and, it not appearing that the defendants suffered manifest wrong or injury in the admission or rejection of evidence or the charge of the court, the judgment of the Monmouth quarter sessions is affirmed.

McDONALD v. CENTRAL R. CO. OF NEW JERSEY et al.

(Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey.
Nov. 20, 1905.)

1. CARRIERS—EJECTION OF PASSENGER.

The plaintiff, before purchasing a ticket at Elizabeth, inquired of the agent if a certain train stopped at Chester, was answered in the affirmative, and given a time-table showing that the train was scheduled to stop. Held, that the plaintiff had by the contract a right to have the train stop at Chester, and that his ejection at the last preceding station was wrongful.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Carriers, § 1068.]

2. SAME—PASSENGER—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

The plaintiff was familiar with the route, his ticket was a coupon ticket, of which certain coupons purported to be issued by the Central Railroad Company as agent, and he did not deny that he knew that the Central Railroad Company acted as to points beyond its own road as agent only. Held, that the relation of carrier and passenger did not exist between the plaintiff and the Central Railroad Company after the train left the Central road.

3. SAME.

Little v. Dusenberry, 46 N. J. Law, 614, 50 Am. Rep. 445, distinguished.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Supreme Court.

Action by Alexander McDonald against the Central Railroad Company of New Jersey and the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

George Holmes and William A. Barkalow, for plaintiff in error Central R. Co. Vredenburg, Wall & Van Winkle, for plaintiff in error Baltimore & Ohio R. Co. John K. English, for defendant in error.

SWAYZE, J. This is an action of tort. The first count of the declaration is for negligently misinforming the plaintiff as to the train which he should take to go from Elizabeth to Chester, Pa. The second count is for a wrongful ejection of the plaintiff at Philadelphia. The plaintiff recovered damages for the ejection, and judgment was entered against both companies.

Whether the ejection of the plaintiff was wrongful depends upon the contract. The material facts are as follows: Just before buying a ticket from Elizabeth to Chester, he inquired of the ticket agent at Elizabeth whether the train, which he afterward took, stopped at Chester, and was informed that it did. He then asked for a time-table and ticket and received both. The time-table purported on its face to be one of the Royal Blue Line, and bore the names of the Central Railroad of New Jersey, the Philadelphia & Reading Railway, and the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. There was no other proof as to the company by which it was issued. The time-table showed that the train stopped at Chester. No question arose until just before the train reached Philadelphia, when the conductor of the Philadelphia & Reading Railway informed the plaintiff that the train did not stop at Chester, and that he would have to change cars at Philadelphia. When the train reached the station in Philadelphia, the conductor of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad took charge. He came into the car with two policemen, inquired for the man who wanted to go to Chester, and told the plaintiff he would have to get off; to which the plaintiff replied that he would have to use force. The conductor grabbed the plaintiff by the shoulder, and the plaintiff thereupon left the car. The plaintiff had been in the habit of taking the same train, which had previously stopped at Chester.

It was not questioned on the trial or on the argument here that the ticket agent in Elizabeth was authorized to sell tickets from Elizabeth to Chester over the Central Railroad of New Jersey, the Philadelphia & Reading Railway, and the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. The ticket appears on its face to be issued by the Central Railroad, and has attached three going and three returning coupons in the usual form of a coupon ticket. The coupons between Bound Brook and Philadelphia purport to be issued on account of the Philadelphia & Reading, and the coupons between Philadelphia and Chester on account of the Baltimore & Ohio. It is not necessary to decide that the terms of the published time-table became by mere fact of publication a part of the contract, as was held by a majority of the Court of King's Bench in Denton v. Great Northern Railway, 5 Ellis & Blackburn, 860, and decided by the Court of Appeals in Le Blanche v. London & Northwestern Railway Company, 6 R. 1 C. P. D. 268, 45 L. J. C. P. 521, 5 English Ruling Cases, 392. The difficulty suggested by Mr. Pollock (Pollock on Contracts [7th Eng. Ed.] 18) does not arise in this case; for the stopping of the train at Chester was an express condition upon which the plaintiff bought his ticket, and the time-table showing that the train made the stop at Chester was handed him with the ticket. The fact that a time-table furnished by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad to the conductor (but not, as far as the case discloses, to the public or to the ticket agent at Elizabeth) showed that the train did not stop at Chester in no way alters the case. The train had been in the habit of stopping, and the time-tables of the ticket agent at Elizabeth bearing the name of the Baltimore & Ohio, and not denied to have been authorized by that company, showed such a stop. While the authority of the ticket agent to make the contract in question might be modified to correspond with the time-table furnished the conductor, there is no proof that it had been so modified. Whether it had been so modified was within the knowledge of the Baltimore & Ohio, and the failure to prove it justifies the inference that there had been no modification. The plaintiff had the right to assume that the train would stop at Chester as his contract required, and was not bound to believe the assertion of the conductor. He was entitled to make reasonable efforts to exercise his right. Runyan v. Central R. R. Co., 65 N. J. Law, 228, 232, 47 Atl. 422. He did no more than to require the conductor to make use of slight physical force, and yielded immediately, and left the car. We think the conduct of the conductor was actionable.

The question remains whether both defendants are liable. The conductor was in the employ of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, and it is liable for his acts on the principle respondeat superior. The other conductor, whose route ended at Philadelphia, was in the employ of the Philadelphia & Reading Railway Company. The only fact in the case to indicate liability on the part of the Central Railroad Company is the issue of the ticket. The plaintiff's case does not rest upon a tort of the ticket agent at Elizabeth, but upon the theory that the agent at Elizabeth had the right to make the contract and was therefore guilty of no wrong. The Central Railroad would be liable for a violation of its duty as a common carrier, if that relation existed at the time between the plaintiff and the company. Haver v. Central Railroad Company, 62 N. J. Law, 282, 41 Atl. 916, 43 L. R. A. 84, 72 Am. St. Rep. 647. Whether that relation existed depends on whether the Central contracted for the carriage of the plaintiff beyond its own line as principal or agent. The ticket states that in selling the ticket to points on other roads the company assumes no responsibility beyond its own road. It may be questioned whether this provision was assented to by the plaintiff, and if so, whether it operates to exempt the Central Railroad from its common-law liability, or only to negative the assumption of any further liability beyond its own road. This need not be determined, since the other facts sufficiently prove that the Central Railroad was, to the knowledge of the plaintiff, contracting only as agent as to transportation beyond its own road. The facts that there were separate coupons for different portions of the journey, that they bore the names in plain type of the connecting companies, and purported on their face to be issued, as far as the connecting roads were concerned, by the Central Railroad as agent only, and that the plaintiff was familiar with the route, justify the inference, in the absence of any denial from the plaintiff, that he knew that the Central Railroad was acting as agent only. The relation of common carrier and passenger did not exist as between the plaintiff and the Central Railroad Company after the train left the Central's road. The case differs from Little v. Dusenberry, 46 N. J. Law, 614, 50 Am. Rep. 445, and Dunn v. Pennsylvania R. R. Co., 71 N. J. Law, 21, 58 Atl. 164. In both those cases the relation of carrier and passenger existed between the parties at the time of the injury. The case resembles rather Alabama, etc., R. R. Co. v. Holmes, 75 Miss. 371, 23 South. 187. There is no evidence that the Central Railroad took any part in the management of the train beyond Bound Brook. As far as the case indicates, the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad was in sole charge of the train at the time the plaintiff was ejected. The legal position of the Central Railroad was similar to that of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company in Pennsylvania R. R. Co. v. Jones, 155 U. S. 833, 15 Sup. Ct. 136, 39 L. Ed. 176. There should have been a nonsuit as to the Central Railroad.

It is assigned as error that the court allowed the jury to award damages for the indignity and consequent injury to his feelings. This is the settled law in case of an unlawful eviction. Allen v. C. & P. Ferry Company, 46 N. J. Law, 198; D. L. & W. R. R. v. Walsh, 47 N. J. Law, 548, 4 Atl. 323. The case differs from the cases cited in the briefs for the plaintiffs in error. The present plaintiff had in his possession and showed the conductor a ticket which entitled him to be carried to Chester, and a time-table, apparently authorized by the company, which showed that the train was scheduled to stop at Chester. On the face of it, he was entitled to be let off at Chester, and the reason for the decision in the cases cited, growing out of the propriety of the conductor having evidence of the plaintiff's right, is wanting in the present case.

The judgment, however, is a joint judgment, and indivisible; and, since it must be reversed as to the Central Railroad Company, it must be reversed in toto. Peterson v. Middlesex & Somerset Traction Co., 71 N. J. Law, 296, 59 Atl. 456.

VAN COTT v. NORTH JERSEY ST. RY. CO.
(Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey.
Nov. 20, 1905.)

TRIAL — NONSUIT — INSUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

After the allowance of a bill of exceptions to the refusal of the trial court to nonsuit, the plaintiff for failure of proofs showing the negligence of the defendant's motorman, a witness produced on behalf of the defendant testified that the motorman, seeing the plaintiff in the act of crossing the street, slackened the speed of his car so as to bring it to a semi-halt, whereupon the plaintiff, who likewise had temporarily halted, made a swift run to cross the track in front of the car, but was struck by the car, to which "an extra burst of speed" had been imparted. Held, that after the admission of his testimony both the negligence of the motorman and the contributory negligence of the plaintiff became questions of fact for the jury, and that the refusal of the trial court to nonsuit the plaintiff for failure of proofs showing negligence is not reversible error, where such proofs are afterwards supplied by the defendant during the progress of the trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Essex County.

Action by Sarah Van Cott against the North Jersey Street Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Hobart Tuttle, for plaintiff in error. Samuel Kalish, for defendant in error.

GARRISON, J. The plaintiff, while crossing a public street in the city of Newark, was struck by a trolley car of the defendant, receiving injuries for which she recovered damages in the circuit court. Upon this writ of error brought to reverse the judgment of the circuit court, the assignment chiefly argued was the alleged error of the trial court in denying a motion to nonsuit, which was asked for at the close of the plaintiff's case, upon the ground that the negligence of the defendant's motorman was not legitimately inferable from the testimony. As the testimony stood at that time it is very questionable whether a case of negligence had been made out by the plaintiff. The matter, however, will not be pursued, for the reason that if there was such a failure in the plaintiff's proofs at the time the nonsuit was denied, such proof was afterwards supplied by the defendant.

Harry A. Vaughan, a witness called on behalf of the defendant, testified that "the child stood for a moment on the curb, and then made a couple of steps to walk in a diagonal direction across the street, and looked and saw the car, and then made a few steps, running style; the motorman rang the bell at that time, which attracted the child's attention, and she stood—the child stood—at the time when the bell rang."

"Ques. How far away from the first rail?
Ans. Well, I think it was about the first rail that she stopped. The car slackened speed at that time when the bell was ringing, the child stopped, and as the car slackened speed she made a swift run to cross the track in front of the car; the car had already started after she had remained stationary.

"Ques. How do you mean 'started'? Ans. Well, put on an extra burst of speed after having come to a semihalt."

From this testimony it might legitimately be inferred that the child and the motorman each saw the other; that the motorman, by slackening the speed of his car, led the plaintiff to believe that she could safely cross in front of it, and that under such circumstances the imparting of an extra burst of speed to the car after it had come to a semihalt was an act of negligence upon the part of the motorman. Upon the admission of this testimony the negligence of the motorman and the contributory negligence of the plaintiff became questions of fact for the jury, whatever may have been the state of the proofs at the close of the plaintiff's case.

The circumstance that this testimony came into the case after the denial of the motion to nonsuit displayed in the defendant's bill of exceptions does not militate against its application to the assignment of error based upon the exception to such refusal for the reasons stated in Bostwick v. Willett (N. J. Sup.) 60 Atl. 398. The rule established by the case there cited is that a refusal to nonsuit the plaintiff for failure of proofs is not reversible error where such proofs are afterwards supplied by the defendant during the progress of the trial.

No reversible error appearing in any of the reasons assigned, the judgment of the circuit court will be affirmed.

LIVERMORE et al. v. MAYOR, ETC., OF CITY OF MILLVILLE.

(Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey. Nov. 20, 1905.)

CERTIORARI—DEFECT OF PARTIES—DISMISSAL.

When it appears on the return of a certiorari, prosecuted to set aside municipal action, that parties not brought before the court have acquired rights thereunder in case such action be held valid, the court should ordinarily not proceed to judgment on the merits, and may either stay the proceedings until those parties are brought in or dismiss the certiorari.

Error to Supreme Court.

Certiorari by Nelson G. Livermore and others against the mayor and common council of the city of Millville. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

For opinion below, see 59 Atl. 217.

Henry O. Newcomb, Walter H. Bacon, Joseph H. Gaskill, and Robert H. McCarter, for plaintiffs in error. McLouis H. Miller, for defendant in error.

DIXON, J. The certiorari issued out of the Supreme Court in this case brought up a resolution of the common council of Millville appointing commissioners to determine the price to be paid by the city for the purchase of the water plant, etc., of the People's Water Company of Millville, under a certain contract between the city and that company. On the return of the writ, the prosecutors, who were residents and taxpayers in the city, filed reasons for reversal which question the validity and effect of the contract and the force due to the determination of the commissioners. The Supreme Court, after expressing its views on the legality of the reasons alleged, made an order dismissing the writ, of which the prosecutors now on error complain.

It is evident that the People's Water Company is directly and vitally interested in the matters which the prosecutors desire to put at issue, but they have not made that company a party to the proceedings. In its absence, the Supreme Court was not bound either to affirm or reverse the resolution brought before it; it would have been justified in staying the proceedings until the company had been made a party (McFall v. Dover, 70 N. J. Law, 518, 57 Atl. 136; Allen v. Freeholders of Hunterdon [N. J. Sup.] 58 Atl. 346); but certainly it acted within the bounds of its discretion when it dismissed the writ (Bowlby v. Dover, 64 N. J. Law, 184, 44 Atl. 844).

Without expressing any opinion whatever on the merits of the controversies presented by the reasons, we affirm such dismissal.

O'CONNOR v. INTERNATIONAL SILVER CO. et al.

(Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey. Nov. 20, 1905.)

1. CORPORATIONS—CONSOLIDATION—ELECTION OF DIRECTORS—VOTING SHARES.

Where corporation A has acquired all the capital stock of corporation B, and at the time of such acquisition corporation B owned and held a large number of the shares of the capital stock of corporation A, the officers and directors of neither corporation have the right, at a stockholders' meeting of corporation A, held for the purpose of electing directors of that corporation, to vote upon the shares of the stock of corporation A held by corporation B at the time of the acquisition of its stock by corporation A.

2. SAME — INJUNCTION — ACTION BY STOCKHOLDER.

An owner of shares of stock in corporation A, which he has held for several years, and who was entitled at the time of his purchase of the stock, and still continues to be entitled to have a certificate thereof issued to him, but has never exercised that right, and whose shares stand on the books of the company in the name of his grantor, who, however, has no interest therein, has a standing in a court of equity to ask the court to prevent corporation A or corporation B from voting upon such shares.

Appeal from Court of Chancery.

Bill by Michael P. O'Connor against the International Silver Company and the United States Silver Corporation. Decree for plaintiff (59 Atl. 321). Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

John W. Griggs, for appellants. Charles D. Thompson, for respondent.

GUMMERE, C. J. The complainant in this case seeks an injunction to restrain the defendants, the International Silver Company and the United States Silver Corporation, or either of them, from voting at the stockholders' meeting of the International Company upon certain shares of stock of that company purchased and now owned by the United States Corporation. The situation disclosed by the bill is that both of these companies are New Jersey corporations; that the United States Corporation, shortly after its formation in 1902, acquired and still holds about 90,000 shares of the common stock and about 5,000 shares of the preferred stock of the International Company; that shortly afterward the International Company purchased, and now owns, all of the stock of the United States Corporation; and that it is the purpose of these two companies that one or the other of them shall vote the International stock, held by the United States Corporation, at the annual meeting of the stockholders of the International Company to be held, shortly after the filing of the bill, for the purpose of electing a board of directors for the then ensuing year. The bill further shows that the complainant is the owner of 400 shares of the common stock of the International Company; that he acquired 300 shares of said stock on the 19th of May, 1902, and the other 100 shares on July 30th of the same year; and that, while said stock stands on the books of the company in the name of one Hart, it is only nominally in him, and belongs to and is owned by the complainant. Each of the companies demurred to the bill. They challenge the standing of the complainant to file the bill, for the reason, as they say, that he is not a registered stockholder of the International Company, and therefore is not qualified to maintain a stockholder's bill against them. They also contend that the facts herein recited do not afford ground for holding that neither the one company nor the other is entitled to vote this block of International stock at the annual meeting of the stockholders of that company.

The learned Vice Chancellor held against the demurrants on both points, and overruled the demurrer. We concur in the conclusion reached by him. We consider that the complainant, as the real owner of the stock of the International Company which he has acquired, has a sufficient standing to file the bill, notwithstanding that the stock has not been transferred to him upon the books of the company, and for the reasons which are given by the Vice Chancellor for his conclusion upon this point. We prefer to put our decision upon the other point of the case on a somewhat different ground from that expressed by the learned Vice Chancellor. The effect upon the United States Corporation of the purchase by the International Company of the whole issue of the stock of the United States Corporation ipso facto ousted the board of directors of the latter company. Section 39 of the corporation act (P. L. 1896, p. 290) declares that "no person shall be elected a director of any corporation issuing stock, unless he shall be, at the time of his election, a bona fide holder of some of the stock thereof; and any director ceasing to be a bona fide holder of some of the stock thereof shall cease to be a director. It also ousted the president of the corporation from his office, for, by the provision of section 13, p. 281, of the corporation act, the president must be a member of the board of directors. There was, therefore, at the time of the filing of the bill, no agency of the United States Corporation which could act for it in casting the vote upon the block of International stock held by it, and any attempt to do so by a person claiming to be its president, or the duly authorized agent of its board of directors, would be illegal, and an invasion of the rights of the complainant. The acquisition by the International Company of the whole of the stock of the United States Corporation carried with it to the International Company no right to vote upon the shares of its own stock belonging to the United States Corporation. By its acquisition of the United States Corporation stock, the International Company either did or did not become the owner of its own stock thus held by the United States Corporation. Whether it did or did not it is unnecessary to stop to inquire. If it did not, then plainly it is not entitled to vote upon the stock, for, by the express provision of the corporation act, owners of stock alone are entitled to vote upon it at a stockholders' meeting. The single exception is that declared by section 37, p. 290, of the corporation act, of a pledgee of hypothecated stock who has been expressly empowered to vote thereon by the owner. If, on the other hand, by its acquisition of the stock of the United States Corporation, the International Company became the owner of its own stock then held by the United States Corporation, its right to vote upon it at a stockholders' meeting is prohibited by section 38 of the corporation act (P. L. 1896, p. 290) which is in these words: "Shares of stock of a corporation belonging to said corporation, shall not be voted upon directly or indirectly."

The order appealed from should be affirmed.

SCHRAMM v. PARKER.

(Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey.
Nov. 20, 1905.)

NEGLIGENCE — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE — QUESTION FOR JURY.

Where doubt exists as to whether a person is guilty of contributory negligence in doing a particular act, alleged to be negligent, it is a question for the jury whether such act, when taken in connection with the other facts and circumstances in the case, is or is not an act of negligence which contributed to the injury.

Action by Henry W. Schramm, by his next friend, against Ellie Parker. Judgment for plaintiff (58 Atl. 1103), and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

William Earley, for plaintiff in error. Joseph H. Gaskill, for defendant in error.

FORT, J. This is an action of tort to recover for injuries suffered by the plaintiff, a boy nine years of age, by being run into upon the public highway by a horse and wagon of the defendant, driven by a servant of the defendant. Only one question is raised, namely: Did the trial judge commit an error in refusing to charge the defendant's request: "That, if the jury find that the boy did not look for wagons before running toward the wagon, he is guilty of contributory negligence, and cannot recover."

Where there is doubt whether a person is guilty of negligence which contributed to his injury, the question is for the jury. McLean v. Erie R. R., 69 N. J. Law, 57, 54 Atl. 238, S. C. 70 N. J. Law, 337, 57 Atl. 1132. Deeming on Negligence, § 403. The request in this case was too general. It asked the court to tell the jury that, if they found that the plaintiff did not look for wagons in the street before running toward a wagon, he was as a matter of law guilty of negligence which contributed to his injury, if thereby, he was injured. But it seems to me whether he was so guilty or not might not depend solely upon that isolated fact in the case. The evidence as to whether the plaintiff ran into, or even toward, the wagon, which injured him, is conflicting. Upon it reasonable minds differ. But, conceding the proof establishes the fact that the boy did run toward the wagon, still proximity and the speed at which the vehicle was going, and all the other circumstances surrounding his act in running toward the wagon, are factors entering into the question of whether the mere act of running toward the wagon without looking was or was not an act of negligence which contributed to his injury. The court was not required to tell the jury that, if they found but the single fact that the plaintiff ran toward the wagon without looking, they must find from that fact alone, without giving any force to the other facts and circumstances surrounding the act, that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence which contributed to his injury.

There was no error in refusing to charge as requested, and the judgment of the Supreme Court is affirmed.

Error to Supreme Court.

Action by John Morgan, Jr., against William J. Thompson and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Francis D. Weaver and H. D. Miller, for plaintiff in error. E. B. Leaming and T. J. Middleton, for defendants in error.

FORT, J. On October 31, 1902, the plaintiff made his promissory note for $3,000 to the order of G. C. Mick, payable at the Security Trust Company, of Camden, N. J. The note was without consideration. The note was subsequently indorsed by Mr. Mick and William J. Thompson, and discounted at the Security Trust Company, the proceeds thereof being placed to the credit of Mr. Thompson. The note not being made at its maturity, the trust company sued the plaintiff upon it and recovered a judgment thereon, which the plaintiff paid, with interest and costs. This suit was instituted to recover from Mick and Thompson the money so paid.

At the trial it was testified by the plaintiff that the note was made, at the request of Mick and Thompson, to raise money for their purposes, and that at the time the plaintiff gave the note they had promised him that they would pay it and he would hear no more about it. On the plaintiff's proof it was clear that the defendants had received the proceeds of the note, and that the plaintiff was a mere accommodation maker. When the plaintiff rested his case, a judgment of nonsuit was entered on the ground that under the proof it was an effort to establish by parol a contract different from that shown by the written instrument. We think this was a misconception of the true nature of the suit, and was error. This is not a suit upon the note, but a suit for so much money paid for the use of the defendants. The note is a mere item of evidence in the transaction. This note was not enforceable against the maker in the hands of either Mick or Thompson. If either of them had sued the maker upon it, the real transaction could have been shown. Since the passage of the negotiable instrument act evidence is admissible, even between indorsers, to show that as between themselves they have agreed as to the liability otherwise than as appears from the order of their indorsement upon the note. The note is only prima facie evidence of the order of liability. P. L. 1902, p. 596, § 68. As between the original parties, the consideration of a note may always be inquired into, and parol evidence is admissible for that purpose. Edwards on Bills and Notes (2d Ed.) p. 55. Chaddock v. Vanness, 35 N. J. Law, 520, 10 Am. Rep. 256. Prof. Edwards states the rule this way: "Where one man lends his note to another, and is afterwards obliged to pay and take it up, the law implies a promise on the part of the borrowers to indemnify the maker, though the maker cannot sue the borrower on the note itself. The note is a mere item of evidence." Edwards on Bills and Notes (2d Ed.) p. 356. Griffith v. Reed, 21 Wend. 502 (505) 84 Am. Dec. 267.

The nonsuit in this case was error, and should be reversed, and a venire de novo awarded.

PITNEY, J. Plaintiff was a tenant of the defendants, occupying an apartment in a building owned by them in Jersey City. There were several apartments in the building, and these were separately rented out by defendants to different families. The halls and stairways of the building were used in common by the several tenants. While descending one of these stairways, the plaintiff stumbled and fell, sustaining personal injuries. This action was brought to recover compensation therefor from the landlords, upon the ground that the plaintiff's fall was due to the bad condition of the stair covering. The verdict and consequent judgment were in favor of the plaintiff. There were motions for nonsuit and for direction of a verdict in favor of the defendants, both of which were denied. They were based in part upon the ground that the plaintiff knew, or ought to have known, the condition of the stair covering, and either had assumed the risk or by his own negligence had contributed to his injury. These grounds were untenable; there being at least disputable questions of fact for the jury's determination with respect to the plaintiff's knowledge of the condition of the stairs and with respect to his care while using them. The motions were based also upon the ground that there was no liability on the part of the landlords for the condition of the staircase. The learned trial justice, having refused the motions, submitted the case to the jury with this instruction: That since the building was occupied by several families, who had the use of the halls and stairways in common, there rested upon the defendants the duty of using reasonable care to keep the halls and stairways in proper condition for the common use of the tenants. To this instruction, as well as to the denial of the motions, exception was duly sealed.

In this state it is established as a general rule that the landlord is not liable for injuries sustained by a tenant or his family or guests by reason of the ruinous condition of the premises demised; there being upon the letting of a house or lands no implied contract or condition that the premises are or shall be fit and suitable for the use of the tenants. So it was held by the Supreme Court in Naumberg v. Young, 44 N. J. Law, 331, 344, 43 Am. Rep. 380, Mullen v. Ranier, 45 N. J. Law, 520, 523, Clyne v. Helmes, 61 N. J. Law, 358, 39 Atl. 767, and Land v. Fitzgerald, 68 N. J. Law, 28, 52 Atl. 229, and by this court in Murray v. Albertson, 50 N. J. Law, 167, 18 Atl. 394, 7 Am. St. Rep. 787. But it is recognized that this rule does not apply to those portions of his property (such as passageways, stairways, and the like) that are not demised to the tenant, but are retained in the possession or control of the landlord for the common use of the tenants and those having lawful occasion to visit them; the ways being used as appurtenant to the premises demised. With respect to such ways, it has been held by our Supreme Court that the landlord is under the responsibility of a general owner of real estate who holds out an invitation to others to enter upon and use his property, and is bound to see that reasonable care is exercised to have the passageways and stairways reasonably fit and safe for the uses which he has invited others to make of them. Gillvon v. Rellly, 50 N. J. Law, 26, 11 Atl. 481; Gleason v. Boehm, 58 N. J. Law, 475, 34 Atl. 886, 32 L. R. A. 645. This doctrine, we think, is indubitably sound. It is in no wise opposed to the rule which exempts the landlord from liability for the condition of premises that are demised, but is plainly distinguishable therefrom. In the case of a demise the entry and occupancy are pursuant to an estate vested in the tenant, and are exclusive of the landlord; while in the case of passageways and stairways that are retained in the legal possession of the landlord, and are simply used by the tenants as appurtenances to the property demised to them, their ingress and egress are by virtue either of invitation or of necessity. This is the ground of the distinction as pointed out in Looney v. McLean, 129 Mass. 33, 37 Am. Rep. 295, cited with approval in Gillvon v. Rellly, 50 N. J. Law, 26, 11 Atl. 481. In Phillips v. Library Co., 55 N. J. Law, 307, 27 Atl. 478, which was a case of one of several tenants of a building injured while using a path to the rear that was arranged for the common use of the tenants, this court affirmed the responsibility of the landlord for the condition of the path.

The judgment under review should be affirmed.

Error to Circuit Court, Hudson County.
Action by Johanna Ryan against the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Company and the Morris & Essex Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants bring error. Reversed.

John J. Fallon, for plaintiff in error.
Bedle, Edwards & Thompson, for defendants in error.

PITNEY, J. The record discloses that one Levering was in possession of the second floor of a tenement house in Jersey City under lease from the defendants or one of them. The house was a three-story building, each floor rented to and occupied by a different family. The only water-closets pertaining to the premises were situate in the rear yard. There were two of these, used indiscriminately by the tenants of the several floors of the building. Neither of the closets was covered by Levering's lease. Mrs. Ryan, the plaintiff, was a sister of Mrs. Levering, and visited the premises for the purpose of doing her washing. While there she had occasion to go to the closet in the rear, and as she entered it the floor gave way through rottenness, precipitating her into the vault and injuring her somewhat seriously. She brought this action to recover damages for the personal injuries, and upon the trial was nonsuited. This judicial ruling is sought to be sustained upon the ground that there was no covenant, express or implied, on the part of the landlord that the demised premises should be fit or suitable for use, and no liability on the part of the landlord for injuries sustained by the tenant or a servant of the tenant by reason of the ruinous condition of the premises.

The bill of exceptions renders it clear, however, that the closet in which the plaintiff was injured was not a part of the premises demised to her employer, but was retained in the possession of the landlord, subject to the common use of the tenants by the landlord's permission. The duty therefore rested upon the landlord to exercise care about the condition of the closets. Since there was evidence from which the jury had a right to believe that there was a want of care on the landlord's part in this regard, and that the plaintiff was injured by reason thereof, without negligence on her part, the present case is governed by the rule laid down in Siggins v. McGill (decided by this court at the present term) 62 Atl. 411, and the nonsuit was erroneous.

Counsel for defendants in error insist that there is neither privity of contract nor privity of estate between the owner of the property and the servant or visitor of one of the tenants, and cite Clyne v. Helmes, 61 N. J. Law, 358, 39 Atl. 767, as authority for the proposition that the landlord is exempted from liability to others than his tenant. But the opinion in that case (at page 368 of 61 N. J. Law, and page 771 of 39 Atl.) makes it clear that the exemption does not apply to cases where the liability of the landlord rests upon invitation.

The judgment under review should be reversed, and a venire de novo awarded.

GUINN v. DELAWARE & A. TELEPHONE CO.

(Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey.
Nov. 20, 1905.)

TELEPHONE COMPANIES—NEGLIGENCE—ELECTRIC LIGHT WIRE—INJURIES TO PEDESTRIAN.
A telephone company maintained a guy wire in such a position that it was likely to and did become crossed with an electric light wire and charged with a deadly current of electricity. The guy wire broke, and the decedent came in contact with it and was killed. He was at the time in an open field, which the public were accustomed to cross without objection by the landowner. Whether he was there of right or as a trespasser did not appear. Held:

1. That the telephone company was under a duty to the decedent to exercise care, even if he was a trespasser as between himself and the landowner.

2. That the jury might infer negligence from the omission of a guard between the electric light wire and the guy wire.

3. That the telephone company was not excused because the danger arose after the construction of the telephone line and was due to the running of the electric light wire below the guy wire; the care required changed with the changed circumstances.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Supreme Court.

Action by William Guinn, administrator of William C. Guinn, against the Delaware & Atlantic Telephone Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

E. A. Armstrong, for plaintiff in error.
Peter Backes, for defendant in error.

SWAYZE, J. William C. Guinn, a lad 13 years of age, was killed by contact with a guy wire charged with electricity. The wire was of a character used for telephone construction, copper wire of a tensile strength of 250 pounds. It was attached to a pole on which were strung wires of the defendant alone. There was no proof except by inference that the defendant erected or owned the pole or had attached the wire. In answer to an interrogatory, the defendant stated that the wire had been inspected May 27 or 28, 1904, about three weeks before the injury. No testimony was offered by the defendant. The trial judge left it to the jury to say whether the wire was put there by the servants of the defendant. We think there was sufficient evidence to warrant the inference that such was the fact. The injury was caused by the guy wire breaking and falling on an electric light wire belonging to another company. The broken end fell in the grass in a field belonging to Gulick. Across this field people were accustomed to travel without objection, but as far as appears without other right. The boy's body was found still in contact with the guy wire shortly after the shock. It does not appear that he had any right to be on Gulick's property, except such as may be inferred from the facts stated. The contention of the defendant is that it was under no duty to the decedent for the reason that he was a trespasser on Gulick's property or at best a mere licensee. The liability of the defendant rests upon the fact that it was maintaining wires which might become charged with a deadly current of electricity. New York & New Jersey Telephone Co. v. Bennett, 62 N. J. Law, 742, 42 Atl. 759; Brooks v. Consolidated Gas Co., 70 N. J. Law, 211, 57 Atl. 398.

The duty to exercise care is established as to travelers upon the highway and employees of the defendant or of another company who in the exercise of their rights are likely to come in contact with the wires, and of persons who are lawfully in a place of proximity to the wires. The question presented in this case is whether the duty exists also as to third persons who are not at the time in the exercise of any legal right. The principle underlying the case is stated by Chief Justice Beasley, in Van Winkle v. American Steam Boiler Company, 52 N. J. Law, 240, 247, 19 Atl. 472, to be that in all cases in which any person undertakes the performance of an act which, if not done with care and skill, will be highly dangerous to the persons or lives of one or more persons, known or unknown, the law, ipso facto, imposes as a public duty the obligation to exercise such care and skill. The test of the defendant's liability to a particular person is whether injury to him ought reasonably to have been anticipated. In the present case, the guy wire was stretched over an open field across which people were accustomed to travel without objection by the landowner. The adjoining field was used as a ball ground. It was probable that, if the guy wire broke, some one crossing the field would come in contact with it. That whoever did so was a trespasser or a bare licensee, as against the landowner, cannot avail the defendant. If a bare licensee, he would still be there lawfully. If a trespasser, his wrong would be to the landowner alone, not a public wrong, nor a wrong to the defendant.

The case differs from one where a trespasser or licensee seeks to recover of the landowner. A landowner may, in fact, reasonably anticipate an invasion of his property, but in law he is entitled to assume that he will not be interfered with. His right to protect his possession and to use his property is paramount. It is these considerations which led this court to deny the liability of the defendant in the turntable cases. Turess v. N. Y. S. & W. R. R., 61 N. J. Law, 814, 40 Atl. 614; D. L. & W. R. R. v. Reich, 61 N. J. Law, 835, 40 Atl. 682, 41 L. R. A. 831, 68 Am. St. Rep. 727; and in Friedman v. Snare & Triest Co. (N. J. Err. & App.) 61 Atl. 401. The general rule is that a person is liable for those results of his negligence which are reasonably to be anticipated. The exemption of the landowner from liability as to trespassers and licensees is necessary to secure him the beneficial use of his land; but no reason exists for extending this exemption to the case where the rights of the defendant have not been interfered with. There is no proof that the defendant had any right to maintain the pole and wire; but, even if it had, the deceased is not shown to have interfered with the defendant's rights. The right to maintain the pole and wire did not include the right to have the wire swing loose or occupy another portion of the field. Whoever interfered with the pole and wire in place, might be a trespasser, but he would not be a trespasser upon the defendant's rights if he came in contact with the wire elsewhere.

The trial judge in his charge rested his refusal to nonsuit upon the theory that the defendant had no right to stretch the guy wire, and he therefore refused to charge that the mere fact that the boy was there as a licensee defeated the plaintiff's right to recover. We think that even if the defendant had a right to stretch the guy wire, the plaintiff might still be entitled to recover. There was no error in the refusal to charge. The judge was asked to charge that the jury must be satisfied by the greater weight of the testimony that the defendant company was negligent, or the verdict must be for the defendant. He charged that it must appear by the weight of probabilities that the defendant's servants put the guy wire there. He then left it to the jury to say whether the defendant was negligent in doing something which it did, or in leaving undone something which it should have done.

In a case where the testimony was in conflict, the defendant would be entitled to have this request charged; but in the present case, there was no conflict of testimony, and the only question was whether the jury would draw an inference of negligence from undisputed facts. Under the decision of this court in Newark Electric Co. v. Ruddy, 62 N. J. Law, 505, 41 Atl. 712, 57 L. R. A. 624, affirmed 63 N. J. Law, 357, 46 Atl. 1100, 57 L. R. A. 624, in the absence of explanation by the defendant of the cause of the breaking of the wire, no other inference was open. The present case is even stronger, for here there was proof that the wire was of less tensile strength, though of greater durability, than the wire ordinarily used for that purpose. It was permissible for the jury to infer that the omission of a guard between the electric light wire and the guy wire was an act of negligence. Rowe v. N. Y. & N. J. Telephone Co., 66 N. J. Law, 19, 48 Atl. 523. Although the danger arose after the construction of the telephone line, and was due to the running of the electric light wires below the guy wire, the care required of the telephone company changed with the changed circumstances. Rowe v. N. Y. & N. J. Telephone Co., 66 N. J. Law, 19, 48 Atl. 523.

In re FOLWELL'S ESTATE.

(Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey.
Nov. 20, 1905.)

WILLS—MARRIED WOMAN—RIGHTS OF HUSBAND IN PERSONALTY.

The will of a married woman, who, under our statute, has power to dispose of her personal property absolutely, even as against her husband, which devises and bequeaths all her estate, real and personal, to another, subject to the legal rights of her husband if he survives her, and which appoints another than her husband as executor, does not give to the husband, in the case of his survival, any right to the personality so bequeathed, as such a right is purely equitable, and is not one of his legal rights in his wife's estate.

Swayse, Pitney, Vredenburg, and Green, JJ., dissenting.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Prerogative Court.

In the matter of the estate of Susan M. Folwell, deceased. From a judgment of the Prerogative Court (59 Atl. 467), the executrix appeals. Affirmed.

Norman Grey, for appellant. John F. Harned, for respondent.

FORT, J. This is an appeal from the Prerogative Court, and there is but a single question for decision, namely, does the last will and testament of Susan M. Folwell bequeath her personal estate to her daughter, Elsie, absolutely?

The following is the will: "Know all men by these presents that I, Susan M. Folwell, of Atlantic City, New Jersey, being of sound and disposing mind and memory, do make and publish this my last will and testament, hereby revoking all former wills made by me. I direct that all my just debts and funeral expenses be paid as soon as convenient after my decease. I give and bequeath to my son, Robert Lincoln Folwell, my white trotting horse, Eagle, with his harness and spindle wagon. I give, devise, and bequeath unto my daughter, Elsie Maynard Folwell (subject to the legal rights of my husband, Thomas G. Folwell, should he survive me) all the rest, residue, and remainder of my estate absolutely. I nominate, constitute, and appoint my said daughter, Elsie Maynard Folwell, sole executrix of this, my last will and testament. In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal this eighteenth day of March, A. D. 1895. Susan M. Folwell. [Seal]"

Thomas G. Folwell, the husband of the testatrix, survived her. The will was duly probated, and letters testamentary thereon granted to Elsie M. Folwell, as executrix, on October 23, 1902. The grant of these letters stands unrevoked and unappealed from. All the personal estate passed into the hands of the executrix, and she claims the right to retain it under the residuary clause of the will, except as to that specifically bequeathed to others. The executrix has never filed an inventory of the estate, and the husband filed a petition in the Atlantic county orphans' court for an order to require her to do so. The orphans' court made the order, and it was affirmed in the Prerogative Court.

If, under the will of the testatrix, Elsie took absolutely all the personality not specifically bequeathed, she is not required to file an inventory. P. L. 1898, p. 759, § 120.

The opinion of the ordinary in this case correctly construes our statute as to the right of a married woman to bequeath her personal property and to deprive her husband, by her will, of all interest therein; and it is not necessary to further discuss that question. The act of 1874 is clear upon that point. Gen. St. vol. 2, p. 2014. Did the parenthetical clause in the residuary item of the will of Susan M. Folwell defeat the right of Elsie to the personal estate, owing to the survival of the husband? This clause gave the whole of the residue of the estate of the testatrix to her daughter, Elsie, "subject to the legal rights of my husband, Thomas G. Folwell, should he survive me." What did he take under this clause? By the plain words of the will he was to get only such rights as were "legal rights." It is clear that under this will all legal rights in the personality of the testatrix passed to the executrix. She holds the legal title and the jus disponendi.

The executor, once appointed under the will of a wife duly probated, takes the legal title to her personality, and the husband cannot be appointed administrator, except and until after the probate and order appointing the executor have been set aside by appeal. If he be appointed administrator after such probate and appointment, the proceeding is void. Ryno's Ex'r v. Ryno's Adm'r, 27 N. J. Eq. 522. An executor is a trustee, required to account for funds coming to his hands. He cannot be sued at law for an alleged beneficial interest which may be claimed by one in the estate of his testator. He may be required to account in equity or in the manner pointed out by the orphans' court. P. L. 1898, pp. 757-778, §§ 116-168. A right to an accounting by an executor is an equitable right only. The party holding the legal title to property only has a right to seek a remedy at law, even though he have no beneficial interest therein. The equitable owner is he who has not the legal estate, but is entitled to the beneficial interest. Bouvier, vol. 2, p. 24, "Legal Estate." The effect of a general probate of the will of a deceased married woman is only to enable the executor to get in all the assets of the wife, whether she have power to dispose of them or not, and it does not effect the beneficial title to them. Williams on Ex'rs, vol. 1, p. 465. Where a wife makes a will, giving all her personal estate to her husband, but appoints another than her husband as executor, the executor takes the legal title, and the equitable or beneficial estate only is in the husband under the will. When, therefore, a wife declares by her will that it is her purpose to give all of her estate to a named person, "subject only to the legal rights" of her husband therein, should he survive her, and where, by a statute, she has full power to bequeath her personal property absolutely, even as against her husband, as she may by our statute, she, by such a will, cuts off all the equitable or beneficial interest of her husband in her personal estate, and leaves to him only such rights in her estate as are purely legal and enforceable by suit at law. All beneficial or equitable interests are cut off by such a will.

A legal right is a claim recognizable and enforceable at law. English Law Dec., p. 700; Avery v. Dufrees, 9 Ohio, 147. "Legal" is defined as according to the principles of law; according to the method required by statute; by means of judicial proceedings; not equitable. Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, vol. 18, p. 807. The right of the husband to an accounting by the executrix is purely an equitable one, to have the amount due him settled and fixed, and, when it is ascertained, that it be decreed that the fund be paid to him. In suits affecting funds in the hands of executors, the executor only is a necessary party. He represents the legatees under the will. It is unnecessary to join the person to whom the funds may go. Sweet v. Parker, 22 N. J. Eq. 456. This rule could not exist but for the fact that the executor holds the "legal title" to the personal property coming into his hands. It may be, as it no doubt is, a naked legal title; but it is the legal title, nevertheless. Legatees under the will can only claim as equitable owners, not legal. Their rights are all equitable, and can only be enforced in the manner pointed out by the statute, or under equitable rules. There is no "legal right" in a legacy under a will. We think the will of Susan M. Folwell cut off all equitable or beneficial interests or rights which her husband had in her estate, and that he has, therefore, no equitable interest in the personal estate which entitles him to call upon the executrix for an accounting.

I shall vote for the reversal of the decree of the Prerogative Court, and of the Atlantic county orphans' court, and to remit the record, with directions that the petition filed by Thomas G. Folwell in the Atlantic county orphans' court for an accounting by the executrix of Susan M. Folwell be dismissed.

SWAYZE, J. (dissenting). I am not able to agree with the result in this case. The testatrix intended to reserve something for her husband, and therefore made the devise and bequest to her daughter, subject to the legal rights of her husband. To hold that this clause related only to his right of curtesy makes it entirely superfluous, for she could not dispose of that, and it was unnecessary for her to say that the gift to the daughter was subject to that right. The construction adopted by this court also ignores the fact that the bequest, as well as the devise, was subject to the legal rights of the husband. In a will using terms of art in a technically correct sense, as this will does, the use of the word "bequeath" in connection with the words "subject to the legal rights of my husband" seems to me of some significance. The construction adopted by the ordinary gives a meaning to all the words of the will. That adopted by this court, I think, falls in this respect.

Again, the opinion defines a legal right as a claim recognizable and enforceable at law. Even if we ignore the right of the husband to his wife's chattels, and look only to his right to her choses in action, on which he must administer in case of intestacy, this right is, I think, a legal right. An action at law can be maintained under our statute for a legacy (Gen. St. p. 1938, "Legacies," § 1) and for a distributive share (Orphans' Court Act, § 168; P. L. 1898, p. 778). The fact that proceedings may also be taken before other tribunals does not prevent the right from being a legal right within the definition of the opinion. The words seem to have been used by one familiar with legal terms. At the date of this will two cases had been decided in the Court of Chancery, in which the words were used in connection with wills of married women. In Freeland's Executors v. Ryno's Executor, 28 N. J. Eq. 160-163, they were used by Chancellor Runyon in discussing the power given by the act of 1864 to married women to make wills, and he used them as applying to both real and personal property. And in Beals' Executor v. Storm, 28 N. J. Eq. 372, 378, he used them in the same sense. I think the draftman of this will followed these judicial precedents. The husband's right is more than a mere right to administer, or to call an executor to account. It is a right to sue at law for a legacy in case of a will, or for the personal estate, after payment of debts and costs of administration, in a case of intestacy, where some one else administers.

I think the decree should be affirmed.

PITNEY, VREDENBURGH, and GREEN, JJ., concur in this view.

GARDNER & MEEKS CO. v. NEW YORK CENT. & H. R. R. CO.

(Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey.
Nov. 20, 1905.)

1. MECHANICS' LIENS—RIGHTS OF SUBCONTRACTOR.

Under Mechanic's Lien Law (P. L. 1898, p. 538) § 1, where the building contract is not filed, a lien may be claimed for materials furnished to a subcontractor to enable him to carry out his part in the construction of a building pursuant to the owner's contract with the principal contractor.

2. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—DUE PROCESS OF LAW—MECHANIC'S LIEN LAW.

The mechanic's lien law is not unconstitutional, as depriving the owner of his property without due process of law, nor as interfering with his right to acquire, possess, and protect property.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Hudson County.
Action by the Gardner & Meeks Company against the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant railroad company brings error. Affirmed.

Edmund W. Wakelee and Vredenburg, Wall & Van Winkle, for plaintiff in error. Charles E. Hendrickson, Jr., for defendant in error.

PITNEY, J. This is an action upon a mechanic's lien claim brought by the Gardner & Meeks Company (plaintiff below) against the Chert Stone Company, as builder, and the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Company, as owner. The latter company alone made defense, and the only controversy raised was under its statutory plea that the building and lands in question were not liable to the builder's debt. Upon the trial in the circuit court it appeared that the railroad company had made a written contract with one Crowe for erecting the building in question and furnishing the materials therefor. This contract was not filed until after the materials in question in this suit were furnished. Crowe made a subcontract with the Chert Stone Company for the execution of a part of his contract with the railroad company, including the furnishing of materials. The stone company, in undertaking to perform their subcontract, purchased of the plaintiffs the materials upon which their mechanic's lien claim is based. The sole ground of defense was that a mechanic's lien cannot be claimed in favor of a person supplying materials to a subcontractor, but that the right of lien, under the first section of the mechanic's lien law (P. L. 1898, p. 538), is restricted to the principal contractor and to those who do work for him and furnish materials directly to him.

The language of the section is broad. It declares that every building shall be liable for the payment of any debt contracted and owing to any person for labor performed or materials furnished for the erection and construction thereof, which debt shall be a lien on such building, etc. In Van Pelt v. Hartough, 31 N. J. Law, 332, Beasley, C. J., declared: "This provision is so comprehensive that, if it had been left unconfined by subsequent restrictions, a lien would have been given to all persons who, under any circumstances whatever, performed any labor in the erection of a building, or whose materials entered into its structure." In Murphey-Hardy Lumber Co. v. Nicholas, 66 N. J. Law at page 417, 49 Atl. at page 449, Justice Collins said: "The normal effect of this legislation is to subject lands upon which a building is erected, by authority of the owner, to a lien in favor of any one who furnishes labor or materials therefor. To limit this effect strict compliance with the proviso of the second section of the act is essential." In Coddington v. Drydock Co., 31 N. J. Law at page 482, Justice Vredenburg, speaking for this court, put the rationale of the mechanic's lien upon its fundamental basis, viz.: "To hold a lien on the estate of the owner of the building in the land, on account of the increased value given by the building to the land, and the natural injustice there is in the owner of the land appropriating to his use, without compensation, the toil and capital of others." It is true that under the language of the first section of our mechanic's lien law it has been held that, if materials are furnished for the erection of a building, the mere fact that they are not used in the building does not defeat the lien thereon. Morris County Bank v. Rockaway Mfg. Co., 14 N. J. Eq. 189, cited with approval in Campbell v. Taylor Mfg. Co., 64 N. J. Eq. 347, 51 Atl. 723. But this does not at all impair the force of the view declared by Justice Vredenburg.

The argument for the plaintiff in error lays especial stress upon the words "contracted and owing" in the first section of the act. It is insisted that this expression limits the benefit of the first section to those whose debts are contracted by one who has authority to contract such indebtedness. While it is conceded that the master builder may subject the building to a lien for a debt contracted by him, it is insisted that his subcontractor cannot do the like. This argument proves too much, for, if the force of the first section is to limit the lien to debts contracted by persons who, in the absence of the statute, would have authority to bind the land, it would debar all claims saving such as were contracted by the owner himself. It is manifest that the Legislature had no such intent, for section 2, by limiting the lien to the contractor alone where the contract is in writing and properly placed on file, distinctly recognizes that in the absence of that formality there may be a lien by virtue of section 1 in favor of parties not standing in privity of contract with the owner. Section 16 (page 543) which prescribes the form of the lien claim, plainly recognizes that the party contracting the debt may be some other person than the owner of the land, or his immediate contractor, for it not only requires a separate statement of the name of the owner and the name of the builder, but it defines the latter term as meaning not necessarily the person employed by the owner to construct the building, but the person who contracted the debt, or for whom or at whose request the "labor was performed or the materials furnished." And section 23 (page 547) provides for combining a personal action for the recovery of the debt with an action quasi in rem for the enforcement of the lien, prescribing that the process shall be against the builder and the owner, or, if the owner contracted the debt, then against him as both builder and owner.

In short, as we construe the act, section 1 gives a lien to any person who performs labor or furnishes materials for the erection and construction of the building, irrespective of privity of contract with the owner or with the owner's contractor. This does not mean, of course, that there may be a lien for work performed, or materials furnished by a mere volunteer or meddler, acting without authority derived directly or indirectly from the owner. No such question is raised in this case. The materials were furnished to a subcontractor to enable him to carry on his part in the construction of the building pursuant to the owner's contract with the principal contractor. If the owner desires to protect his land against liens thus incurred in favor of any and all persons other than the party with whom he contracts, his proper course is to adopt the simple method pointed out in section 2, which limits the lien upon the land to the contractor himself where the contract is duly placed on file. And section 3 gives the substituted remedy of a lien upon the fund payable by the owner to his contractor, in favor of parties debarred from a lien on the land by the filing of the contract, so far as they come within the class described in section 3. It has been held by this court, in Carlisle v. Knapp, 51 N. J. Law, 320, 17 Atl. 633, that the remedy by stop notice prescribed by section 3 does not extend to one who has furnished materials to a subcontractor. But this is on the ground that this section gives the right to demand payment from the owner only when his contractor is in default of paying that which he owns to the claimant; and, where there is no privity between the claimant and the contractor, there is no right in the claimant to demand payment from the contractor.

It is argued that the Legislature itself has construed the meaning of section 1 by the passage of the acts (P. L. 1890, p. 479; P. L. 1892, p. 358; repealed P. L. 1895, pp. 313, 317) by which it was provided that the exemption of the building from liens to others than the contractor, where the contract was in writing and filed, should be conditioned upon the production by the contractor to the owner of a release of mechanics' liens signed by all persons who might have furnished materials used in the erection of the building, and by all journeymen employed in the erection and construction thereof. We see no force in this argument. The acts of 1890 and 1892 were an attempt to extend the benefits and diminish the hardships of the act by a special method of procedure in case where the contract was in writing and placed on file, and they have no particular bearing upon the remedy afforded to materialmen and others by lien upon the building, where the contract is not filed.

Finally, it is argued that, if the first section of the mechanic's lien law be so construed as to allow a lien for a debt due to any person further removed from the owner than the first subcontractor, it renders the act unconstitutional, as depriving the owner of his property without due process of law, and interfering with his liberty of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property. The owner's right to hold and enjoy property must be subject to the general law of the state. He has no natural right to improve it by the construction of a building thereon without compensation to those who perform the labor and furnish the materials that enter into the improvement. And where the general law prescribes formalities whereby such laborers and materialmen may recover their compensation by means of a lien upon the property, unless the owner pursues the method that the statute prescribes for limiting the right of such lien to the party with whom he contracts, the presumption arises that his building operation is undertaken in full view of the general law, and the law enters into and becomes a part of his contract by his own consent. It has been repeatedly held that such a statute is not an undue restraint upon the owner's liberty of contract considered as an incident to the right of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property, and does not deprive him of his property without due process of law. Jones v. Great Southern Fire Proof Hotel Co., 86 Fed. 370, 30 C. C. A. 108, and cases cited; Great Southern Fire Proof Hotel Co. v. Jones, 116 Fed. 793, 54 C. C. A. 165; Smith v. Newbaur, 144 Ind. 95, 42 N. E. 40, 1004, 33 L. R. A. 685; Henry & Coatsworth Co. v. Evans, 97 Mo. 47, 10 S. W. 868, 3 L. R. A. 332; Blauvelt v. Woodworth, 31 N. Y. 285; Glacius v. Black, 67 N. Y. 563. Nor is there greater force in the insistence that under exceptional circumstances the land may be subjected to mechanics' liens in favor of two or more parties for the furnishing of materials that should create but a single debt. Aside from the easy protection afforded to the owner by section 2 of the act, its twenty-ninth section (page 550) provides for a distribution of the proceeds of the sale of lands among the several lien claimants; and either under this section or by appropriate proceedings in equity, by bill of interpleader, or otherwise, the owner has ample protection against being obliged to pay any claimant other than him at whose actual cost the materials were supplied.

GRUNAUER et al. v. WESTCHESTER FIRE INS. CO.

(Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey. Nov. 20, 1905.)

1. INSURANCE — CONDITIONS OF POLICY — CHANGE OF OWNERSHIP — CONTRACT OF SALE.

A fire insurance policy contained a condition that "if any change other than by the death of an insured takes place in the interest, title, or possession of the subject of insurance (except change of occupants without increase of hazard), whether by legal process or judgment, or by voluntary act of the insured, or otherwise, * * * the entire policy shall be void." In a suit upon such policy to recover for a loss by fire, it appeared that the plaintiffs, who were the sole owners of the insured dwelling house and premises, had, after the issuance of the policy, executed a written agreement to sell and convey the property in fee to their tenant, who was in possession, upon the payment of the stipulated price (a portion of which was then paid), and it was held that such acts caused a change in interest, title, and possession of the subject of insurance sufficient to avoid the policy.

2. SAME.

By force of such contract and transfer of possession a complete transition of the equitable and beneficial ownership from the vendors to the vendee was effected, subject only to the claim of the vendors for purchase money. Although the vendors thereafter still retained the legal title to the land, they held it as trustees for the vendee, who became the owner in equity.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Supreme Court.

Action by Raphael Grunauer and others against the Westchester Fire Insurance Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

Louis H. Grunauer and Michael Dunn, for plaintiffs in error. James G. Blauvelt, for defendant in error.

VREDENBURGH, J. The fire insurance policy, the subject of this suit, was executed August 21, 1902, between one Garretson and the defendant, and contains the following standard policy insurance conditions, authorized by statutory forms (Gen. St. p. 1766, and act of 1902 [Laws 1902, p. 437, § 77]), viz., that "if the interest of the insured be other than unconditional and sole ownership,

" * * * or if any change, other than by the death of an insured, takes place in the interest, title or possession of the subject of insurance (except change of occupants without increase of hazard) whether by legal process or judgment, or by voluntary act of the insured, or otherwise, * * * the entire policy * * * shall be void." At the execution of the policy one Garretson was the owner in fee simple of the insured premises, consisting of a dwelling house and the land upon which it stood, but at the issuance of the policy a mortgage clause was attached, by which any loss thereunder was payable to one Manson, a mortgagee; and in February, 1903, when the property was conveyed by Garretson to plaintiffs, they assumed payment of the mortgage as part of the consideration, and claimed, also, to stand in such prior right, as well as subsequent owners, by the indorsed consent of the company upon the policy. On July 1, 1903, one Mrs. Speck, having about a month previously rented and entered into the occupation of the premises as a tenant paying monthly rent, made with the plaintiffs a written agreement to purchase the insured premises, the material provisions of which were that the plaintiffs agreed (to quote) "to sell and convey to her, her heirs and assigns, all the land and dwelling house thereon erected for the sum of three thousand five hundred dollars," which sum she agreed to pay to the plaintiffs, "their heirs and assigns," in the amounts and manner following: "One thousand dollars to be paid on the delivery of this agreement, * * * and the balance, or two thousand five hundred dollars, to be paid in monthly installments of ten dollars a month on the first day of each and every month hereafter, beginning with the month of August, next, 1903, until the sum of three thousand five hundred dollars is fully paid and satisfied, together with interest on the unpaid balance at the rate of six per cent. per annum, payable semiannually, until the whole amount is paid up," and "on receiving such payments, and being fully paid and satisfied at the time and manner above mentioned," the plaintiffs should "execute, acknowledge, and deliver * * * to her," or her heirs and assigns, a "proper deed for the conveying and assuring to her or them the fee simple of the said premises, free and clear of all incumbrances." On July 1, 1903, Mrs. Speck paid to plaintiffs, upon account of the consideration mentioned in the contract, the specified $1,000, and thereafter, on the first days of each month following before the loss, paid not only the agreed $10, but also $30 per month additional, making for the four months $160. During this period she made in the house certain permanent improvements, adding three rooms in the attic, a china closet in the kitchen, and various other additions, at a cost of about $250, and obtained a policy of insurance upon her insurable interests in the premises, in her own name, of $2,000, upon which she, after the loss, collected the sum of $1,160

as representing her portion of the loss. On November 10, 1903, the house was consumed by fire, while Mrs. Speck was still in possession. At the close of the evidence in the suit upon the policy first named, the learned trial justice, upon defendant's motion, directed a verdict for the defendant.

The plaintiffs in error now urge that judgment should have gone in their favor, claiming, first, that the condition respecting ownership is only applicable to the subject of insurance at the time the policy is issued or indorsed, and not at the time of the loss; and, secondly, that notwithstanding their execution of the agreement to convey, and putting the purchaser in possession of the insured premises, there had been no change of interest, title, or possession, within the meaning of the condition last above set forth.

Passing to the consideration of the latter condition, we think that the judgment below, holding that it was violated by reason of the change of interest, title, and possession of the assured in the premises, as shown by the recited facts, can readily be vindicated. It is not open to question that, under the admitted facts, a change, at least, in the possession and right of possession of the insured in the premises had taken place. The period of interest in the insured embraced in the condition is, incontestably, from the beginning to the expiration of the policy. That such conditions are reasonable and valid, even though they tend to create forfeiture of the policy, cannot be denied. May on Ins. vol. 1, par. 287a. The effect of the recited acts of the insured upon the condition in question has not as yet, it seems, received judicial consideration in this state, but the references below will assist in determining the nature and extent of the change of interest effected by the contract to convey. Undoubtedly such contract creates the relation of trustee and cestui que trust between vendor and vendee. It produces in equity a complete transition of the vendor's holdings from real to personal, and gives the vendee the equitable ownership. After such contract the vendor's interest is no longer real estate, and the unpaid purchase money is personalty, and goes to the vendor's personal representative in case of his death. Thereafter the assured could have but a diminished incentive in the preservation of the property from injury, and such result was the very object intended by the insurer to be guarded against by the inserted condition. Although the vendor still retains the legal title to the land agreed to be sold and conveyed, he thereafter holds it only as a trustee for the vendee, who becomes the equitable and beneficial owner. In Martin v. State Insurance Company, 44 N. J. Law, 485, 43 Am. Rep. 397, it was held in our Supreme Court that where the whole beneficial interest and the possession were in the assured, although the naked legal title of the property insured was in a third party, the former had the entire, unconditional, and sole ownership of the property. It was there said by Mr. Justice Dixon, writing the opinion of the court, that the "mere fact that W. held the naked legal title did not destroy the plaintiff's ownership, * * * and as his ownership was of the fee simple in equity, and was not held jointly or in common with another, it was entire and sole." The respective situation of the parties there were the reverse of those here, but the principle established is clearly adverse to the contention of the plaintiffs in error. The reasoning thus adopted in our Supreme Court was in entire accord with the principle previously declared in this court in Franklin Fire Insurance Company v. Martin, 40 N. J. Law, 568, 29 Am. Rep. 271, where the proof was that the plaintiff (the insured) had contracted to purchase the insured property of another, and had paid all the purchase money, except $2,000, and had gone into possession and expended money in improvements. The late Chief Justice Depue there said that "a person in possession under an agreement for a conveyance has a substantial and an insurable interest. If the property is destroyed, it will be his loss, in contemplation of law. If he had paid the purchase money, the property is his property in fact, and its destruction by fire would be his loss, as much as if the formal legal title was in him."

In the recent case of Ordway v. Chace, 57 N. J. Eq. 478, 42 Atl. 149, the question of the effect of the clause first above set forth arose in chancery in a foreclosure suit. The policy was issued to one Chace, as owner, but his interest was shown only to be that he had given his bond for a debt secured by a mortgage of the premises, and was the holder of a subsequent mortgage made to him by one Enger, to whom he (Chace) at that date conveyed the premises, which were afterwards conveyed to one Henderson, who was the owner in fee at the time of the loss. The court held that the insurance company was not liable on the policy, because the assured was not the unconditional and sole owner of the property insured. The learned vice chancellor in his opinion referred to that class of cases, like the present, in which recovery is denied to the assured, where it appears that the equitable title to the insured premises was vested in a third person, "so that the loss would fall directly upon him, as where he is in possession under a contract of purchase, and has paid the whole or a part of the purchase money, and is personally liable for the remainder." Under such contract and surrender of possession the vendee becomes the beneficial owner, and loss or destruction of the property falls upon him and not upon the vendor; and many cases decided in other jurisdictions directly hold such contract (either with or without transfer of possession) to be a breach of the condition in question. In Skinner v. Houghton, 92 Md. 68, 48 Atl. 85, 84 Am. St. Rep. 485, it was held that "the effect of the contract of sale was to vest the beneficial ownership of the property in the vendee, and that consequently the policies were avoided as to the defendants, who denied all liability because of a change of interest of the assured without the consent of the insurer." So it was held in Cottingham v. Fireman's Fund Ins. Co., 90 Ky. 439, 14 S. W. 417, 9 L. R. A. 627, that "an executory contract for the sale of insured property causes a change of the title, within the meaning of a policy of insurance which provides that it shall be void, if any change takes place in the title or possession, for the reason that the vendee becomes the beneficial owner, and the loss or destruction of the property falls upon him, and not the vendor." In the appendix to 1 May on Insurance (4th Ed.) at pages 577, 578, is a collection of many citations of decided cases in various states and jurisdictions holding to the same effect as the preceding. As I do not find any sustaining a contrary rule with respect to the condition in question, I think it unnecessary to lengthen this opinion by further reference to authority.

The judgment of the Supreme Court should be affirmed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court of Newark.

Action by Elizabeth Feiner and others against Harriet G. Boynton. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Argued June term, 1905, before GARRISON and GARRETSON, JJ.

Howe & Davis, for appellant. George Harner Pierce, for appellees.

GARRETSON, J. The plaintiffs recovered a judgment against the defendant in a dis-strict court for the value of goods furnished. The defendant is, and at the time the goods were furnished was, a married woman living with her husband. The goods furnished were for the personal use of the defendant. It appears from the state of the case that the husband provided the defendant with money from time to time for her household and personal expenses; that the account with the plaintiffs had always been in the defendant's name; that the defendant paid the bills, of which there were a large number, during the 11 years through which the account had been running, with her own checks, drawn upon a bank where her husband had deposited money for her, of which deposit the plaintiffs had no knowledge at all; that the plaintiffs had never had any dealings with her husband; that the husband deposited various sums of money, ranging from $300 to $700, in the People's Bank of East Orange, and that the defendant drew her own checks against said accounts to pay for the various household expenses, as well as for her clothing; that she had a separate estate.

There is no evidence to show that the defendant ever made any express contract with the plaintiffs which would bind her separate estate, and the only evidence from which a contract could be inferred was that the goods were charged to the defendant on the plaintiffs' books, and that the defendant paid the bills with her own checks; but there is nothing to show that the defendant knew that the goods were being charged to her by the plaintiffs, and the checks she gave in payment were of her husband's moneys, which had been deposited by her husband to pay for household expenses and her clothing. A debt incurred for the necessary clothing of a married woman is presumably the debt of the husband, and, if incurred by the wife, it is presumed she is acting as the agent of her husband, unless there is affirmative evidence to show that she intended to charge her separate estate. In Wilson v. Herbert, 41 N. J. Law, 461, 32 Am. Rep. 243, it is held: "When husband and wife are living together, and the wife purchases articles for domestic use, the law imputes to her the character of an agent of her husband, and regards him as the principal debtor. She may contract for such articles as principal, and assume the responsibility of a principal debtor. But, to fix upon her a liability, it must affirmatively appear that she made the purchase on her individual credit. There must be either an express contract on her part to pay out of her separate estate, or the circumstances must be such as to show clearly that she assumed individual responsibility for payment, exclusive of the liability of her husband."

The judgment of the district court is reversed.

RUSSELL & ERWIN MFG. CO. v. E. C. FAITOUTE HARDWARE CO.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Dec. 8, 1905.)

1. CORPORATIONS—INSOLVENCY—TRANSFER OF ASSETS.

P. L. 1896, p. 298, § 164, prohibits any assignment of property of a corporation whenever the corporation shall have become insolvent or shall have suspended its ordinary business for want of funds, and prohibits such transfer "in contemplation of insolvency," declaring that every such sale shall be utterly void as against creditors, provided that a bona fide purchase for a valuable consideration before actual suspension by any person without notice shall not be invalidated. Held, that a transfer of credits of a corporation after it suspended business, when it was insolvent, was not protected by the proviso of the section, even though made on a present valuable consideration and without notice to the assignee.

2. SAME—ASSIGNMENTS—TIME—DELIVERY.

Where certain assignments of credits by a corporation were made out in the morning of the day on which the corporation suspended business and before the mortgagee took possession, but were not delivered to the assignee until after such suspension and assumption of possession by the mortgagee, the assignments should be considered as having been legally made at the time of their actual delivery to the assignee, and not at the time the papers were executed.

3. SAME—INVOLUNTARY SUSPENSION—ASSIGNMENTS.

Under P. L. 1896, p. 298, § 64, prohibiting any assignment of choses in action of a corporation which shall have become insolvent or shall have suspended its ordinary business for want of funds, etc., the fact that a corporation's suspension was in pursuance of legal proceedings, and was not voluntary, did not affect the invalidity of certain assignments made by it after such suspension.

4. SAME—INSOLVENCY.

At the time a corporation suspended business its entire tangible property, including its leasehold and most of its accounts, were assigned as collateral security for debts aggregating $10,000. The unsecured debts amounted to $15,000 more, which was far in excess of the equity in the property mortgaged. Suits had been brought against the company and a judgment entered in one of them. Its credit was exhausted and it had little or no cash on hand or in bank. Held, that the company was insolvent, though the book valuation of its stock and property exceeded its entire liabilities by about $4,000, and its officers believed such valuation was honest and correct.

5. SAME—NOTICE OF INSOLVENCY.

Where an assignee of certain credits of a corporation was notified at the time the assignment was delivered to him of the foreclosure of a mortgage on all the company's property and of the mortgagee's entry under the company's lease, which had also been assigned, and inquiry would have led to information as to the actual condition of the company, the assignee was charged with notice of its insolvency.

6. SAME—CONSIDERATION.

Where an assignment of credits by a corporation was made, for the most part, in consideration of a pre-existing indebtedness, such indebtedness was not a "valuable consideration" sufficient to sustain the assignment, under P. L. 1896, p. 298, § 64, providing that a bona fide purchase for a valuable consideration before a corporation shall have actually suspended its ordinary business by a person without notice of the corporation's insolvency, etc., should not be invalidated.

7. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES — CONSIDERATION.

Under 2 Gen. St. pp. 1604, 1605, §§ 11, 12, 15, making conveyances with intent to defraud creditors utterly void as against creditors, but saving bona fide conveyances for a good consideration to a grantee without notice, a fraudulent conveyance to a person taking with notice is void, though a full consideration was paid.

Suit by the Russell & Erwin Manufacturing Company against the E. C. Faltoute Hardware Company. On petition of the receiver of the defendant to set aside an assignment of book accounts by the defendant company to one Peters. Petition allowed.

F. Benjamin and E. C. Duffield, for receiver. Brown & Beecher, for respondent.

EMERY, V. C. The receiver of an insolvent corporation, the E. C. Faltoute Hardware Company, files this petition in the insolvency proceedings to set aside assignments of book accounts, amounting to $4,107.90, made by the company to the respondent, Peters, on December 6, 1904, four days prior to the filing of the bill, upon which the company was declared insolvent and the receiver appointed. The ground alleged in the petition is that the company had suspended its ordinary business on the day of the assignments and before they were made, and that the assignments, which were made to secure an indebtedness of $4,000, were made in contemplation of insolvency, of which Peters had notice. The respondent by his answer admits the company's suspension of its ordinary business on December 6, 1904, and that its stock in trade was on that date taken possession of by the mortgagee holding a chattel mortgage. The assignments are admitted to have been made to secure an indebtedness of $4,000, but it is denied that the assignments were made after the suspension of business and in contemplation of insolvency of which respondent had notice. As a further defense the answer sets up that the assignment of the accounts was made for a then present consideration, and not a pre-existing debt, and that its consideration was the assignment and surrender by respondent of certain other book accounts of the company assigned and taken possession of by the respondent previous to that time, and the payment by the respondent to the company of moneys collected for him from book accounts previously assigned and delivered by the company to him. The corporation law (P. L. 1896, p. 298, § 64) prohibits any sale, conveyance, transfer, or assignment of the property of a corporation, including choses in action, rights, or credits, "whenever any corporation shall become insolvent or shall suspend its ordinary business for want of funds to carry on the same and also prohibits such sale or transfer "in contemplation of insolvency." The act further declares that "every such sale, conveyance, assignment or transfer shall be utterly void as against creditors; provided that a bona fide purchase for a valuable consideration, before the corporation shall have actually suspended its ordinary business, by any person without notice of such insolvency or of the sale being made in contemplation of insolvency, shall not be invalidated or impeached."

The first question relates to the time of the making of these assignments, and whether they were made after the corporation actually suspended its ordinary business for want of funds to carry it on. If actually made after such suspension, and the company was insolvent at the time, the assignments are not, as I read the act, protected by the proviso, even if the transfer was upon a present valuable consideration and without notice of the insolvent condition of the company. The facts in reference to the time of the delivery of the assignments are proved by the officers of the company—Mr. Hare, the president, and Mr. Beach, the secretary and officer who delivered the assignments to Mr. Peters. Their evidence shows that the assignments were completed by annexing the full list of accounts and signed by the president, Mr. Hare, and the seal of the company affixed by Mr. Beach, about 9 o'clock in the morning of December 6th, at the store or place of business of the company in Newark. After the execution of the assignments and while Mr. Beach (and probably Mr. Hare) were still in the store, and about noon, Mr. Gray, who held a chattel mortgage on the stock to secure a debt of $5,000 and an assignment of the lease to secure an advance made about December 1st for $500 to pay the rent, took possession under his chattel mortgage. Mr. Beach subsequently went to New York City, and there, at Mr. Peters' office, about 4 o'clock, delivered the assignments to Mr. Peters, receiving from him previous assignments of accounts dated November 19, 1904, which were in Mr. Peters' possession in New York and were delivered to Mr. Beach for cancellation. At this interview Mr. Beach informed Mr. Peters that the chattel mortgagee had foreclosed his mortgage and was in possession of the store and stock of goods, and Beach then received direction from Mr. Peters to consult counsel and protect his interest in the accounts. Pursuant to this direction notices of the assignments of accounts (dated December 6th) were printed and mailed on the three following days and before the filing of the bill for a receiver.

The assignments must be considered as having been legally made at the time of their actual delivery in New York, and not at the time of the execution of the papers in Newark. At the time of the delivery the company had actually suspended its ordinary business, by reason of this foreclosure of the chattel mortgage and entry under the lease. That this suspension was not voluntary on the part of the company, but was under legal proceedings, does not relieve the assignment from the effect of the act, as counsel claim. The assignments therefore are void, if the company was insolvent at the time of their delivery, or if they were made in contemplation of insolvency. Under the evidence in the case, both of these points are established. At this time the entire tangible property, the leasehold and most of the company's accounts, were assigned as collateral security for debts aggregating $10,000, and the unsecured debts amounted to about $15,000 more, far more than any possible equity in the property mortgaged. Suits had been brought against the company. One was then pending on which judgment was entered on December 9th, and the credit of the company was exhausted. The company had little or no cash on hand or in bank. There appears in the case that general inability to meet pecuniary liabilities as they matured, by means of either available assets or an honest use of credit, which constitute insolvency, under our corporation acts. Empire State Trust Co. v. Trustees of Wm. F. Fisher & Co. (N. J. Err. & App.; April, 1905) 60 Atl. 940. The only basis upon which solvency is here claimed is that the book valuation of the stock and property, which was made on October 31, 1905, exceeds the entire liabilities by about $4,000, and that the officers and the assignee, who knew of this valuation, believed this was honest and correct. As a test of insolvency, such valuation is entitled in this case to little or no weight. The company being insolvent and having suspended its business before the delivery of the assignments to the respondent, they are under the act "utterly null and void against creditors," and are not at all within the proviso, which reaches only to a bona fide purchase before the corporation shall have actually suspended business. The assignee's notice of the suspension of business at the time of the delivery of the assignments is proved, and was besides such notice of the insolvency, or of a transfer in contemplation of insolvency, as to prevent the transfer being bona fide. Notice of facts such as the foreclosure of the mortgage and entry under the lease, which on inquiry would have led to information as to the actual condition of the company, must be taken as notice of the insolvency. Tantum v. Green (Err. & App. 1869) 21 N. J. Eq. 364, 369; Dougherty v. Connolly (1901) 61 N. J. Eq. 421, 48 Atl. 777, and cases cited by me on page 428 of 61 N. J. Eq., page 780 of 48 Atl.

These assignments, moreover, are not within the saving clause of the statute, not only because the assignee did not receive them before the suspension of the company's business, and because he is chargeable with notice of the company's insolvency at the time of receiving them, but the assignments were not, except to a small extent, for a valuable consideration, and were made to secure what was in fact for the most part an antecedent indebtedness of the company. Such antecedent indebtedness is not a valuable consideration for a mortgage or assignment under this act. Empire State Trust Co. v. Trustees of Fisher, supra. The facts as to the consideration are these. In October, 1903, Mr. Peters advanced to the company $4,000; the repayment being secured by assignments of book accounts, specified in lists annexed to the assignments, which were declared to be made as collateral security. The loan, which was payable on demand, continued, and weekly thereafter new assignments of accounts were prepared; the previous assignments being delivered up for cancellation upon the execution of each subsequent assignment. Each subsequent assignment included accounts previously assigned which had not been collected. The last of these assignments, preceding December 6th, were two dated November 19, 1904, one of accounts amounting to $3,088.80, to secure $3,000, and one of $1,042.41 of accounts to secure $1,000. Up to this time and in fact up to December 3, 1904, the course of business between the parties had been that the company, and not Mr. Peters, collected the money due on the assigned accounts in regular course, and the money collected was deposited with the company's other funds in its bank account, and was in fact drawn against for the ordinary uses of the company. Whether Mr. Peters knew that the money was so used, is perhaps not entirely clear. There was no express provision in any of the assignments for the collection of the accounts by the company or the substitution of new accounts in the place of accounts collected, nor was any express agreement of this character proved. Beach's present statement is that, on the making of each new assignment, he asked for a continuance of the loan, stating that the money for the assigned accounts then collected was on hand, and that he (Mr. Peters) could have the money or a new assignment. Upon this assurance regularly made, as he says, the new assignments were taken and the loan continued. At the time of the failure, December 6th, the only money on hand from collection of accounts was money which from December 3, 1904, was put by Mr. Beach in his own name from these accounts collected by the company. The amount of this does not appear, nor whether it was from accounts included in the November assignment. On December 6th, the situation in fact was that some of the accounts included in the November assignment, being uncollected, were included in the December assignment, and for the accounts included in the November assignment which had been collected by the company the other accounts specified in the December assignment were substituted. But previous to December 6th, the company had in fact used the money collected on these accounts (except those which might have been paid over to Mr. Beach since December 3d), and this fund could no longer be followed. As to this amount, therefore, the company on December 6th was merely a debtor to the company, and to this extent the assignment of December 6th was made to secure an antecedent indebtedness for money collected by the company for the respondent and used by the company. The only part of the consideration for the December assignment, which was a present valuable consideration, were those accounts included in the November assignment still uncollected and continued in the respondent's security by the December assignment, and the money (if any) in Beach's hands, received from the assigned accounts. The surrender and cancellation of the November assignments operated as a relinquishment of title thereunder to the accounts uncollected, and a release of claim thereunder to the proceeds of accounts collected and actually in the control or possession of the company. To this extent, but to this extent only, the consideration for the December assignment was a present valuable consideration, but as this surrender and cancellation, the valuable consideration paid, was made with notice of insolvency, the assignment made "utterly void as against creditors" by the statute cannot be validated, even to this extent. The statute of frauds, making conveyances with intent to defraud creditors utterly void and of no effect as against creditors, contains a proviso saving conveyances for a good consideration and bona fide to a grantee not having notice or knowledge of the fraud. 2 Gen. St. pp. 1604, 1605, §§ 11, 12, 15. Under this proviso, a conveyance with notice is void, although full consideration be paid. Tantum v. Green (Err. & App. 1869) 21 N. J. Eq. 364. And if only a partial consideration is paid, the conveyance is also to be declared void in toto. Mead v. Combs (Zabriskie, Ch.; 1868) 19 N. J. Eq. 112; Holt v. Creamer (Van Fleet, V. Ch.; 1881) 34 N. J. Eq. 181, 187. The express language of the sixty-fourth section of the corporation act controls the case.

The assignment must be declared altogether void, and Mr. Peters must account for the amounts received from the accounts assigned in December. The form of decree will be settled on notice, and I will then hear counsel on the question of including in the account the amounts, if any, received on the accounts assigned in November and held by Mr. Beach after December 3d, and on December 6th at the time of the December assignment.

RUSSELL & ERWIN MFG. CO. v. E. C. FAITOUTE HARDWARE CO.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Dec. 8, 1905.)

Action by the Russell & Erwin Manufacturing Company against the E. C. Faitoute

Hardware Company. On petition of defendant's receiver to set aside an assignment of certain book accounts by defendant to E. Forest Powell. Petition granted.

Frank Benjamin and Mr. Duffield, for receiver. Brown & Beecher, for respondent.

EMERY, V. C. This petition is filed to set aside an assignment of book accounts, amounting to $995, and to secure an indebtedness of $1,000 made by the insolvent corporation to the respondent Powell on December 6, 1904, four days before the filing of the bill on which the company was declared insolvent and a receiver appointed. The ground alleged in the petition is that the company at the time of the assignment was insolvent and had suspended its ordinary business, and that possession of its stock in trade at its place of business in Newark had been taken under a chattel mortgage. Notice to the respondent that the company had suspended business and contemplated insolvency is charged. The answer admits the suspension of the ordinary business of the company on December 6, 1904, and the taking of possession by the mortgagee as charged, but denies a voluntary suspension of business, or that it suspended on account of insolvency or in contemplation of insolvency, and sets up that the assignment of that date was to secure an indebtedness of $1,000, but denies that it was made after the suspension of business, or notice of the insolvency. A present consideration of the assignment is also set up, being the cancellation and surrender of other book accounts assigned to him by the company, taken possession of by respondent previous to that time, and the payment by him to the company of moneys collected for him by the company of accounts previously assigned to him. The cause was tried together with the cause on the petition of the receiver against Peters (62 Atl. 421), to set aside assignments of similar character to him on the same day, and the evidence relating to the validity of those assignments applies equally to the present assignment. This assignment was delivered to the respondent in New York at the same time as the assignments to Peters were delivered, after the company had suspended business and not before. Powell as well as Peters was told at the time of the delivery that the mortgagee had taken possession. Powell also then delivered up his previous assignment of November 19, 1904, and directed Beach, the officer of the company, to employ counsel to protect his interest, and at once proceeded to collect the accounts assigned on December 6th.

The assignment must be declared null and void as against the receiver under the statute, for the reasons given in the Peters Case, and a decree for account will be advised.

FLANERTY v. NORTH JERSEY ST.
RY. CO.(Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey.
June 19, 1905.)WRIT OF ERROR—DEFECT IN RECORD—DIS-MISSAL.

A writ of error will be dismissed when no judgment is returned with it.

Error to Circuit Court, Hudson County.
Action by Michael Flanerty against the North Jersey Street Railway Company. Judgment in favor of defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Dismissed.

Alexander Simpson, for plaintiff in error.
William H. Speer, for defendant in error.

PER CURIAM. The printed case discloses no judgment returned with the writ of error. There is, therefore, nothing before the court to reverse or to affirm, and upon the application of counsel for defendant in error the writ is dismissed.

NORRIS v. BEARDSLEY et al.(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Nov. 8, 1905.)1. WILLS—SUIT TO CONSTRU—RIGHTS OF AD-MINISTRATOR.

An administrator with the will annexed has no right to institute a suit to construe the will, where the case is clear and there is no reasonable doubt as to his duty.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 49, Cent. Dig. Wills, § 1678.]

2. SAME—AMBIGUOUS DEVISE.

A bill on behalf of an administrator with the will annexed to construe an ambiguous devise involving no equitable estate will not lie, where the executor was not charged with any duty in respect to the land devised.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 49, Cent. Dig. Wills, § 1678.]

3. SAME—AMOUNT INVOLVED.

Where testatrix left only a small amount of personal property, and it did not appear that the administrator with the will annexed had obtained possession or could obtain possession of any of such property, or that its value was sufficient to enable the administrator to invoke the jurisdiction of the court of chancery, a bill on his behalf to construe an ambiguous devise would not lie.

4. SAME—CONSTRUCTION—PREMATURE ACTION.

A bill to construe a will for the purpose of obtaining instructions as to the proper disposition of moneys which it was alleged would come into complainant's hands as the proceeds of certain property in which testatrix was interested, brought before the land had been sold or the proceeds had been paid to complainant, was premature.

Bill by William I. Norris, as administrator with the will annexed of Emeline A. Doremus, deceased, against Benajah M. Beardsley and others, for construction of the will. Dismissed.

George S. Hilton, for complainant. Abram Klenert, for defendants.

STEVENSON, V. C. The bill is filed by the administrator with the will annexed of Mrs. Emeline A. Doremus, deceased, for a construction of the following clause of Mrs. Doremus' will: "After the payment of my just debts and funeral expenses I give, bequeath, and devise all my property, both real and personal, wheresoever situate and whatever the same may be, to my husband Cornelius Doremus of the city of Paterson, in the county of Passaic and state of New Jersey, to him and his heirs, forever." The will was executed in January, 1899. Mrs. Doremus died in November, 1904. Her husband died about April 1, 1899. The question submitted is whether the residuary gift to the husband lapsed or passed to any persons who are described in the language of the will above quoted as "his heirs." The heirs and next of kin of both Mr. and Mrs. Doremus are made defendants. The only answer filed is by Mrs. Doremus' next of kin. The bill has been taken as confessed against the other defendants, and it does not appear that any of the heirs and next of kin of Mr. Doremus have in any way come forward with a claim to the residuary estate of Mrs. Doremus.

The answer admits the facts alleged in the bill, but denies that there is any "occasion for uncertainty or doubt under the provisions of the said will" as to the disposition of Mrs. Doremus' estate, and sets up that, upon the death of Cornelius Doremus in the lifetime of the testatrix, the bequest and devise to him lapsed, and that therefore as to her residuary estate Mrs. Doremus died intestate. The case of Zabriskie v. Huyler (1901) 62 N. J. Eq. 697, 51 Atl. 197, affirmed, 64 N. J. Eq. 794, 56 Atl. 1133, is cited to sustain these legal propositions. The answer does not ask that a decree be made establishing the rights of the heirs and next of kin of Mrs. Doremus, but prays that the bill be dismissed. The issue is thus raised whether a case is presented of such doubt and uncertainty as to warrant the complainant as trustee in seeking the advice and direction of the court. The general rule is well settled that "when the duty of a trustee is a matter of doubt, it is his undoubted right to ask and receive the aid and direction of a court of equity in the execution of his trust." Kearney v. MacComb (1863) 16 N. J. Eq. 189; Atty. Gen. v. Moore's Ex'rs (1868) 19 N. J. Eq. 503; 2 Pom. Eq. § 1064; 2 Perry on Trusts, § 476a. But a trustee has no right to place himself under the direction of the court where the case is clear, where there is no reasonable doubt as to his duty. Ex'rs of Vanness v. Jacobus (1864) 17 N. J. Eq. 153; Griggs v. Veghte (1890) 47 N. J. Eq. 179, 181, 19 Atl. 86; 28 Am. & Eng. Ency. (2d Ed.) 1052; 2 Perry on Trusts, § 476a, note 1. What degree of doubt will warrant an application to the court is evidently beyond definition. Each case must to a large extent stand on its own circumstances. It may be conceded that the reasonableness of the doubt or question is not necessarily to be tested by the mind of the court to whom the trustee applies for protective instructions. The complainant in this case may have a right to protection against future litigations based on views of the law or facts, which to this court may now seem entirely without foundation, or based upon a state of facts altogether different from that which now is presented, or which the complainant had before him when he filed his bill.

I am not, however, obliged to determine whether the application to this court in this case, which is made with technical skill and in undoubted good faith, does or does not present a reasonably doubtful question within the meaning of the above-stated rule. Assuming that such a question is presented, it cannot at present be entertained in relation to any part of the estate of Mrs. Doremus exhibited in the bill or proofs. The residuary estate in question consists of three classes of assets. In the first place, Mrs. Doremus died seised of two houses and lots in the city of Paterson. The bill prays that the residuary clause may be construed as a devise of this land. It is, however, well settled that a court of equity under its jurisdiction to construe wills will not entertain a bill to construe an ambiguous devise of land where no equitable estate or interest is involved; but the matter in dispute is between rival claimants under conflicting legal titles. Torrey et al., Executors, v. Torrey (1897) 55 N. J. Eq. 410, 36 Atl. 1084; 2 Pom. Eq. § 1155; 2 Perry on Trusts, § 476a. If the rule were otherwise, such a bill could not be entertained on behalf of an executor who is charged with no duty whatever in respect of the land in dispute, but would have to be filed by one of the claimants. In the second place, it appears that according to the bill of complaint Mrs. Doremus "left in her name and possession only a small amount of personal property, an inventory of which has not been filed." It does not appear that the administrator has obtained possession or can obtain possession of any of this personal property, or that the value of it is sufficient to enable the administrator to invoke the jurisdiction of this court. Counsel for the complainant concedes that the bill cannot be sustained in order to have directions given to the complainant in regard to the disposition of this "small amount of personal property." He states in his brief as the proofs indicate, that Mrs. Doremus "did not have any personal property of any account in her possession" at the time of her decease. If the administrator should obtain possession of this personal property of small but unknown value, it does not appear that, after the expenses of administration have been paid, there would be anything left for distribution. In the third place, the bill sets forth that Mrs. Doremus at the time of her death was entitled to a share of the proceeds of certain lands which will be sold under the provisions of the will of one Martha Doremus, deceased, and also a share of the proceeds of certain other lands held by a trustee charged with the duty of making sale thereof. Counsel for complainant contends that the case is one of equitable conversion, and that these proceeds of the sale of lands have the status of personal property, and are to be administered as such by the complainant. The bill of complaint alleges that these moneys, when sale of the land shall have been effected, "will come" to the complainant's hands, and prays for directions as to the mode of distribution. It is a fatal objection to the granting of this request that the land has not been sold, and the funds are not yet in the complainant's hands, so that he is not at present charged with any duty whatever with reference to their distribution, and may never be charged with any such duty. Griggs v. Veghte, 47 N. J. Eq. 180, 19 Atl. 867; Traphagen v. Levy (1889) 45 N. J. Eq. 448, 453, 18 Atl. 222; May v. May (1896) 167 U. S. 310, 17 Sup. Ct. 824, 42 L. Ed. 179; Bullard v. Chandler (1889) 149 Mass. 532, 21 N. E. 951, 5 L. R. A. 104; White v. Mass. Inst. of Tech. (1898) 171 Mass. 84, 97, 50 N. E. 512; 28 Am. & Ency. (2d Ed.) 1052, and notes.

The slightest reflection will show that any one of several events or series of events may happen which will prevent the complainant from receiving any of the proceeds of the sale of either of these tracts of land, or from receiving proceeds of sufficient amount to warrant an application to this court for directions as to their distribution. Moreover, if it were certain that the complainant in the future will have possession of these moneys the parties entitled to receive them, who therefore should be brought in to litigate all questions concerning them, cannot now be ascertained. The fact that the right to receive the money when collected is vested does not affect the rule that the litigation to settle doubtful questions must be postponed until the defendants, the rival claimants, or possible claimants, have before them in the possession of the trustee the fund itself, and are thus assured that the successful party will actually enjoy the fruits of the litigation. In the case of Tuttle v. Woolworth (1901) 62 N. J. Eq. 532, 50 Atl. 445, an executor and trustee filed a bill for directions inter alia in regard to the disposition of the proceeds of real estate which he himself held in trust to sell. The question in that case as in this was as to which of certain parties defendant the proceeds were payable under the terms of the trust. Vice Chancellor Emery, in declining to give any instructions, laid down the rule applicable to the situation as follows: "As the surviving executor has not yet sold the house and lot, it would be premature to decide upon the disposition of the proceeds of sale, and the executor is not entitled to the protection of the court upon this disposition, until the proceeds of sale are on hand ready to distribute, and the persons then entitled to or claiming the funds are in court." This same rule applies with greater force to the present case, because the existence of a fund to divide depends in part, not upon the action of the complainant, but upon the action of strangers to this cause.

Inasmuch as the complainant is under no present duty in respect of which he is entitled to directions from this court, the bill must be dismissed.

JAMES v. ALLER et al.

(Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey.
Nov. 20, 1905.)

PARENT AND CHILD—GIFTS—REVOCATION.

A voluntary settlement by a father, after a second marriage, on the children of the first marriage, covering substantially all his property, but executed when he was steadily accumulating money, with knowledge of the effect of the instruments, was not subject to revocation in equity at his instance as improvident.

Fort and Vroom, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Court of Chancery.

Bill by Llewellyn James against T. Owen Aller and others to set aside a gift. From a decree in favor of complainant (57 Atl. 476), defendants appeal. Reversed.

See 57 Atl. 1091.

George H. Large and Paul A. Queen, for appellants. B. W. Ellicott, for respondent.

GUMMERE, C. J. The nature of the controversy between the parties and the facts submitted at the hearing are very fully set out in the opinion of the learned Vice Chancellor before whom the case was tried. It is unnecessary to state them in full. Briefly, the following case is presented: In the spring of the year 1880 Llewellyn James, the complainant, conveyed to his children, defendants herein, his homestead property in the village of High Bridge, reserving to himself the right to occupy it so long as he should desire to do so. At the same time he assigned to them two mortgages aggregating $4,200. In the autumn of the year 1881 he gave to his daughter Lydia Aller certain notes and other securities amounting to $4,000. In making these several gifts, he reserved to himself no power to revoke them. In June, 1902, he filed his bill in this cause, seeking to annul these several transactions. In it he rested his right to relief as to the conveyance of his homestead and the assignments of the mortgages upon the ground that he was induced to sign these papers by Mrs. Aller and her husband through false representations made by them to him as to the character thereof, and without any knowledge of their real nature. His contention as to the notes and other securities given to Mrs. Aller in the autumn of 1881 is that they were delivered to her to hold in trust for him. The defense set up was that the conveyance of the homestead and the assignment of the mortgages were made by the complainant to his children as a gift at the time of his second marriage, for the purpose of making provision for their support, and that the notes and other securities given by him to Mrs. Aller in 1881 were not intended by him to be held by her for his benefit, but that his purpose, expressed at the time, was that they were delivered to her as an absolute gift for herself and her sisters.

A mass of testimony was taken in the case, from a consideration of which the learned Vice Chancellor reached the conclusion that, in making the conveyance of the homestead and the assignments of the mortgages, the complainant thoroughly understood the nature of the papers which he was signing: that his purpose in executing these several papers was to make a gift to his children of the property which they transferred; that no influence whatever was exerted upon him by his children to induce him to make this gift; and that he made the transfers voluntarily and deliberately, after consultation with his counsel. He held that a gift made by a father to his children, under these conditions, when not unreasonable in amount (and this, he considered, was not), was irrevocable by the donor, and that the complainant was not entitled to relief upon this part of the case. As to the transaction of the autumn of 1881, the Vice Chancellor concluded from the proofs that the notes and other securities were given by the complainant to his daughter Mrs. Aller for the benefit of herself and her sisters; that the gift was made freely by the father to carry out his wishes expressed at the time, and without the exercise of any influence on the part of the daughter; and that no power to revoke the gift was reserved by him. The Vice Chancellor considered, however, that the gift was improvident, because, by making it, the complainant divested himself of all the property then owned by him, and held that, for this reason, it was inequitable for the defendants to retain this gift after a demand for its return made upon them by the complainant, and decreed that they should pay back to him the amount thereof, less certain moneys which had been advanced by them to him prior to the time of the filing of the bill. From that portion of the decree which annuls the gift of 1881, the defendants have appealed.

Mr. James at the time of making the gift which was set aside, was, as is stated in the opinion of the Vice Chancellor, in the prime of life, and was steadily earning from $100 to $300 a month, and sometimes as much as $500. It may well be doubted whether a man in such a situation necessarily acts improvidently in giving to his children the property which he has then accumulated. But, assuming this to be so, it does not, in our view, afford any ground for declaring such a transaction voidable at his option. The law permits any one to dispose of his property gratuitously, if he pleases, provided the rights of creditors are not injuriously affected thereby. He may, if he sees fit, reserve to himself the right to revoke his gift, or, if he desires, he may make the gift absolute and irrevocable, and his power in this regard does not depend upon the providence or improvidence of his act. It has, indeed, frequently been declared that where a relation of trust and confidence exists between the donor and the donee, and the donee occupies the dominant position, the fact that the gift is improvident is of great importance in determining whether it was the voluntary, well-understood act of the donor, and that the failure of the donor to reserve to himself a power of revocation will vitiate the transaction. The two cases referred to by the Vice Chancellor in support of his conclusion that the gift should be set aside are of this character. In Garnsey v. Mundy, 24 N. J. Eq. 243, the donor was a young woman who had just reached her majority. The gift was to her mother, in trust for the donor's child. It was made at the solicitation of the mother, without any independent advice to the daughter, and without the reservation to her of any power of revocation. The proofs made it clear that the donor did not understand the provisions of the deed which she executed, nor their effect, that she did not suppose the conveyance would place the property beyond her reach and control, and that the donee supposed that the gift was, and intended that it should be, revocable. In Powell v. Powell, L. R. 1 Ch. Div. (1900), the donor was a young woman who had attained the age of 21 years shortly before making the deed which was set aside. The donee was her stepmother. The gift was held to be the result of strong pressure brought to bear upon the donor by the donee. The underlying distinction between cases like those just referred to and the present one, as it seems to us, is the relationship existing between the parties. Where no relation of trust and confidence exists between the donor and the donee, or where, when such relation does exist, the donor, and not the donee, occupies the dominant position, the rule laid down in those cases has no application, and a gift absolute in its terms, made voluntarily and with a full understanding of its effect, cannot be revoked by the donor, either by his own act alone, or with the aid of a judicial tribunal. Such is the case now before us. The respondent, in the prime of life, as has already been stated, in the full possession of his faculties, as the case shows, and without the exercise of any influence over him by his children, made this gift to them. At that time no conditions existed to justify the conclusion that the original relation existing between parent and child (i. e., a relation where the parent occupies the dominant position) had been reversed, and that the children then occupied that position. His purpose at the time of making the gift was to make them the absolute owners of the property donated. It was his to dispose of as he saw fit. The gift was intended by him to be, and was, irrevocable. That being so, he has no legal right to now require the return of the property with which he then parted.

The portion of the decree appealed from should be reversed, and a decree entered in conformity with the view herein expressed.

FORT, J. (dissenting.) I am unable to agree with the view taken by the majority of the Court in this case. I agree with the opinion of Vice Chancellor Emery in its entirety, and vote to affirm for the reasons given by him in the Court of Chancery.

VROOM, J., concurs in this dissent.

ATLANTIC CITY v. BROWN.

(Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey.
Nov. 20, 1905.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—ORDINANCES—REGULATION OF OMNIBUSES — EXCESSIVE FINE.

A fine of $20, imposed by an ordinance for the refusal of an omnibus driver to convey any passenger, was not excessive.

2. SAME—REGULATION OF FARES — REASONABLENESS.

An ordinance permitting an omnibus driver to charge only 10 cents for carrying a passenger, irrespective of the distance, is not unreasonable.

3. SAME—VALIDITY OF ORDINANCE.

An ordinance requiring the driver of an omnibus under all circumstances to accept a person tendering himself as a passenger is not wholly void, but only so far as it imposes the penalty prescribed therein against those whose refusal to accept a person who offers himself as a passenger is justified by the circumstances under which the refusal occurs.

4. SAME—OBLIGATION TO CARRY PASSENGERS.

The fact that an ordinance requires an omnibus driver to carry any person tendering himself as a passenger, whether the driver desires to carry him or not, does not render it invalid.

Error to Supreme Court.

Joseph Brown was convicted of violating an ordinance in relation to omnibus drivers, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Clarence L. Cole, for plaintiff in error.
Henry Wootton, for defendant in error.

GUMMERE, C. J. This writ of error brings up a judgment of the Supreme Court affirming the conviction before the recorder of the city of Atlantic City of the plaintiff in error, a licensed omnibus driver, for violating the provision of section 2 of an ordinance of Atlantic City which provided that it should be unlawful for the driver of any omnibus to refuse to convey any passenger from any one point to any other point in Atlantic City, and that no delay or wait for additional passengers should be made exceeding five minutes. The violation of which the plaintiff in error was convicted was his refusal to carry one Frank Scott as a passenger from one point in the city to another. The principal assignments of error are: (1) That the city council was not, at the time of passing the ordinance in question, invested with the power to pass the same; and (2) that Scott was not a passenger within the meaning of the ordinance, because when he applied to the plaintiff in error for transportation his application was refused. Both of the matters raised by these assignments are discussed in the opinion delivered by the Supreme Court (Atlantic City v. Brown, 58 Atl. 110), and, for the reasons stated therein, we consider these assignments without merit.

Two other reasons are assigned for the reversal of the judgments which were not discussed in the opinion of the Supreme Court. The first is that the ordinance under which the conviction was had is unreasonable, and therefore void: (a) Because the penalty which it imposes for a violation of its provisions, viz., a fine of $20, is grossly excessive; (b) because it permits the driver of an omnibus to charge only 10 cents for the carriage of a passenger, even though he traverses the whole length or breadth of the city in transporting him; (c) because it requires the driver, under all circumstances and conditions, to accept a person who tenders himself as a passenger, under penalty of a fine for refusal; and (d) because it requires the driver to carry a person tendering himself as a passenger, whether the driver does or does not want to carry such persons. In disposing of the first point raised by this assignment, it is enough to say that the imposition of a fine of $20 for a violation of this provision of the ordinance does not seem to us to be excessive. In order to insure its observance the fine is required to be sufficiently large in amount to make it a matter of some moment to him who violates the provision.

We think the second point specified under this assignment is also unsound. The fact that the rate of fare fixed by the ordinance prevails without regard to the distance traveled, the driver being permitted to charge 10 cents for carrying his passenger a single block, as well as across the whole city, makes the ordinance reasonable in this regard. Ordinances regulating the rate of fare to be charged by street railway companies for the transportation of passengers are usually passed by cities in which such companies operate, and almost without exception the price permitted to be charged the passenger is the same, whether the passenger rides a short distance, or from one end of the road to the other, within the city limits. The reasonableness of such an ordinance seems to be so universally conceded that we find no reported case where it has been challenged, much less where it has been declared unreasonable. The burden of carrying a passenger a long distance for an inadequate compensation is compensated for by permitting a large compensation to be exacted for carriage over short distances. Assuming it to be true, as is suggested by the third point in this assignment, that the ordinance requires the driver, under all circumstances and conditions, to accept a person who tenders himself as a passenger, the provision is not on that account void in toto, but only so far as it imposes the penalty prescribed therein against those whose refusal to accept a person who offers himself as a passenger is justified by the circumstances and conditions under which the refusal occurs. Penn. R. R. Co. v. Jersey City, 47 N. J. Law, 286; Gaslight Co. v. Rahway, 58 N. J. Law, 510, 34 Atl. 8. As the case discloses no circumstance or condition which justified the refusal of the plaintiff in error to accept Scott as his passenger, his conviction cannot be set aside upon this ground. Nor does the fact that the ordinance requires the driver to carry a person tendering himself as a passenger, whether the driver does or does not want to carry such passenger, render it invalid. The duty is imposed by the city upon its licensees, for the protection and convenience of intending passengers. Omnibus drivers who do not desire to be bound by the provision are under no obligation to accept a license from the city; if they choose to accept the license, they are bound to observe such reasonable regulations relating to the subject-matter of the license as the city sees fit to impose. That this regulation is a reasonable one seems to us to be beyond dispute.

The only other assignment of error requires no discussion. It is that the conviction does not show such a finding of facts as is required by law. The assignment plainly is based upon a misapprehension. An examination of the record shows that all of the facts necessary to sustain the conviction were either proved or admitted at the trial before the recorder, and are set out in the conviction itself.

The judgment under review should be affirmed.

WOOD v. WOOD.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Nov. 24, 1905.)

1. WITNESSES—COMPETENCY.

In a suit for divorce, petitioner is a competent witness in her own behalf.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 50, Cent. Dig. Witnesses, §§ 168-172.]

2. DIVORCE—DESERPTION—EVIDENCE.

In a suit for divorce on the ground of desertion, petitioner's uncorroborated testimony is insufficient to justify a decree in her favor.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 17, Cent. Dig. Divorce, § 405.]

3. SAME—SUFFICIENCY.

In a suit for divorce, evidence held insufficient to establish a desertion by defendant husband.

Petition for divorce by Ethel J. Wood against Frank H. Wood. Petition dismissed.

Robert R. Howard, for petitioner.

MAGIE, Ch. The solicitor of the petitioner has been heard on the question whether the report of the master in favor of a divorce is supported by sufficient evidence. The proofs show that petitioner and defendant were married in New York, and after a brief stay with petitioner's parents at South Orange, N. J., took up their residence in New York, which continued until June 1, 1902, when both came to the residence of petitioner's parents, and there lived together as husband and wife until July 23, 1902, when defendant left and went to Wyoming. He has never returned to her, nor has he contributed to the support of petitioner or the child of the marriage. The petition was filed November 23, 1904. The master has found that defendant's leaving the petitioner on July 23, 1902, was a willful desertion. To use the master's language, he says: "It seems to me that he, at the time of his leaving her, had it in his mind to then leave her 'for good.'" Is there evidence, such as the law requires, upon which the master's report can be supported?

Petitioner was a competent witness in her own behalf, but her evidence will not justify a decree unless corroborated by the testimony of other witnesses, or proof of other circumstances. The petitioner declares that, when the defendant left her, it was with the avowed purpose of going to Wyoming to engage in business, and that he promised to send her money so that she and their child could go there and live with him. That he avowed such a purpose and made such a promise appears from the evidence of petitioner's brother, who further states that, when petitioner expressed a desire to go with her husband to Wyoming, he said he thought it better for her to wait until he got out there and was established. Is it to be inferred that defendant's avowal of his purpose was deceptive, and that he then entertained a purpose to desert petitioner? Both the mother and the brother of petitioner testified that they, at the time defendant left, believed that his purpose was to desert his wife, but I am unable to find any evidence of facts justifying such belief.

It is urged that the failure of defendant to send for his wife and child, or to furnish support for them, may be considered in determining his intent when he left. If there was proof that defendant had established himself in Wyoming or was able to maintain his wife and child there or here, it would be significant. In the absence of such proof, his failure may as well be attributed to necessity. Petitioner testifies that after defendant left her she wrote to him quite regularly, until the spring of 1903, and that her husband responded to her, though infrequently, one letter having been written in February, 1903. In June, 1903, she testifies she wrote a letter threatening to obtain a divorce from him, and that he replied that she could go on with the suit, which he would not defend. None of these letters were produced, no copies of those written by her were kept, and no witness testifies to their contents except petitioner. Defendant's letters have been destroyed, and petitioner's testimony alone is depended on as to their contents. Obviously, this furnishes no competent proof of defendant's intent.

On the whole case, I think the master's report is not supported by the proof, and that the petition must be dismissed.

WHITE v. WHITE.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. June, 1905.)

CONTEMPT—PROCEEDINGS—EVIDENCE.

In contempt proceedings for attempting to bribe a witness, evidence considered, and held sufficient to show guilt.

Bill by George W. White against Anna M. White. George W. White and others were ordered to show cause why they should not be adjudged guilty of contempt of court for attempting to improperly influence the proper administration of justice, and on hearing were adjudged guilty.

Charles D. Thompson, for the State. Robert S. Hudspeth, for complainant and others.

PITNEY, V. C. In the progress of the taking of proofs in this cause evidence was given tending to show that Dr. White, the complainant, had attempted to bribe a witness for the defendant, either to abstain entirely from going on the witness stand or to suppress the truth if called and sworn. The court, on its own motion, instituted an investigation into the facts of the case, and numerous witnesses were sworn. Dr. White was represented by counsel, and has been heard, both in the production of witnesses and by argument of counsel; and I have now to state the effect of the evidence on my mind.

In order to a proper understanding of the bearing of the evidence, the character and situation of the cause at the time mentioned is important. The complainant, Dr. White, is a practicing physician, having his home and residence in West Hoboken, in Hudson county. His wife, during the whole progress of the suit, was living with her mother, a widow, in the city of Paterson. The doctor, by his bill, charged his wife with adultery with one Edward Zink, a lad now just past 20 years of age. The wife, by her answer, denied the adultery, and countercharged adultery on the part of her husband, committed with divers women, among others a Mrs. Julia Eaton, a young married woman living in West Hoboken with her husband. The production of the evidence had occupied several sessions of the court at intervals of considerable time, and much evidence was given on both sides, and of a character, if reliable, to show that both parties were guilty. The complainant, of course, made his case first, and had rested. The wife proceeded to make her proofs, and had not yet rested her case, when the counsel who at first represented her retired, and his place was taken by Col. Z. M. Ward, of Paterson. Col. Ward had attended one session previous to the 13th of January, 1902, and Zink, the co-respondent, had been examined on behalf of the defendant, and was on the stand, as I now recollect, for cross-examination, when the case was put over to Monday, the 13th of January, which was a motion day. This was done at the earnest request of the counsel for the complainant, and because none of the days usually devoted to the trial of causes were open for several weeks then to come. The result of setting a cause for trial on motion day is that it must await the disposition of all the motions for that day.

There was usually in attendance on the hearing of this cause a large number of witnesses and followers of both parties, and these witnesses and followers naturally divided into parties, known as the "doctor's party" and his "wife's party." That of the doctor's, so far as the court could observe, was the more numerous. On Monday morning, the 13th of January, the courtroom was filled with witnesses and parties. The cause was not reached until about half past 2 in the afternoon, when Mr. Zink took the stand, and his examination was finished probably about half past 3 o'clock. Then Col. Ward put upon the stand a witness named David Ross, a young man apparently under 30 years of age, who said that his occupation was that of an architect's draftsman, but that he was also a bricklayer. He was respectable in appearance, but manifested symptoms of having been recently intoxicated, but at the moment of taking the stand was almost, if not quite, sober. He swore that he was subpoenaed as a witness (and upon a production of the subpoena it appeared that he was subpoenaed by the defendant); that he was acquainted with Dr. White, and that he was also slightly acquainted with a young man named Gilkyson, whom he had met in the corridor which belonged especially to the suite of courtrooms; and that Gilkyson seemed to be attending the court. Further, that Dr. White approached him (Ross) and asked him if he knew Gilkyson, and asked him to induce Gilkyson to go away and not continue his presence in the court or its vicinity, or, if he went on the stand as a witness, to know nothing; that for that purpose Dr. White gave him $10, out of which he was to pay Gilkyson for staying away, or, if he was forced to go upon the stand, that he should suppress any knowledge he had of facts which might be desired to be drawn from him. Further, that he (Ross) went out with Gilkyson and approached him on the subject; that they had drinks together at the expense of Dr. White; that later on he induced Gilkyson to promise that he would either go away, or, if sworn, would know nothing, and that he gave him $5 for that purpose; that in the meantime, one Henry Spitz, who proved to be a detective in the employ of Dr. White, and attending court in his service, had invited himself and Gilkyson to dine with him, and, without going into further detail, that Gilkyson informed him that he had received $10 or some such sum from Spitz to leave the court, and that he finally did leave; that he (Ross) had given Gilkyson $5, and promised him $5 more on behalf of the doctor, if he (Gilkyson) should go upon the stand and know nothing; and that he (Ross) by agreement with Dr. White, was to have $10 for his services; and that after having paid Gilkyson $5 the doctor gave him $5 more in a private room in the restaurant. He said that the first $10 he received was paid to him by Dr. White in the courtroom corridor, and, when asked, he produced two $5 bills which he said were given to him by Dr. White, which were immediately taken from him by the court. In the course of the examination Col. Ward stated that he himself had seen the money paid by Dr. White to Ross. Ross was cross-examined by counsel for Dr. White, and Spitz stood up and was identified by Ross while on the stand. When Ross' cross-examination was finished, time for adjournment had arrived. The continuation of the trial of the issue of the main cause was set over to Thursday, the 30th of January, but the court declared that the matter of the alleged bribery would be taken up by the court one week from that day, January 20th, and oral directions were given that all the persons named should be there present on that day. Mr. Ward, in leaving the courtroom, stated that he could not be present, would be out of the state, and the court stated in substance that it did not require any immediate assistance from Col. Ward, but proposed to conduct the examination on its own behalf. Col. Ward also stated openly that a man by the name of Van Buren had seen the money paid. In the interval before the next Monday the court requested Mr. Charles D. Thompson, of the Hudson county bar, to act as counsel on behalf of the state in the investigation of this matter, which he kindly consented to do, and was furnished with a copy of Ross' testimony. It appeared that Gilkyson had left the courtroom and corridor shortly after 2 o'clock on the 13th, and returned to his place of employment, which was as a salesman and deliveryman in a vegetable market or green grocery in West Hoboken, kept by a firm of Heiney Bros.

Before coming to the evidence produced the next Monday, the 20th, I will mention what then appeared had occurred during the week. Shortly after the rising of the court Mrs. Julia Eaton, sometimes called Julia Madden, who was present in court, and who was the co-respondent named by Mrs. White, with her sister, Miss Madden, and the fiancé of her sister, a Mr. Gerhart, at the special request of Doctor White entered a closed carriage and drove to Heiney Bros. establishment, and called Gilkyson out and interviewed him. The details of that interview will be stated later. In the evening Gerhart visited Mrs. Eaton's house in West Hoboken to see his fiancé, Miss Madden, who lived with her, and from there went to the house of Gilkyson, who was a newly married man living in a suite of rooms a few blocks away from his place of business. While Gerhart was talking with Gilkyson, the hour being late, Mr. Spitz, the detective, in company with a Mr. Kriger, who has a detective bureau and of whose staff Spitz is a member, also visited Gilkyson and talked with him. What occurred there is a matter of dispute, and will be referred to later on. But the result was that the four—Kriger, Spitz, Gerhart, and Gilkyson—at that late hour went to a justice of the peace, and Gilkyson made an affidavit that he had been offered money, but refused to accept it. The affidavit was sworn to and was taken away by Mr. Kriger. The next Thursday Gilkyson was induced to go with Spitz and Kriger (I think) and Dr. White to the office of Judge Hudspeth, Dr. White's counsel, and there was questioned by Judge Hudspeth, and declared that he had received no money. Again, on Saturday night Dr. White and Mr. Kriger called together at Gilkyson's house, and found only his wife, Gilkyson being absent, and left word with her that her husband should come to Dr. White's office the next morning (Sunday); and Gilkyson, in pursuance of the message, did go to Dr. White's office the next Sunday morning, and saw Dr. White, and there met Kriger and another man named ——. What occurred at Dr. White's office is also a matter of dispute, which will be referred to later on. But I stop to say that Dr. White's account of why he called on Gilkyson, and why Gilkyson came to his office on Sunday morning, was decidedly unsatisfactory. At first he seemed to be uncertain whether any such visit had taken place.

On Monday, the 20th of January, all the parties attended, with a full following of witnesses and friends; also Mr. Thompson, on behalf of the state, and Judge Hudspeth, on behalf of Dr. White. Gilkyson was the first person sworn. He is a young man, 22 years old, and appears, by the evidence of his employer, to have been eight years steadily employed by Heiney Bros., and to be a trusted employé. He also appeared to be a man of limited education. He gave his evidence at first on direct with considerable reluctance, and was by no means what is called a willing witness, but the effect of a severe cross-examination was to make him more inclined to speak out. He stated that, knowing that the White Case was coming on for trial, he obtained leave of absence for half a day from his employers, and attended the court out of curiosity; that between 10 and 11 o'clock in the morning Mrs. White accosted him and asked him what he knew; that he told her, in substance, that he had met Dr. White at Mrs. Eaton's, and that Mrs. Eaton had introduced him to Dr. White as her brother; that during the forenoon, while in the corridor of the courtrooms, he was approached by Ross, who commenced to talk about the case, and asked him down to have a drink; that they went out to a near-by drinking saloon, and had two drinks together; that Ross gave him $5; that he did not know for what it was given, but he finally stated that Ross had promised him another $5 after he got off the witness stand, but he did not know for what it was given. He further stated that Mr. Spitz had given him $5, but he did not know for what it was given; that altogether he had received $10; that both of the sums were given avowedly on behalf of Dr. White. He testified that he had told Spitz that he had met Dr. White at Mrs. Eaton's; that after they had two or three drinks they went back to the court rooms, and that Spitz invited him and Ross out to dinner; that was about noon and while the court was still in session; that after dinner, and after the court had reassembled after recess, Spitz had given him $5 more in a saloon, making $10, which he had received in all; and that shortly after receiving the $5 from Spitz he went back to his business. He further said that, when he went out with Ross to drink, he was followed by Zink, who seemed to be watching him and Ross. He further testified that he did not take the money when it was first offered to him, but afterwards did take it. The offer of money in the corridor by Ross to Gilkyson is proven by Gerhart. He further testified that in going down in the elevator with Ross and Zink, after, as the proofs show, Ross had become somewhat intoxicated, Mr. Ward was also in the elevator, and that Ross talked to him and spoke to him about having given him the $5, and that he was hushed by Spitz, who was also in the party; and that Julia Eaton had said to him in the corridor, "There is five more coming to you, if you shut your mouth," and that, if he would come to her house at night, she would give it to him. He further stated, on cross-examination, that Dr. White spoke to him and recognized him before he had the conversation with Mrs. White early in the morning, and that in the afternoon, a little after 2 o'clock, the doctor asked him if he had got $5 from Ross, that he understood that he had, and then the doctor told him that he had better go home, and said that Spitz would give him another $5 to go home, and then, when he told him to go home, he added, "I will send Spitz down with $5," and then Spitz came out in the hall and said, "Hurry up down;" and that he went down with him; and that Spitz gave him the $5. He further testified on this occasion to the visit to him on Monday night made by Gerhart, Spitz, and Kriger, and his going to the justice of the peace and swearing to an affidavit; also that in the afternoon of the same Monday Julia Eaton had come to him where he was working and said, if he did not look out—if he said that he took the money, he would get five years in the State Prison, and Gerhart, on the same occasion, told the same thing; and that in the evening, when Gerhart and Spitz came to see him, they told him, that, if he admitted that he got the $5, he would go to the State Prison for five years. And it was plain from his evidence that the threats made by Mrs. Eaton and by Spitz and Gerhart influenced him in signing the affidavit, and also in making the statement at Judge Hudspeth's office. He further, being recalled, testifies that on Sunday morning, January 19th, the day before the investigation was to come on, he went, in pursuance of Dr. White's request, to his office and saw him; that Dr. White took him into a private room and gave him a cigar, and commenced to talk with him, and said, "We will put Dave Ross in jail. We will put him in jail, and you stick to me and I will give you $75."

The next witness sworn was Mr. Van Buren, who was mentioned by Col. Ward when he left the courtroom on the afternoon of Monday, the 13th of January. He testified that he was a subpoena server and had been a bartender, and that he had been employed, first, by Mr. Gilman, the former counsel, and afterward by Mr. Ward to serve subpoenas. He denied that he was a detective or had done any detective work. His business was that of a bartender. He had a decidedly sober and respectable appearance, and not a single suggestion was made at any time against his character. (It is proper here to say that the courtroom door leading to the corridor is not visible from the bench and from that part of the courtroom occupied by the bar, from which it is hidden by a high screen which makes a sort of inner hall or corridor in the courtroom.) Van Buren swears that he was standing in the corridor in the afternoon while Zink was on the stand, and that he saw Gilkyson and Dr. White talking together in the corridor, and Dr. White left Gilkyson and came to the courtroom door and beckoned to Spitz, who answered his call, and they met in the corridor; that the doctor took money out of his pocket, gave it to Spitz—how much he could not see—and the doctor came in the courtroom, and Spitz went right up close to Gilkyson and, as he thought, handed him some money—he could not tell how much—and told him to get out; and they went out together, and went down the elevator. Spitz swears to this occurrence, but denies the acceptance.

In corroboration of this witness a Mrs. Welcher, who lived in Paterson, and had been sworn previously as a witness for Mrs. White, and was one of her suite, was called. She swears that she was present on the 13th of January; that, while Zink was on the stand, she was sitting in the window recess behind the screen and she saw Dr. White go past her into the corridor, and in a few minutes he came back to the screen; saw him motioning to somebody, and Spitz passed out from the second seat in the courtroom and followed him; that in a few minutes Dr. White returned; and that the witness waited until he passed into the courtroom, and then she stepped into the corridor and saw Spitz talking to Gilkyson. And, further, by a witness named Schmale, who swore that he was in the courtroom during the morning and afternoon of the 13th of January. He left the courtroom while Zink was on the stand, went out through the corridor to the toilet in the main corridor, and on his way coming back to the courtroom he saw Dr. White, who was standing in the corridor, put his right hand in his pocket and pull out a roll of bills and give some of the money to Spitz; that Gilkyson was then in the corridor by the folding doors, and Spitz motioned to him to wait, and then Spitz went towards Gilkyson, and Gilkyson went out, and he (the witness) came into the courtroom and reported to Mr. Ward and Mr. Van Buren what he had seen; that he did not see Spitz give Gilkyson money, but he saw them go out together. Spitz swears that on that occasion he was called out of the courtroom to the corridor by Dr. White, but denies that White gave him any money. He says that White called him out to inquire who a certain woman sitting in the courtroom was. This transaction is denied by Dr. White, and his counsel and the clerk of the latter both testify that all the while Zink was on the stand Dr. White was sitting beside them. But it was quite possible that he might have left the table for a few minutes without attracting their attention, or that the witnesses were mistaken as to the occurrence taking place after Zink took the stand. It might well have occurred in the afternoon before Zink took the stand. The witnesses of the state are corroborated by Spitz.

Next after Gilkyson and Van Buren were sworn, on the 20th Ross was again put on the stand. He was perfectly sober, and proved to be a prompt and reasonably intelligent witness. He reiterated his previous statement much more in detail. His manner on the stand was decidedly in his favor. The only difference being that while he was understood on the 13th of January to swear that Dr. White gave him the money for the double purpose of getting Gilkyson not to go on the stand, or, if he went on the stand, to know nothing, the effect of his testimony was that the money was given to him to induce Gilkyson, if he went on the stand, to suppress what he knew. The witness was severely cross-examined, and, in my judgment, except in the matter just stated, came out from his cross-examination unhurt. It clearly appeared from his evidence that the doctor and his followers, especially Spitz, maneuvered to give him an opportunity to operate upon Gilkyson; that he and Gilkyson were induced to drink; that Spitz invited Ross and Gilkyson to take luncheon with him, and that he was given an opportunity by Spitz to talk with Gilkyson over the luncheon table; and it also appears clearly enough that, in this operation of treating Ross, the latter drank too much, so that he was incautious and practiced his persuasions with Gilkyson rather openly in descending the elevator in the presence of Mr. Ward and Zink, he (Ross) not knowing who the latter gentlemen were. After, owing to his lack of caution, he had been detected by Mr. Ward, Ward approached Ross and charged him with having been engaged in improper practices, and told him that, if he would go on the stand and tell the truth, he would not prosecute him. Ross was somewhat sobered by this time, having lost some of the contents of his stomach by natural causes, and consented to go on the stand, and did so the same afternoon. A fierce attack was made upon the character of Ross. Witnesses were produced, first, to attack his general character for truth and veracity. It appears that he lived with his parents in West Hoboken or Jersey City Heights, or somewhere in that neighborhood, and that he and his father have been more or less engaged in local politics and had stirred up enmity, and that his father had had quarrels with one or two of his neighbors, with the result that some of these neighbors were willing to come forward and swear that his reputation for truth and veracity was not good; but on cross-examination it appeared that each had had quarrels with his father. In addition to this evidence certain deputy sheriffs, of respectable appearance, were sworn, and testified that he was known as what is called a "booster," who attended fairs and public places where gambling devices were permitted, and that he was in collusion with the proprietors of these establishments, and openly gambled with them, and was permitted by them to win money and thereby induce innocent bystanders to suppose that they could accomplish the like result by taking their chances in turn. This evidence was permitted by the court, with protest as to its admissibility. But, on the other hand, it appeared that the man was an ordinary industrious working man, and was entitled to such credit as was due to that circumstance. There is not the least circumstance in the case from which it may be inferred that he had the least interest to be served by coming forward and telling a positive falsehood of the character which has been mentioned, except that of saving himself from criminal prosecution. The worst that can be urged against his character is his open confession on the stand that he took Dr. White's money to be used for the purpose of perverting evidence to be given in a court of justice; and, as before remarked, in testifying as he did he was testifying directly against his own interests. And it must be observed right here that there is not the least reason to believe that he was subjected to any influence on the part of Mrs. White after he was sworn on the 18th of January and before he was sworn the second time. Mrs. White, I may say here once for all, is somewhat helpless, apparently with little or no money, and with no male following to assist her, except the lad, Zink. And it must be remarked here that the marshaling of the evidence on the part of what may be termed the prosecution was done entirely by Mr. Thompson and his clerk, and that Mr. Ward had nothing whatever to do with it—was not, so far as appears, in Hudson county from the 18th of January until he himself was sworn as a witness, among the very last, on the 3d of February. Ross was interviewed by Spitz between the 18th and 20th, and all that Spitz got from him was that Dr. White had got him in the scrape and ought to get him a lawyer and get him out.

The next witness called was Mr. Zink, who swears that early in the forenoon of the 18th of January he saw Gilkyson sitting in the corridor, and inquired of him whether he was a witness, and he said he was not, and later on in the conversation asked him what he was doing there, and he said he knew a thing or two, but would not tell, but that finally he said that it would help Mrs. White a great deal; that he learned from Gilkyson later that he had received money, and that he communicated that fact to Mr. Ward, and before that, at Mr. Ward's request, he followed and watched Ross and Gilkyson, and presumably reported what he saw to Mr. Ward or Mrs. White.

Dr. White commenced with the presentation of his case on the 20th of January. He himself denied directly all the charges made; denied that he had ever had any conversation with Ross or gave him any money. He admitted that he gave Spitz $2 before luncheon, to be used in getting dinner for himself and two others. He denied that he had ever seen Gilkyson before; that he had ever met him at Mrs. Eaton's. He admitted meeting Gilkyson at his counsel's office on the Thursday; admitted going to his house on Saturday evening with Mr. Kriger; and admitted that Gilkyson had come to his office on Sunday morning, the 19th, but denied that he had offered him or promised him any money whatever.

Kriger swore that he heard on the afternoon of the 18th of January that it had been stated in court that his employé, Spitz, had paid a man $5 to affect his evidence or to get him away, and that he was very much worried about it; was unwilling to have it supposed that a man in his employ would do such a thing; that he cared nothing about Dr. White, and took no interest in the affair, so far as he was concerned; and, looking out entirely for his own interest, he went with Spitz, late at night, to Gilkyson's house and found Gerhart there; he denied all expectation of meeting Gerhart there; that he asked Gilkyson if it was true that any money had been paid him by Spitz, and that Gilkyson denied it; that no threats of any kind were made to Gilkyson at all; that Gilkyson voluntarily went with him before Squire Maes, and voluntarily made the affidavit. He produced the affidavit, and upon its reading it appeared that the affidavit did not mention Spitz's name at all. It speaks entirely of a charge of receiving money from Ross, but at the end of it is a little clause in which he denies that he received any money from anybody. Mr. Kriger was not able to explain to the satisfaction of the court how it came that, if he was there entirely looking after the character of his own employé, Mr. Ross' name was specifically mentioned in the affidavit, and not that of Spitz. Further, Mr. Kriger swore that he came to the chancery chambers on Monday morning, the 20th of January, and was there interviewed by Mr. Thompson before the investigation was taken up, and that Mr. Thompson asked him about this affidavit which Gilkyson had made, and asked him if he had it; that he told Mr. Thompson that he had lost it, and that he had looked for it two hours and could not find it. He admitted that this was a positive lie, for he had the affidavit in his pocket. Asked why he did not tell Mr. Thompson the truth, he said that he did not know who Mr. Thompson was, and intimated that it was none of Mr. Thompson's business. This explanation of Mr. Kriger is entirely unsatisfactory to the court. In the first place the court does not believe that Mr. Kriger did not know who Mr. Thompson was, and, while Mr. Thompson was not sworn, the court can almost presume that a gentleman of Mr. Thompson's standing at the bar would have informed Mr. Kriger that he was acting on behalf of the court in getting information. And on the best standpoint for Mr. Kriger all Kriger had to do was to say that he had the affidavit and decline to produce it. I am of the opinion that that is the stand that a truthful man would have and should have taken, if he did not desire Mr. Thompson to see the affidavit; and the only motive he could have in making the statement that he did was to try and induce Mr. Thompson to believe that the affidavit was not in existence, in order thereby to lead Gilkyson to deny some of the contents, and then produce the affidavit to contradict him. That motive I conceive to be an entirely unworthy one, and not consistent with uprightness of character. Besides, it is entirely manifest throughout the examination of this witness, who was twice on the stand, that he gave a gloss, favorable to Dr. White and unfavorable to the witnesses Ross, Gilkyson, and others who were produced against him, to all the facts that he was obliged to admit. So far, therefore, as Kriger's testimony contradicts anything that Gilkyson has testified to, I can give it little weight.

Spitz, being sworn, testified: That early in the forenoon he met Gilkyson in a saloon, and asked him what he was there for and what he knew, and that Gilkyson told him that he had met Dr. White at Mrs. Eaton's, and had been introduced to him by Mrs. Eaton as her brother, and that he had drunk whisky with Dr. White at Mrs. Eaton's. That when he went in the saloon he found Dr. White and his party there, and Ross and Gilkyson, all drinking, apparently together. That afterwards he went up to the courtroom and saw Ross and Gilkyson about there, and then they went down together and had something more to drink, and afterwards had luncheon, and by this time Ross had become drunk. That on one occasion in going down in the elevator, when Ross, Gilkyson, Zink, and Mr. Ward were all present, Ross told Gilkyson that he had done the right thing by him, had paid him $5 to know nothing, or something to that effect, and that he (Spitz) had hushed him up. He admits that he received $2 from Dr. White to pay for dinners, which was used by him in paying for the dinners of Ross and Gilkyson. That was before luncheon time and while the court was still in its morning session. That after luncheon, as I have already stated, he was called from the courtroom to the corridor by Dr. White, precisely as was testified to by Van Buren, Mrs. Welcher, and Schmele; but that Dr. White did not give him any money, and that he did not, on that occasion, speak to Gilkyson. He denies that he gave Gilkyson any money. He denies that any threats were made to Gilkyson on the occasion of his signing the affidavit. He denies that on the morning of the 13th of January, after he learned from Gilkyson what he knew about the doctor, he communicated that information to either his principal, Dr. White, or to the latter's counsel. Now, Mr. Spitz was by profession a detective, and he was in the employ of Dr. White, and was using Dr. White's money, and his statement that he failed to inform his principal of what he had so heard is simply incredible. In fact, it is quite plain that he approached and talked with both Ross and Gilkyson for the purpose of finding out what they knew, and that it was done at the request of his principal, Dr. White. The manner of this witness on the stand was not good, and, so far as he contradicts anybody, I place no reliance upon his evidence.

One other important feature of the case may be disposed of here. Mr. Gilkyson, called to the stand the second time, stated in greater detail what occurred when he was called upon at his place of business by Gerhart and Mrs. Eaton on the afternoon of the 13th. He swears that they came there in a closed carriage, and Gerhart called him out, and that the carriage was close to the curb, and that Gerhart said to him, "Are you Gilkyson?" He said, 'Yea.' 'Do you know what is staring you in the face?' I says, 'No.' He said: 'Five years for taking the money. If anybody comes down and wants you to make out an affidavit on Mrs. White's side, don't you do it. Stick to us. There is more money on Dr. White's side. Mrs. White has not got a cent to back it'—and to go in the coach and see the doctor." And then that, after Mrs. Eaton invited him into the coach the door was closed, and Gerhart was on the outside. She said to him: "Do you know what is staring you in the face?" I said, 'No,' and she says, 'Five years.' But she says, 'Stick to Dr. White. If you don't, you will go to jail for five years.'" He further stated that Miss Madden and Mrs. Eaton advised him not to admit that he had received such money, and that, if he would call at the doctor's office, he would get $5 more. The whole of this story is denied by Gerhart, Mrs. Eaton, and Miss Madden. They all swear that no such conversation took place, and positively denied that Gilkyson entered the carriage.

In support of his evidence Gilkyson brings on the stand a young man, Mr. Cathcart, who was a salesman in Heiney Bros. market, and who swears that his attention was called to the carriage stopping at the side of the store, which was on a corner; that Gilkyson was called out, and that he had an opportunity to see what was going on from the side window of the store or market; and that he saw Gilkyson get in the carriage with the ladies, and the door close after him. The manner of this witness on the stand was good, and he was not shaken on cross-examination. I can find no reason, other than the contradictory evidence, why I should not believe him.

Another important witness to the same effect was produced, and that was a boy, only 12 years old, named Reitz, who lived with his parents next to Heiney's store, and who was evidently badly frightened by being put upon the witness stand, so that he sobbed and was obliged to be relieved for several minutes until he could gain courage enough even to open his lips; but finally he summoned courage to testify, and he swore that he was playing on the sidewalk that night, saw this carriage drive up, and saw Gilkyson, whom he did not know by his name, but by his nickname, "Red," from the color of his hair, get into the carriage with the ladies, leaving Gerhart outside. Now, I watched the manner of this boy with great care, and while I am well aware that children of that age can sometimes be prepared for an examination so that they can falsify with great ease, and sometimes are difficult to detect, yet in this case, judging from the manner of this boy, I find it impossible to believe that he was so prepared, and I find it impossible to disbelieve his evidence. I therefore come to the conclusion that it is true that Mrs. Eaton and her sister and Gerhart did call upon Gilkyson and use to him, in substance, the language which he states. That they went there at the instance of Dr. White is equally plain.

The theory of the defense was that the whole affair was the result of a conspiracy between Zink, possibly Mrs. White, and Ross; and in support of that theory proof was offered that Zink and Ross were seen talking together during the forenoon of the 13th of January, and that Zink was seen close to Ross and Gilkyson in the drinking saloons. And there is further evidence, given on behalf of Dr. White, to the effect that on the afternoon of the 13th, after Ross had left the stand, Zink went to him, and, in the full hearing of three or four ladies belonging to the Dr. White party, said to him that he did first-rate on the stand, and that, when Ross said that he had lost his $10, Zink said, "Never mind; come downstairs, and I will make it all up to you." Evidence was given on the other side showing facts which were entirely inconsistent with the possibility or probability of any such conversation having taken place. I deem the solution of that question of fact of little importance, because I think that what Zink is alleged to have said to Ross was, under the circumstances, quite natural, and consistent with the truth of Ross' story. The investigation was adjourned from the 20th of January to the 3d of February.

On the afternoon of the 3d of February, and after most of the evidence on the part of the state had been put in, Col. Ward, who had been absent until then, took the stand, and gave at much length his recollection of the occurrences of the 13th of January. I do not propose to recite his evidence in full. It is enough to say that he swears: That he was warned by his client, Mrs. White, that Dr. White had been using money outside against her, and that she told him during the forenoon that she thought the doctor was up to his old tricks, and that, as a consequence, he kept his eyes open. That he had a talk with Gilkyson early in the morning, in which Gilkyson told him that he had met Dr. White in Mrs. Eaton's house, and had been introduced to him by Mrs. Eaton as her brother, and that the doctor had then treated him to whisky, and asked him his opinion as to Mrs. Eaton. That he asked him if he had been subpoenaed, and he said, "No." That he told him that he wished him to stay as a witness, and that he was entitled to a witness fee and would get it from Mrs. White. That Gilkyson promised to stay. That after this interview, and after he learned that Ross was one of Mrs. White's witnesses, he saw Dr. White in very earnest conversation with Ross in the main corridor, at some distance from the door leading into the courtroom corridor. That White was speaking to Ross in a very persuasive manner, and that finally they came into the courtroom corridor, and that he, the witness, passed into the courtroom No. 2. (And I stop here to say that the entrance to that courtroom, as well as the other, is guarded by a high screen, which forms a sort of interior corridor leading to the seat by the window, so that a person opening the door cannot be seen from the space occupied by the bar and bench.) That White and Ross came into the corridor, and that the earnest conversation continued; Ross at first refusing, by shaking his head, to accede to White's request, and finally consenting. That he saw White take money out of his pocket and hand it to Ross. That shortly after Ross received the money he came in and spoke to the boy, Gilkyson, and wanted him to go downstairs, and that he, the witness, said to Ross, "Hold on! Don't go yet. You are our witness. We will need you any moment." Ross said: "That is all right. Come on, Gilkyson." And they went away rapidly. Then he told Zink not to lose sight of them, not to take his eyes off them, but follow them. That they went off together and presently returned, and that Dr. White was behind them. That afterwards the witness went down in the elevator with Van Buren just before luncheon, found Ross, Gilkyson, and Spitz in the elevator, and heard Ross saying to Gilkyson: "You mustn't know a thing. You are going to get money not to know a thing. Now, you are going to get well paid for this. Don't know a thing when you go on the stand. You are going to get money when you get off." Then Spitz said to Gilkyson: "Now, you know Julia Eaton. You go up there, and she is going to make it all right with you to-night. This ain't all you are going to get. You are going to get more." That he afterwards saw Dr. White talking to Ross earnestly. That after luncheon he approached Ross and asked him if he knew what he had been doing, that he could send him (Ross) with White and Gilkyson to State Prison, that they were conspiring together to do Mrs. White an injury—and told him that he had seen him take money from Dr. White in the hall, that he was interfering with justice, etc., and that he proposed to complain to the Vice Chancellor and threatened him with punishment, and that Ross said to him that he would be willing to tell the truth about it. And Col. Ward said: "That is all I want you to do. You tell the truth when this matter comes up, for I am certainly going to call the Vice Chancellor's attention to this matter." And that shortly afterwards Gilkyson came to him and started to repeat to him what he told him in the morning, and that Mr. Ward told him that he had heard him talking to Ross, and that Gilkyson said, "They have given me money to go away, $5, and I won't give it back to them, but I am going to tell the truth," and that he put Ross on the stand, with the result already stated.

Now, the principal and most important question to be determined is, did Dr. White give Ross money? For, if he did, then, under all the evidence in this case, there can be no doubt of the object for which he gave it to him. If he gave the money, as testified to by Mr. Ward and Ross himself, then he is so thoroughly contradicted in the case that I am justified in assuming that the evidence of the other witnesses, Ross and Gilkyson, is true, namely, that he gave it to him for the purpose stated. And it is also true that, if what Mr. Ward swears to is not true, then he is a part and parcel of the conspiracy which is charged by the counsel of Dr. White against Mrs. White and Zink. Now, there is one remark to be made about Mr. Ward and his evidence. In the first place, he is a member of the bar of the state of New Jersey, of long and high standing, and, also, he is a man of great experience in affairs, and to say the least, of ordinary common sense and judgment; and all this is quite independent of the reputation for honesty and truthfulness which must be accorded to him. But grant, for argument's sake, that he is capable of devising such a conspiracy and setting it in motion, as is claimed by the defendant; would he be foolish enough to do it? Certainly, if he did undertake it, he must have known that when he instigated Ross to go through the motions which he did with Gilkyson—for it must be remembered that there is no kind of doubt but that Ross did, in his drunken moments, openly declare to Gilkyson that he had done the square thing by him, and that he must go away, or know nothing if he got on the stand—I say that when Mr. Ward devised that scheme and set it in motion, if he did do it, he must have known that he was subjecting himself to the risk of having both those persons, who were before that day, so far as appears, perfect strangers to him, betray him, and if they betrayed him, the result would be ruinous to him. Now, it seems to me that the notion that Col. Ward would place himself at the mercy of two such men as the defendant insists Ross and Gilkyson are is simply incredible. But now, independent of that consideration, is it possible to believe that Col. Ward has deliberately perjured himself in the story which he tells? I am unable to believe that he has. His story fits in substantially with that of Ross and Gilkyson and Van Buren and several other witnesses called by Mr. Thompson, and all that evidence is entirely inconsistent with the truth of the line of defense put forward by Dr. White and by Spitz.

It is urged that the evidence of Gilkyson was not of sufficient importance to make it worth while for Dr. White to spend the money which it is alleged he did spend for the purpose of suppressing it, and hence that there was no sufficient motive for the act. The evidence is that Gilkyson told Col. Ward that he had met Dr. White at Mrs. Eaton's house late in the evening, and that the doctor had there produced spirits and treated him, and that some conversation had passed between him (Gilkyson) and the doctor, from which it might be inferred that the doctor had admitted to Gilkyson that Mrs. Eaton was a person of easy virtue. Here, then, was, I think, a sufficient motive. However, the fact that Dr. White was seen in Mrs. Eaton's house in the evening was one which it is quite evident the doctor might not wish to have proven against him, and it would be impossible for the court to estimate in money the measure of his desire to suppress the evidence. Then, again, is it at all probable that the two men, Ross and Gilkyson, would have stood out to the end in support of their stories, if those stories had been false? The case of Gilkyson is remarkable in that respect. He had everything to gain and nothing to lose by adhering to the denial he had made both to Kriger and Judge Hudspeth. What influence changed him? Did Zink operate upon him? There is no proof of it. On the contrary, the proof is that he (Gilkyson) was constantly watched and pressed by Dr. White and his employees. No stone was left unturned to keep him to his denial. So far as appears, his employers were friendly to Dr. White. Then, again, how can we account for the conduct of Dr. White and his employees in following up Gilkyson so closely and procuring these statements from him, if Dr. White was innocent? Then, again, I have read the evidence of the two witnesses, Ross and Gilkyson, several times, and I find it difficult to believe they could have concocted, though inspired by Col. Ward, and have carried through, a scheme such as it is contended they have, and relate it on the stand, and stood the test of cross-examination as well as they have, if it had not been substantially true.

An attempt has been made to discredit the evidence of Col. Ward and of Ross and Gilkyson by showing that the alleged payment by Dr. White to Ross, which they charged was made in the main corridor of the courtroom, must have been so made in the presence of several persons under circumstances which render it highly improbable that Dr. White would attempt such a thing. For this purpose the hour mentioned by Col. Ward and by Ross for that occurrence is relied upon, and evidence is given tending to show that the corridor was at that time full of people who must have witnessed the transaction. Now, in the first place, no particular hour was or could be fixed, either by Col. Ward or by the witnesses who testify to the condition of the corridor at the time. It appears that persons were lounging in and passing through the corridor at various times, but the whole time was not covered by the evidence; and, considering it all together, I am satisfied that it was quite easy for Dr. White to hand the money to Ross at the place mentioned, near the outside swinging doors and near the entrance to the courtroom No. 2, where Col. Ward stood, without being observed by any person in the lobby other than Dr. White's own friends.

Again, some confusion in the evidence arises out of the fact that Ross, Gilkyson, and Spitz went out to lunch at or shortly after 12 o'clock, and before the midday recess of court, which was between 1 and 2 o'clock. I gather the order of events to be as follows: The money was handed by Dr. White to Ross about 11 a. m., or possibly a quarter of an hour sooner, or a quarter of an hour later. Ross and Gilkyson, followed by Zink, left for the drinking saloon, all followed by Dr. White and his party. They drank several times, until both Ross and Gilkyson became somewhat intoxicated—Ross probably the more of the two. They returned to the courtroom at or about 2 o'clock. Ross showed his condition by loud talk, etc., and offered Gilkyson some money almost openly. So Gerhart swears, and is corroborated by Gilkyson, who swears that he first refused the money and afterwards accepted it. They then went to luncheon under the escort of Spitz, and had a further talk about money with Gilkyson, and I infer that he had required $5 cash, and a promise of more at the end of his evidence. Ross had already obtained an additional $5 from White. After lunch they again ascended to the courtroom, reaching there about 1 o'clock. Ross then gave Gilkyson $5, and promised him another $5 after he came off the stand, and Mrs. Eaton also promised him an additional $5. A little after 1 o'clock, and after the court had arisen, they descended in the elevator, and on their way down Ross exposed himself by reminding Gilkyson of the money he had paid him, and promised him more in the presence of Spitz and Col. Ward and some others. They then had further refreshments in one of the eating and drinking places, and Ross, being sickened, relieved his stomach, and found his way back to the courtroom about or a little after 2 o'clock. Then he was accosted by Col. Ward, and threatened with prosecution, unless he told the truth, and Gilkyson was accosted by Dr. White and urged to go home. White called out Spitz and gave him money to send Gilkyson home, and Spitz went out with Gilkyson and gave him another $5, and started him off for home. That I believe to be the order of events and the actual truth of the case.

The result is that I find, as a matter of fact, that Dr. White, Spitz, and Mrs. Eaton were all engaged in the enterprise of suppressing Gilkyson's evidence which he was expected to give on the merits of the case. And I further find that Dr. White, Spitz, Gerhart, Kriger, and Mrs. Eaton were afterwards engaged in a conspiracy to prevent Gilkyson from the telling the truth in this investigation. Dr. White has been fully heard by counsel on an oral order to show cause. The other parties just named were not technically represented by counsel, and technically have not had their day in court, though in truth and fact they have had their day in court. If they desire further to be heard in evidence and by argument, I will give them an opportunity to be heard.

Subsequently all those parties waived further hearing, and submitted to the judgment of the court. The Chancellor adopted the result of the Vice Chancellor, and sentenced them each to pay a fine, varying according to his judgment of the degree of their several guilt.

PRYOR v. GRAY.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Dec. 21, 1905.)

1. EQUITY—BILL—SUFFICIENCY.

A bill alleging that the defendant, under a void chattel mortgage obtained from an insolvent corporation of which complainant was receiver, by taking possession and sale of the corporation's chattels, wrongfully realized unknown sums of money, for which an accounting was prayed, stated a sufficient ground of equitable jurisdiction.

2. SAME—CERTAINTY OF ALLEGATIONS.

A bill alleging the appointment of complainant as receiver of a corporation; the execution by the latter to defendant of a chattel mortgage on the corporation's stock in trade, etc., that such chattels remained in possession of the corporation, etc.; that the mortgage was illegally recorded, because neither acknowledged nor properly witnessed; the subsequent taking possession of the mortgaged chattels by defendant; a sale of part thereof by him, and the acquisition of possession by complainant under a stipulation with defendant providing in effect that complainant should have such possession and be entitled to sell the chattels clear of the mortgage, the lien thereof, if of any validity, to attach to the proceeds of the sale; a subsequent sale of the property under order of court—and further alleging that defendant claimed a lien on the purchase money, that he had in his possession a large sum derived from the sale by him prior to the time complainant took possession, the filing of claims against the corporation, and praying an accounting, was sufficiently definite in its statements of fact to show that it charged defendant with wrongfully claiming under his void chattel mortgage to have been entitled to sell the chattels and keep the proceeds, and the subsequent sale by complainant under the agreement that defendant's lien, if valid, should attach to the proceeds thereof.

3. CHATTEL MORTGAGES—RETENTION OF POSSESSION—RECORDING ACT.

Under the statute requiring immediate possession as a prerequisite to the validation of an unrecorded chattel mortgage, a chattel mortgage made July 18, 1904, and unrecorded, was void, where possession of the mortgaged property was not taken thereunder until December 8, 1904.

4. CORPORATIONS—INSOLVENCY—RECEIVERS—COLLECTION OF ASSETS.

A receiver of an insolvent corporation, praying an accounting by defendant for moneys received at a sale under a void chattel mortgage executed by the corporation to defendant, is not limited in challenging defendant's wrongful acts under such mortgage to those done after complainant's appointment.

5. EQUITY—DEMURRER TO ORIGINAL BILL—AMENDED BILL—WAIVER OF OBJECTIONS.

A defendant, demurring to an original bill, may not reserve existing grounds for demurrer thereto for presentation against the bill as amended; and by failing to present such grounds on demurrer to the original bill he waives any right of objection based thereon to the same extent as if he had pleaded over.

Bill by Robert W. Pryor, receiver of the E. C. Faltoute Hardware Company, against Allan J. Gray. On demurrer to amended bill. Demurrer overruled.

The bill of complaint in this cause, as amended, alleges that the complainant was on December 16, 1904, appointed receiver of the insolvent, a corporation of the state of New Jersey, because of its insolvency, and that he has duly qualified as such receiver; that on July 18, 1904, the insolvent corporation executed to the defendant a chattel mortgage on its stock in trade, fixtures, and other personal property in Newark, N. J., reasonably worth $11,000, to secure the payment of the sum of $5,000; that the mortgaged chattels remained in the possession of the insolvent company until December 8, 1904; and that the said chattel mortgage was illegally recorded in Essex county register's office, because it was neither acknowledged by the mortgagor, nor was the execution thereof proven by the subscribing witness. The bill further alleges that on the 6th day of December the defendant, Gray, took possession of the mortgaged chattels, and proceeded to sell the same at retail, and continued to do so until December 17, 1904, when the complainant, as receiver of the insolvent corporation, took possession of the mortgaged chattels under a stipulation with the defendant's solicitor, whereby it was agreed that the said receiver should have possession of the chattels, that they should be sold clear of the mortgage, and that the lien thereof, if of any validity, should attach to the moneys received from the sale; that all of the said chattels were, under an order of this court, sold at public auction to the defendant for the sum of $3,985, part of which was paid in cash, and part secured, to be paid by the complainant's bond, conditioned that if the mortgage should be declared illegal, and the defendant should pay the sum of $3,541.50, with interest thereon, and perform the order of the court in relation to the purchase money, the bond should be void. The bill further alleges that the defendant claims a lien on the purchase money and on the money due under said bond, and that he has in his possession a large sum of money collected from the sale of the said mortgaged chattels between December 8, and December 17, 1904; that claims against the insolvent company have been filed with the complainant as receiver to the amount of $17,411.07; and that the proceeds from the sale of the mortgaged chattels are all the assets of the insolvent company in possession of the receiver. The complainant prays that the mortgage may be decreed fraudulent and void as to him, and the lien thereof null and void, and that the defendant may account to the complainant for moneys received from the sale of chattels up to December 17th, at noon, and for further relief, etc. The only defendant is the chattel mortgagee, who demurs to the whole amended bill, and sets forth five several causes of demurrer which will be hereafter stated.

Frank Benjamin, for complainant. Malcolm MacLear, for defendant.

GREY, V. C. (after stating the facts). The first cause of demurrer challenges the bill because it does not show any facts which give this court jurisdiction, and particularly the demurrant insists that the bill shows that the mortgaged chattels have been sold clear of the mortgage, and no facts are alleged which show that the defendant claims any lien by virtue of the mortgage on either the mortgaged chattels or the money proceeds of their sale, etc. A sufficient ground of equitable jurisdiction is stated in the allegations that the defendant, under a void chattel mortgage obtained from the insolvent corporation, has, by taking possession and sale of that company's chattels wrongfully, realized unknown sums of money, for which the bill prays he may be decreed to account to the receiver of that company. The bill, taking it as a whole, is also sufficiently definite in its statements of fact to show that it charges that the defendant wrongfully claims under his void chattel mortgage to have been entitled to sell the insolvent company's chattels and keep the proceeds; that the moneys in dispute were realized under an order of this court upon an agreement of the defendant that the mortgaged chattels should be sold clear of the disputed chattel mortgage; and that the lien thereof, if it had any validity, should attach to the moneys proceeding from that sale. The averments of the amended bill inform the defendant that the subject regarding which he is called upon to respond is his claim to a lien, by virtue of his chattel mortgage, upon the goods of the insolvent company, and upon the fund raised by the sale of the chattel mortgaged goods, which chattel mortgage the complainant charges is void because not lawfully recorded. This notifies the defendant of the purpose of the suit which the Court of Appeals has held is all that is required in bills in equity. Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Sturges, 33 N. J. Eq. 337. The first ground of demurrer is overruled.

The second ground of demurrer avers that the complainant's attack on the chattel mortgage is inefficient, because on the face of the bill it appears that the defendant had, in fact, taken possession of the mortgaged property before the complainant was appointed receiver for the insolvent company mortgagor. The statute in dealing with the sort of possession which may validate an unrecorded chattel mortgage declared that it must be immediate. The complainant's contention is that the entry of the defendant's chattel mortgage in the mortgage book, without either certificate of its acknowledgment or proof of its execution, was in law not a recording. The pleadings show that the chattel mortgage was made on the 13th day of July, 1904, and that possession of the mortgaged goods was taken under it on the 6th day of December, 1904, nearly six months after its execution. In Roe v. Meding, 53 N. J. Eq. 368, 38 Atl. 394, the Court of Appeals declared that the requirement of the state regarding chattel mortgages is for immediate recording or immediate taking possession, for the obvious reason that one or the other is necessary to give notice to possible creditors of the mortgagor of the mortgagee's interest in the goods. In that case the delay in recording was less than three months, yet it was held to invalidate the chattel mortgage. The receiver is not limited in challenging the defendant's wrongful acts to those done after his appointment. The second ground of demurrer is overruled.

The third ground of demurrer contends that the bill of complaint does not show that the defendant claims any lien on the moneys received from the sale of the mortgaged chattels, by virtue of the mortgage, and does not show that the defendant has filed any claim with the receiver for moneys due under the chattel mortgage, or due by virtue thereof. This is substantially answered in the above discussion of the first ground of demurrer. Upon the whole case, as exhibited by the said bill of complaint, it obviously appears that the complainant, as receiver, etc., alleges that the defendant by virtue of his void chattel mortgage, and of the stipulation with the receiver, claims a lien upon the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged goods. This ground of demurrer, therefore, should be overruled.

The fourth ground of demurrer is that the amended bill of complaint does not show that there are any moneys due by the insolvent company to persons other than the defendant, or that persons other than the defendant are interested in the estate of the insolvent company. The fifth ground of demurrer is that the amended bill of complaint does not show that there are not sufficient moneys to pay all the debts of the insolvent company. Both these grounds of demurrer, challenging the amended bill (and indeed most of the others), might have been assigned against the original bill of complaint before it was amended. The defendant demurred to that bill, and did not then see fit to present these criticisms as grounds of demurrer. He thereby waived any right of objection for that cause to the same extent as if he had pleaded over. Bean v. Ayers, 69 Me. 128. He may not reserve existing grounds of demurrer to an original bill, and by presenting those defects successively against amendments unreasonably protract litigation and unjustly enhance the costs. Id.

The demurrer should be overruled, with costs.

FIDELITY TRUST CO. v. STATEN ISLAND CLAY CO. et al.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Nov. 22, 1905.)

CHattel Mortgages—Failure to Record—Effect—Creditors Entitled to Assert Invalidity.

Under the chattel mortgage act, declaring that an unrecorded mortgage "shall be absolutely void as against the creditors of the mortgagor," an unrecorded chattel mortgage is void as to creditors of a purchaser of the mortgaged property subject to the mortgage; such owner becoming, within the meaning of the statute, a mortgagor.

Bill to foreclose by the Fidelity Trust Company against the Staten Island Clay Company and others. Application for a rehearing and an order permitting defendant Dickinson, as receiver of defendant corporation, to amend his answer, etc. Motion allowed.

S. W. Beldon, for complainant. J. M. Dickinson, for defendant receiver.

BERGEN, V. C. The questions presented on the final hearing of this cause having been disposed of in accordance with the situation then existing. Application is now made for a rehearing, and an order permitting the defendant Dickinson to amend his answer so that it may set out that, as receiver of the defendant corporation, he represents creditors whose debts are unpaid, and also for permission to submit testimony in support of such amendment, it being suggested to the court that this defense was inadvertently overlooked by counsel on the former hearing. The application being made on behalf of creditors, is well addressed to a court of equity, and should receive favorable consideration if bona fide creditors will be benefited thereby. The complainant resists this application upon the ground alone that, admitting the applicant's claim to be true in fact, no relief can be given. The contest relates to the lien of a chattel mortgage on personal property, which for want of proper record, the complainant concedes is void as to creditors of the mortgagor. The mortgage was given by the Staten Island Terra Cotta Lumber Company; it was never recorded, and the mortgaged chattels remained in the possession of the mortgagor, by whom they were sold in bulk to the defendant company, of which the present applicant is the receiver, appointed in insolvency proceedings. The sale was made subject to the mortgage, so that the purchaser took with notice of the mortgage, and, as between it and the mortgagee, it was a valid incumbrance. The applicant now claims the right to contest the validity of this mortgage as the representative of the creditors of such purchaser; it not appearing that there are any creditors of the mortgagor. The complainant puts its resistance to the granting of the application, upon the ground that the statute declares such an unrecorded mortgage void, only as to the creditors of the party giving the mortgage, and that the advantage which the law gives to the creditors of a mortgagor, where the mortgage is not recorded, does not extend to creditors of a purchaser from the mortgagor. The pertinent words contained in the chattel mortgage act are, "shall be absolutely void as against the creditors of the mortgagor." The complainant contends that these words have a limited meaning, and that if there are no creditors of the person who gave the mortgage, there is no such "mortgagor," as the act contemplates, and that the mortgage is good, though unrecorded, not only against the purchaser with notice, but also against the creditors of such purchaser, even though they have dealt with, and extended credit to him, as the owner of the goods, without actual or constructive notice that such chattels are subject to the lien of the mortgage.

Before the recording act, chattel mortgages unaccompanied by change of possession were prima facie fraudulent as to creditors, mortgagees or purchasers, without notice; the fraud inferred, however, being subject to explanatory evidence of the bona fides of the transaction, and the act referred to was passed to enable the holder of a mortgage to permit the owner to retain possession, and at the same time warn all who might give credit to the owner because of his possession of the goods, that there was an outstanding claim against them. Knickerbocker Trust Company v. Penn. Cordage Company, 65 N. J. Eq. 181-185, 55 Atl. 231. This mortgage, in the absence of the statute, would be void as to every creditor of a subsequent owner of the goods, who might obtain a lawful lien thereon, because possession of the goods had not been taken by the mortgagee, unless such nontransfer was satisfactorily explained, for such neglect to take possession was held to be prima facie fraudulent. We must therefore consider to what extent the recording act has changed the relation of the parties to such a contract. By its terms, a mortgage on chattels, unaccompanied by possession, is made absolutely void as to the creditors of the mortgagor, the purpose of the act being to protect persons in extending credit to one having the visible possession and ownership of chattels, unless the mortgagee saw fit to make public, in the manner required by law, his claim against such goods.

To read the act in the restricted sense now contended for would aid in the perpetration of the very fraud, which at common law was so strongly condemned, for the mortgagee with his secret claim could stand by and permit the original mortgagor to dispose of the chattels in bulk, subject to his mortgage, and thus allow the purchaser to deal with his creditors as the owner of unincumbered property. As the mortgagee with knowledge of the transfer by the mortgagor to a third party, as is the case here, could reduce the goods to its possession, it has, in my opinion, no greater protection for its unrecorded mortgage against the creditors of the purchaser, than it would have had against the creditors of the mortgagor, and having permitted a new owner to retain the possession of the goods, that owner becomes, within the meaning of the statute, a mortgagor.

The complainant's claim is that he is relieved from the consequences of his neglect to take possession, which, under the common law, renders his mortgage prima facie fraudulent, because under the recording act the failure to record, where the possession of the mortgaged property remains unchanged, only avoids the mortgage as to the persons named, and that as to all others it is a valid incumbrance. In other words, a chattel mortgage, unaccompanied by change of possession of the property, is, because of the act, a stronger security than it was before, and no fraud can be imputed for want of record in such cases, so that instead of being prima facie fraudulent, it is good against every one, other than the limited class named in the statute. This reasoning does not convince me as being sound, for I think the words and plain intent of the act are against such construction, and that it makes all such mortgages void as against the creditors of any owner holding the property, subject to such unrecorded mortgage, with the knowledge and consent of the mortgagee. When conditions change and innocent parties may suffer, it becomes the duty of the mortgagee to warn them by taking possession if he desires to obtain priority of lien.

My conclusion is that under the conditions present here this mortgage is void as against the creditors of the purchaser from the mortgagor, and that the recording act does not remove the imputation of fraud which the common law attached to a chattel mortgage of goods unaccompanied by change of possession, and that while it may not be void as to the purchaser because of notice, such notice is not chargeable to his creditors. It therefore follows that if this applicant can support, with evidence, the allegations he proposes to incorporate in his amended answer, this mortgage would be void as to such creditors, and I will allow the motion.

PERLBERG v. SMITH.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Dec. 6, 1905.)

1. TRADE-MARKS AND TRADE-NAMES—FILING IN PATENT OFFICE.

No rights are acquired by the filing of a label in the United States Patent Office, as against any person doing business in the same state, since Congress has no power to legislate with respect to trade-marks so far as concerns commerce within the boundaries of a state.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trade-Marks and Trade-Names, §§ 46, 47.]

2. SAME—UNFAIR COMPETITION.

Where the owner of a shoe store marked all of the shoes he sold "Eagle Shoes," though they were procured from various sources, so that the name did not indicate any particular brand or make of shoes, he is not entitled to protection in the use of the name.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trade-Marks and Trade-Names, §§ 4-7, 78-84.]

3. SAME.

One who procured from a manufacturer shoes marked "Eagle Shoes" could not be enjoined from selling them by one who had previously built up a business in the sale of shoes, and who marked all his shoes "Eagle Shoes," where the name had formerly been used by various manufacturers, and where the person sought to be enjoined did not attempt in any way to deceive the public into the belief that they were buying the shoes offered for sale by the other person.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trade-Marks and Trade-Names, §§ 78-84.]

Suit for injunction by Edward Perlberg against Samuel C. Smith, trading as S. C. Smith & Co. Heard upon bill, answer, replication, and proofs in open court. Bill dismissed.

This is a bill filed by Edward Perlberg against Samuel C. Smith to restrain the latter from selling shoes under the name of "Eagle Shoes." The bill sets out that the complainant is a shoe dealer in Jersey City, with a place of business at No. 2 Newark avenue in said city, and that the defendant is a shoe dealer, with a place of business at No. 90 Newark avenue in said city; that the complainant, some seven years ago, adopted a label to be placed upon shoes sold by him, and upon the 12th of October, 1901, filed in the office of the Department of the Interior, in the Patent Office, a copy of said label and received from said office letters patent therefor; that he had used said trade-mark for a long time prior to obtaining said letters patent, and is still using the same; that the public have placed great confidence in said trade-mark, and that, by reason of the confidence of the public in the said style and make of the shoes sold by him and marked in accordance with the said letters patent, he has built up a lucrative and prosperous business, and that the style, make, comfort, and durability of said shoes have been recognized by the public; that he is the sole pos-essor and owner of said trade-mark, and is the sole and exclusive agent for the sale of the said Eagle Shoes; "and that Samuel Smith represents to the public that he has for sale shoes known as 'Eagle Shoes,' " which shoes complainant charges are inferior to the shoes sold by him. The complainant further charges that Smith is using the same labels as complainant, and that by reason of the acts of the defendant complainant is irreparably damaged, and should be protected by the injunction of this court. The answer of the defendant need not be further referred to than to state that it denies all of the material allegations of the complainant and puts him to proof with respect to his right to relief.

J. Merritt Lane, for complainant. Chas. G. Kelly and C. J. Roe, for defendant.

GARRISON, V. C. (after stating the facts). The proofs, so far as they are pertinent to the decision, show that Edward Perlberg, in the year 1898, opened a shoe store at No. 2 Newark avenue, in Jersey City. He had not been in the shoe business prior to that time. His name did not appear upon any sign, and the sign that he adopted had upon it the words the "Eagle Shoe Store." Upon the windows of his store he had painted the representation of an eagle with outstretched wings, bearing in its claw a shoe. This picture, with the addition of a streamer proceeding from the beak of the eagle upon which were the words "Eagle Shoes," constituted the label adopted by the complainant and subsequently filed by him in the Patent Office. The proofs are indefinite as to whether he ever placed this complete label upon any of the goods sold by him, but, if he did, its use was early discontinued, and no part of his present claim rests upon the use by him of this label. He advertised very extensively in the local newspapers and by handbills, always referring to his store as the "Eagle Shoe Store," and always calling attention to the shoes that he sold under the name of "Eagle Shoes." There is abundant proof that shoe stores in many other places had adopted the name "Eagle Shoe Store" long prior to the time that the same was adopted by the complainant for his store. The proofs are also perfectly clear that the word "Eagle," in connection with shoes, has been at various times and in various places, by manufacturers and local dealers, used to designate shoes sold by them, and that it was so used long prior to the time that Perlberg went into the shoe business. In some instances the words "Eagle Shoes" were placed upon the shoe when made by the manufacturer, and in others they were placed thereon by the local dealer himself. Those that were marked by the manufacturer were sold either directly to the retailer or were sold to jobbers and by them sold to retailers, or were sold at auction to whomsoever would buy. The defendant, Smith, for at least 18 years has been in the shoe business in Jersey City; his store now being at No. 90 Newark avenue in said city. This is near where Perlberg opened his store. Just prior to the filing of the bill in this cause it is proven that Smith placed placards upon the outside of his store announcing a sale of "Eagle Shoes," with the prices stated. The shoes thus advertised were made by Taylor, a manufacturer, who had marked them "Eagle Shoes," and were sold to Smith through a jobber named Young. They had upon the sole a representation of an eagle and the name "Eagle Shoes," together with the price. They also had upon the back strap the name "Eagle Shoes," with the price.

The complainant alleges that Smith's reason for advertising the sale of "Eagle Shoes" was to revenge himself upon Perlberg because of a real or fancied grievance that he had against Perlberg with respect to the agency for the sale of shoes named "Queen Quality Shoes." I believe Smith displayed the placards, announcing the sale of the Eagle Shoes he had, to catch some of the custom attracted by Perlberg's advertising. Smith testifies, and it is not disputed, that for more than 11 years on and off he had sold different shoes from different sources of manufacture which, in one way or another, were designated as "Eagle Shoes"; that is to say, either on the carton in which the shoes were contained, or on the back strap of the shoes, or on the sole thereof, they were marked or designated as "Eagle Shoes." The bill was evidently framed upon the theory that the complainant had a technical trademark or label, and that this right was infringed by the defendant. The trademark or label claimed in the bill by the complainant was that which he filed in the Patent Office and which has been heretofore described. The undisputed proofs show that the complainant, if he ever placed this trademark upon shoes sold by him, long since abandoned the use of the same, and contented himself with placing the words "Eagle Shoes" upon the back strap of each of the shoes sold by him. There was not the slightest attempt on the part of the complainant to prove that he was the "sole and exclusive agent for the sale of said 'Eagle Shoes,'" as he pleaded in his bill that he was, or that, as a fact, there was any proprietary shoe called "Eagle Shoe," sold by him as agent. There is no pretense in the proofs of showing that the defendant in any way simulated the label claimed by the complainant. There is ample proof that other dealers in shoes, prior to the adoption by the complainant of the aforesaid label, had adopted similar labels for shoes, using almost the same design and the same words. The complainant obtained no rights which he may enforce in this suit by virtue of filing his label in the Patent Office. It has been settled by the Supreme Court of the United States that there is no power in the Congress to legislate with respect to trade-marks, so far, at least, as concerns commerce within the boundaries of a state. United States v. Steffens, 100 U. S. 82, 25 L. Ed. 550. The complainant, at the argument, very properly abandoned the issue based upon the claim of any exclusive right, and did not claim that he had a technical trade-mark which had been infringed. He shifted his ground to a charge of unfair competition. There is a very grave question whether the complainant, by abandoning so much, has not abandoned all. Whatever his rights might be as the owner of a technical trade-mark, or as the user of a mark adopted by him which another would not, to his damage, be permitted to simulate, there is a very serious question as to whether he may proceed against another who is not charged with simulating the design or mark of the complainant, but is merely charged with using words which appeared in the complainant's trade-mark, but which were equally open to use by the complainant and the defendant. Corbin v. Gould, 133 U. S. 308, 10 Sup. Ct. 312, 33 L. Ed. 611.

But I do not desire to rest my determination upon this sole point, and I therefore pass to the consideration of the charge of unfair competition. Stripped of extraneous matter, the complainant's contention urged upon the court was that for seven years he had called all the shoes sold in his store "Eagle Shoes," and had marked upon the back straps of each of such shoes the words "Eagle Shoes"; that he had spent large sums of money in advertising the shoes sold by him, referring to such shoes in his advertisements as "Eagle Shoes"; that his place of business was close to that of the defendant; and that the defendant displayed placards announcing the sale of "Eagle Shoes," and that this was unfair competition as against the complainant. Care must be taken in these cases not to extend the meaning of the word "unfair" to cover that which may be unethical, but is not illegal. It may be unethical for one trader to take advantage of the advertising of his neighbor, but his so doing would in many instances be entirely legal. If one dealer advertises extensively and at great expense the sale of a staple article or of any article which he has not the exclusive right to vend, his neighbor may undoubtedly endeavor to cause the customers attracted to the neighborhood by the advertising to purchase the same or a similar article at his store, instead of at the store of the advertiser. What conduct on the part of a defendant will be held to constitute unfair competition is the subject-matter of discussion in cases too numerous for useful citation, but the principle applied in each case is extremely simple. As Lord Chancellor Halsbury said, in the House of Lords, in the case of Reddaway v. Banham [1896] A. C. 199, p. 204 (Eng. Rul. Cas. p. 197); "For myself I believe the principle of law may be very plainly stated; and that is that nobody has any right to represent his goods as the goods of somebody else." If the complainant has a technical trade-mark, the deciding of the case is greatly simplified, because the use by another of this trade-mark will of itself be sufficient for the determination that the one simulating it is defrauding the complainant. If, however, the complainant has not a technical trade-mark, the difficulty in determining his right to relief is not with respect to the principle of law to be applied, but to the question of fact involved. While courts often say that the first user of a word, phrase, or design such as is the proper subject of a trade-mark has a property right thereto, I incline to the view that this is an inaccurate use of terms. As is pointed out by Lord Herschel in the case just cited ([1896] A. C. 209; Eng. Rul. Cas. 202), although some of the rights of property attach to such a use, the same principles are applied and the same rights enforced where the user has no exclusive right and no property right in the mark or name. The whole doctrine rests upon the prevention of fraud. The advantage of not misusing the word "property" in connection with the right of the user of a trade-mark or trade-name is that the proper conception of the basis of the right, administered in favor of the complainant, reconciles the decisions respecting the subject-matter. The principle is universal in these cases that one may not palm off his goods as the goods of another, and this irrespective of whether that other has a technical trade-mark, is using his own name, or is using words to which he has no exclusive right whatever, providing he is using the name or mark to denote the origin or ownership of the named or marked goods. There is, of course, a distinction to be observed with respect to wholesalers and retailers.

The exact point of inquiry in the case in hand is whether the complainant so used the words "Eagle Shoes" that he is entitled to protection, and whether the defendant, Smith, will be prevented by injunction from selling from his store shoes named "Eagle Shoes." The proofs are full and clear that the complainant marked all of the shoes that he sold "Eagle Shoes." He obtained these shoes from manufacturers, from jobbers, and at auction sales. His shoes, therefore, were the product of many different manufactories. The stamp "Eagle Shoes" upon the shoes sold by Perlberg meant nothing, saving the fact that they had been previously purchased by Perlberg, and were marked, at the time of their sale by him, "Eagle Shoes." It did not in any way indicate the origin or source of production, or even, as the proofs show, any element of selection on the part of Perlberg.

It did not denote kind, brand, or make. Perlberg's own testimony shows that he purchased shoes at auction at cheap prices and resold them as "Eagle Shoes," and that they were sold cheap at auction because they had been unsalable in the regular course of trade. A fundamental principle is that the kind of trade-mark or trade-name that will be protected is only such as implies origin or ownership. Lawrence Mfg. Co. v. Tennessee Mfg. Co., 138 U. S. 537, 11 Sup. Ct. 396, 34 L. Ed. 997, with note; Columbia Mill Co. v. Alcorn, 150 U. S. 460, 14 Sup. Ct. 151, 37 L. Ed. 1144. I do not mean to imply that a trade-mark will only be protected if placed upon an article manufactured by the user of the mark, because this is not the law. One who causes goods to be manufactured for him, or who selects goods manufactured by others, and places his trade-mark thereon, is entitled to protection with respect thereto; but I firmly hold the conviction that in each instance where the user is protected he must show that there is a particular thing upon which he has placed the mark, so that the appearance of the mark connotes that thing. If this is not so, then the whole basis of the law of trade-marks is without solid foundation upon which to rest. If the appearance of the mark upon the thing is not a guaranty that it is the thing, marked to differentiate it and distinguish it from other similar things sold by other dealers, then the trade-mark is deceptive and worthless. If, without regard to the source of manufacture or to any distinction of kind, brand, or make, this trade-mark of a retailer is placed indiscriminately upon every article of any given species, it can serve no other purpose than to show that the article is sold by that person; and, if a man is to be protected at all in this respect, he must lay a basis for such protection by adopting an arbitrary, fanciful designation of which he is the first user, and so obtain a technical trade-mark.

I do not decide, because it is not necessary, whether there could be such a thing as a technical trade-mark which did not denote kind, brand, or make, but merely did denote the fact that it was sold by a certain retailer. If Perlberg, by adopting the words "Eagle Shoes" to denote the shoes sold by him, sought to convey the impression to the public that he was retailing a particular kind, brand, or make of shoes under the name of "Eagle Shoe," then he was conveying a false impression, and, upon familiar principles, will not be protected with respect thereto. This undoubtedly was his intention, and in his bill in this suit he pleads that "he was the sole and exclusive agent for the sale of the said Eagle Shoes." If such was not his intention, then I am at a loss to conceive of any principle upon which he may prevent another from making use of the term "Eagle Shoes." He has, as has been before pointed out, no exclusive right to the words "Eagle Shoes." He cannot successfully put forward any claim to prevent any one else from using those words. The utmost right which he may claim would be to prevent another from using those words in such a way as to palm off the goods of that other as the goods of Perlberg. This he may do if he shows the court that he has used these words in connection with goods in such a way as to identify the name and the goods; that is, that he used the name to denote a particular kind, brand, or make of shoes. This he has not done, because the proofs demonstrate that he applied the name indifferently and indiscriminately to all kinds of shoes, from every source, irrespective of their origin, kind, brand, or make, and that the term was meaningless, save to the extent that it meant the shoes sold in his store. Of course, if it were charged that the defendant so befogged the public by simulating the signs of the complainant's store, or changing the appearance of the exterior of his store to make it resemble the complainant's store, that people did not know into which store they were going, there would be some ground for action. In the case of Van Horn v. Coogan, 52 N. J. Eq. 380, 28 Atl. 788 (Van Fleet v. O.; 1894), affirmed 52 N. J. Eq. 588, 83 Atl. 50, there will be found an instance of this kind. There the defendant placed out in front of his store a number which was not the number of his store but was the number of the complainant's store. The case just referred to contains, as nearly as does any other cited by the complainant, the most favorable application of the principles of law which the complainant invokes. In that case a dealer in stoves in Newark purchased from a manufacturer a particular kind of stove and caused it to be named "Portland." He was the only dealer in Newark to whom the manufacturer thereof would sell this kind of stove. The defendant placed the number of the complainant's store outside the door of his store, and changed the name of a stove that he had been selling theretofore under another name to the name of "Portland," and sought to sell that stove to the public under that name. He was restrained upon the ground that the proofs were adequate that he was endeavoring to palm off his article as the article of the complainant. If we apply the principle of that case to the case in hand, it will at once be seen how variant is the result. The defendant in the case at bar did not in any way endeavor to deceive the public with respect to the stores of himself and the complainant. He did not change the name upon any of the shoes in his store. The shoes which Smith was selling as "Eagle Shoes" were so marked by the manufacturer, without any procurement by Smith, and were sold by the manufacturer or his agent to any one in the open market. They had upon the sole a picture of an eagle and the words "Eagle Shoes," with the price, and they also had upon the back strap the words "Eagle Shoes," with the price. Any dealer in Jersey City or elsewhere throughout the entire world could have purchased these shoes from the jobber, or, I presume, directly from the manufacturer.

No one, certainly, in buying these shoes from Smith, could have been deceived into the belief that he was buying them from Perlberg. Could the purchaser be deceived into the belief that he was buying from Smith the same thing which Perlberg was selling under the same name? The answer to this is "No," because Perlberg was not selling any particular kind, brand, or make of shoes under that name. He was selling every kind, brand, or make under that name. So that we come back to the principle previously stated, that unless the name adopted is used to indicate origin or source of manufacture, or in some way to designate that the particular thing upon it is placed is of a certain kind, brand, or make, the one using it is in no position to restrain others from using the same name upon similar articles. I do not think it necessary to indulge in numerous citations for so familiar a principle. If a complainant is shown to be deceiving the public, he cannot receive protection. Manhattan Med. Co. v. Wood, 108 U. S. 218, 2 Sup. Ct. 436, 27 L. Ed. 706; Stirling Silk Mfg. Co. v. Sterling Silk Co., 59 N. J. Eq. 394, 46 Atl. 199 (Emery, V. C.; 1900); Koehler v. Sanders, 122 N. Y. 65, 25 N. E. 235, 9 L. R. A. 576; Leather Cloth Co. v. Am. Leather Cloth Co., 11 H. L. C. 523, 11 Eng. Rep. 1435; Prince Mfg. Co. v. Prince's Metallic Paint Co., 135 N. Y. 25, 31 N. E. 990, 27 Lawy. Ed. 942, and note, in which many cases are cited; same case, 17 L. R. A. 129, and note. The basis of the complainant's claim in this case must be that he had so used the term in controversy as to build up a trade in the thing to which the name was applied. Since he utterly fails to show that there was any particular thing to which this name was applied, he is without redress.

I will advise a decree dismissing the bill, with costs.

PERLBERG v. ROSENSTONE.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Dec. 6, 1905.)

TRADE-MARKS AND TRADE-NAMES — UNFAIR COMPETITION—INJUNCTION.

The complainant, an owner of a shoe store, using the name "Eagle Shoes" on all shoes sold by him, could acquire no right in the name which would entitle him to enjoin its use by another person in the same city, who before complainant began business in the city had conducted the "Eagle Shoe Store," and who afterwards, by a statement on his sign and by his advertisements, published the fact that his store was not connected with any other.

Suit for injunction by Edward Perlberg against Abraham Rosenstone. Heard on bill, answer, replications, and proofs in open court. Bill dismissed.

J. Merritt Lane, for complainant. Weller & Lichtenstein, for defendant.

GARRISON, V. C. By agreement between counsel this case was heard with the case of the same complainant against Samuel Q. Smith. The opinion in the case of Perlberg v. Smith, 62 Atl. 442, contains all that is needed to be said, saving the particular facts applicable to the case against this defendant. They are as follows: Rosenstone is shown to have commenced business, with his brother, in 1893, at Passaic, N. J., in a store which they called the "Eagle Shoe Store." He had the words "Eagle Shoes" impressed by a rubber stamp upon the back strap of each pair of shoes sold in his store, and had an iron stamp made with the words "Eagle Shoes" or "Eagle Shoe Store" upon it, and impressed this stamp upon the shank of each pair of shoes sold by him. After a year his brother sold out to him, and he continued in business in Passaic until 1900, when he came to Hoboken, N. J., and opened a store there which he called the "Eagle Shoe Store," but after he came to Hoboken he discontinued marking the shoes themselves in any way. About a year and a half ago Perlberg opened a branch store under the name of the "Eagle Shoe Store" in Hoboken, at a distance of some 10½ blocks from that of Rosenstone. Rosenstone's store was in the section of the city where the poorer class of customers lived, and Perlberg's was on the principal business street, where presumably the customers having more money would naturally shop. It is not shown that Perlberg knew of Rosenstone at that time, or that Rosenstone knew of Perlberg, or of each other's stores or use of the name "Eagle." Among the stock carried by Rosenstone were some of these shoes made by Young, which, as has been stated in the Smith Case, were marked on the strap "Eagle $3.00 Shoes," and upon the sole with the representation of an eagle and under it "$3.00 Eagle Shoes." Almost immediately after Perlberg opened his "Eagle Shoe Store" in Hoboken, and Rosenstone learned of it, he added to the banner, which was stretched in front of his store, upon which theretofore had appeared the words "Eagle Shoe Store," an additional strip, upon which he had painted the words: "This store has no connection with any other store in New Jersey." The sign of "Eagle Shoe Store" he did not change, but on the awnings he inserted the word "Original" before the word "Eagle," and when he moved across the street in the year 1903, and opened a new store, the large wooden sign covering the width of the building read the "Original Eagle Shoe Store." There was put in evidence a great amount of printed matter advertising Rosenstone's business, in every of which, after Perlberg came to Hoboken, there was language to convey clearly the idea that this store of Rosenstone's had no connection with any other store, and had no branch. The case against Rosenstone rests entirely on the sale by him to one customer, who was sent there by Periberg, of a pair of the "Eagle Shoes" jobbed by Young which have been heretofore described.

The complainant's contention is practically as it is in the Smith Case, that having appropriated the word "Eagle" in connection with the shoes sold by him, and made the same favorably known, he has a right to restrain Rosenstone from selling in the same city any shoes, wherever obtained, upon which the word "Eagle" appeared as a denomination of the shoes. Rosenstone's defenses are that he used the word "Eagle" in connection with shoes long before Periberg did; had always called his store the "Eagle Shoe Store"; that since coming to Hoboken he had had occasionally shoes denominated in some way as "Eagle Shoes" which he purchased at auction sales, and which came to him thus denominated; that he never made any point of advertising them; that he never competed with Periberg; and that there is no evidence of unfair competition in his case.

For the reasons heretofore given in the Smith Case, I will advise that the bill in this case be dismissed, with costs. I only think it is necessary to add, even if I am mistaken in my reasons for refusing relief to the complainant in the Smith Case, I should feel constrained to refuse it in this case. It seems so entirely clear that no charge of unfair competition was made out against this defendant that it would be but a waste of time to elaborate that conclusion.

BOARD OF HOME MISSIONS OF THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA et al. v. DAVIS et al.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Dec. 14, 1905.)

1. ASSISTANCE, WRIT OF—OPPOSING AFFIDAVITS—ADMISSIONS.

Where the occupant of premises after foreclosure makes an affidavit in opposition to a petition for a writ of assistance, setting forth the facts upon which her resistance to the writ is founded, and petitioner does not object to the affidavit in form, but consents to treat it as an answer, and admits that he cannot successfully deny the facts therein stated, the facts stated in such affidavit must be regarded by the court as true.

2. SAME—WHEN ISSUED—DOUBTFUL CASES.

The issuance of a writ of assistance rests in the sound discretion of the court, and such writ will never be awarded in a case of doubt; nor will a question of legal title be tried or decided in proceedings having in view the issuance of the writ.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 4, Cent. Dig. Assistance, Writ of, § 1.]

3. SAME.

Where defendant in foreclosure purchases a paramount title after the filing of the bill for foreclosure and the decree of sale, and the title which he acquires proceeds from a source entirely distinct from that through which the purchaser under the foreclosure decree claims, and is one with which defendant was not vested when called upon to answer in the foreclosure suit, defendant stands in the same position as a stranger who purchases an outstanding title and enters into possession, and will not be ousted from possession under his paramount title by a writ of assistance.

Foreclosure suit by the Board of Home Missions of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America and others against M. Eva Davis and others. On petition for writ of assistance. Dismissed.

George M. Shipman, for petitioner. Martin Wyckoff, for defendant M. Eva Davis.

BERGEN, V. O. William Davis mortgaged certain lands in Warren county, in this state, to the complainants, who instituted proceedings against the heirs at law of Davis, he having died intestate, to foreclose the equity of redemption. This defendant, M. Eva Davis, who was one of the heirs at law of William Davis, set up as a defense in the foreclosure proceedings that her father, William Davis, had no title to the premises when he gave the mortgage; but this defense was overruled and a decree was made directing the sale of the land to raise the mortgage debt, following the rule laid down in Mutual Building & Loan Association v. Batterson, 55 N. J. Eq. 610-612, 56 Atl. 703. The sale was made by the sheriff of Warren county, duly reported and confirmed, and a deed executed by the sheriff in due form was delivered to the petitioner, who now presents his petition for an order for possession. The usual formalities upon which such an application may be based have been observed, and the only opposition to the making of the order rests upon the allegation that the occupant is now in possession under a title superior to that vested in the mortgagor and now held by the petitioner by virtue of the foreclosure sale. The answer to the petition is in the form of an affidavit made by the occupant, which sets forth the facts upon which resistance is founded, and, while open to the objection that it is not in form an answer, this was not urged against it on the argument, and the petitioner consented to treat it as an answer, and also admitted, upon being offered an opportunity to submit answering testimony, that he could not successfully deny the facts stated. In this situation I must take the facts disclosed by the papers to be true. The petition is in usual form, setting forth the issuing of the execution, a description of the lands, the possession of the defendant, who was a party to the foreclosure proceedings, the exhibition of the sheriff's deed to her, with a demand for possession, and her refusal. The affidavit presented by the defendant by way of answer shows that one Mary Weller, a lunatic, died intestate, in 1879, seised of the lands; that she had never married, and left as her only heirs at law collateral relatives, some of whom entered into possession of the lands; that since the decree foreclosing the equity of redemption under the mortgage given by William Davis was entered in this cause the defendant purchased, by good and sufficient conveyances, the title which some of these collateral heirs had in the premises, and charges that she now holds possession under such conveyances, so far as they have passed the title and as a tenant in common with such of the heirs as have not conveyed to her.

Under the proofs now before me, I must assume that the title of the defendant is paramount to that acquired by the petitioner in the foreclosure proceedings, for the answer alleges that Mary Weller died seised and intestate, and charges that the title of William Davis under which the petitioner claims is based upon a pretended devise from Mary Weller, which could have no lawful existence, because she died intestate, and as these claims are not disputed, it would appear that William Davis had no title to the lands which he mortgaged, unless he has acquired a title in some other manner which has not been disclosed in these proceedings. The only question I am called upon to consider is whether an order for possession, such as usually follows the result of a foreclosure sale, ought to be allowed against a defendant in foreclosure proceedings, who seeks to hold possession under a title confessedly superior to that of the purchaser at the foreclosure sale, when such paramount title was acquired after the decree was entered foreclosing the equity of redemption and directing a sale. The writ applied for is intended to aid in the execution of a final decree, in order that a purchaser may have the benefit of his purchase; but it will never be awarded in a case of doubt, nor will a question of legal title be tried or decided in proceedings looking to the exercise of the power of the court to put a purchaser in possession. Schenck v. Conover, 13 N. J. Eq. 227, 78 Am. Dec. 95; Thomas v. De Baum, 4 N. J. Eq. 41; Barton v. Beatty, 28 N. J. Eq. 412.

According to the settled rules of law relating to this subject, it would not be seriously asserted that if a stranger, not a party to the foreclosure proceedings, had purchased this outstanding title and entered into possession, this court would undertake, in the summary manner proposed, to settle the legal rights of the parties. But it is insisted by the petitioner that, because this defendant was a party to the foreclosure proceedings, she is now estopped from asserting a title against the purchaser which she derived from an independent source having no relation to the mortgagor's title, and acquired after the making of the decree in which the rights and estates of the parties claiming under William Davis, the mortgagor, had been passed upon. In support of this contention the petitioner's counsel relies upon Chadwick v. Island Beach Co., 43 N. J. Eq. 616, 12 Atl. 380, but clearly that case does not afford the petitioner any effective support. In the Chadwick Case it appeared that the defendant had acquired the independent title it relied upon before the filing of the foreclosure bill, and in passing upon this question Chief Justice Beasley said: "When a complainant alleges that he holds a mortgage in fee upon certain lands, and prays that a sale shall be made of such property, such a claim seems, proprio vigore, to include inferentially an assertion that a title paramount to such mortgage does not reside in any of the parties in the suit. By such an assertion the defendants are called upon to admit or deny the existence of such lien upon the property, and, plainly, if such lien exists, none of them can have a title superior to the right asserted in the bill." In that case it also appeared that the defendant company took its conveyance subject to the conditions contained in the mortgage, and it was held that it was not entitled to retain the possession against the rights of the mortgagee which it had covenanted to respect.

The conclusion I have reached is that the defendant, by purchasing a paramount title after the filing of the bill of the foreclosure and the making of the decree for the sale of whatever equity she might have in the property, stands in the same position as a stranger, when the title which she has acquired proceeds from a source entirely distinct from that through which the purchaser under the foreclosure claims and with which she was not vested when called upon to answer, and that the decree could not affect any rights which she did not possess when it was made. The exercise of the power to make this order rests in the sound discretion of the court, and is "only used when the right is clear and when there is no equity or appearance of equity in the defendant." Van Meter v. Borden, 25 N. J. Eq. 414. A very serious question may arise upon full proofs as to where the legal title to this property rests, and should not be disposed of in this summary way. The petitioner should be required to establish his title in a proceeding directed to that end.

The petition will be dismissed, and the order refused, with costs.

DAAB v. NEW YORK CENT. & H. R. R. CO.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Dec. 22, 1905.)

1. EQUITY — JURISDICTION — GROUNDS — ACCOUNTING — DISCOVERY.

The jurisdiction of equity to decree an accounting cannot be sustained merely because the bill prays for a discovery.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 19, Cent. Dig. Equity, § 114.]

2. SAME—COMPLAINT.

The jurisdiction of equity to decree an accounting cannot be sustained on the ground that the complainant has a right to invoke the aid of equity for discovery, where the complainant, as authorized by Laws 1867, p. 166, and Laws 1902, p. 517, § 19, waives an answer under oath, and submits no interrogatory to be answered under oath, and elects to have the answer stand as a mere pleading.

3. SAME—INADEQUACY OF LEGAL REMEDY.

A bill in equity for an accounting, where complainant claims equitable jurisdiction because of the intricacy and complexity of the account, must do more than show a case which might in a court of law prove intricate and complex, and must show that the remedy at law is in fact inadequate.

4. SAME—FRAUD.

A bill for an accounting did not show equitable jurisdiction on the ground of fraud by allegations that defendant, in making settlements with complainant under a contract between them, endeavored to deceive complainant as to the amount of his earnings, where it appears from the bill that complainant was not deceived by such representations, but that he knew of their incorrectness and protested against the same during the course of the settlement.

Suit by Philip Daab against the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Company for an accounting. Demurrer to the bill sustained.

Leon Abbett, for complainant. James B. Vredenburg, for defendant.

STEVENSON, V. C. The demurrer will be sustained.

1. The primary rights which the complainant seeks to enforce in this suit are all strictly legal rights arising from contractual obligations of the defendant, express or implied. The courts of law of the state have full jurisdiction of every item of the complainant's claim, and also have full jurisdiction of these items, when taken together in a mass, as constituting a single case for adjudication. A court of equity, on the other hand, has no jurisdiction whatever of any item of the complainant's claim when taken by itself alone, but, at most, can only acquire concurrent jurisdiction with the courts of law of the aggregated mass of items which make up the complainant's claim, in case it shall appear that this entire claim is so intricate and complex that the legal machinery of courts of law is not competent to deal with it, so that the remedy at law has become inadequate.

2. While the bill may be open to criticism, I think on a general demurrer it must be taken as presenting a case, the trial of which may involve the proof of a very large number of items of various classes. The greater part of the claim is based upon a written contract between the parties, under which the complainant transferred freight of all kinds between the boats and barges of the complainant and its wharves and docks and other landing places. The contract specified as the complainant's compensation 25 cents per ton for hides and 10 cents per ton for other freight. The amount of freight thus handled was between 13,500 to 14,500 tons per week during five years. The term of the contract, five years, expired May 1, 1905, and the bill was filed on June 22, 1905. The entire claim of the complainant consists of the following elements: (1) A claim for money due under the contract for stevedore work done thereunder. (2) A claim for extra work amounting to $3,601.09, of which both parties kept an account; the bill alleging "that the accounts of said extra work are complicated and intricate, being accounts of laborers' time in handling freight, sorting freight, and for other extra work on freight of said defendant." (3) A claim for damages by reason of the action of the defendant in giving work which the complainant was entitled to do under his contract to other parties. The contract excepted from its operation the transfer of freight "at the freight stations of the company." The bill alleges that the defendant established "new and additional freight stations for itself, and would not allow or permit" the complainant "to perform the stevedore work at said new stations," and thereby unlawfully deprived the complainant of large gains. A question of the construction of the contract, if there be any question, is here raised. The bill also sets forth that the defendant made deductions from the moneys due the complainant on account of damages which the defendant alleged it had suffered from negligent handling of goods by the complainant.

3. Inasmuch as the primary rights of the complainant for the enforcement of which this suit is brought are strictly legal, the mere fact that the bill prays for a discovery presents no ground for extending the jurisdiction of this court to compel the defendant to account. 1 Pom. Eq. §§ 223, 230; Brown v. Edsall, 9 N. J. Eq. 256 (1852); Little v. Cooper, 10 N. J. Eq. 275 (1854); United, etc., R. Co. v. Hoppock, 28 N. J. Eq. 261, 264 (1877); Foley v. Hill, 2 H. L. Cas. 28, 37 (1848). The allegations in the bill to the effect that the complainant kept no account, except for his extra work, and that the defendant has books and papers from which complete accounts may be obtained, but which it refuses to exhibit to the complainant, do not help out the jurisdiction in this case. The bill does not allege that the defendant was under any obligation to keep accounts for the complainant's information, or that the complainant was not able to keep accounts for himself. The courts of law of New Jersey have ample power to give the complainant access to the defendant's books if those books are instruments of evidence in his case, and the complainant may file a bill in this court for discovery alone in aid of his action at law.

4. The bill prays for an answer without oath. If the jurisdiction of this court in a case like this could be extended because the complainant has a right to discovery, which I do not admit, such result would follow, it seems to me, only in case discovery in the ancient sense of the term were sought. Discovery means the production of evidence. Where the answer is without oath, the defendant's statements are not evidence in the cause against the complainant. They may be admissions, and as such evidence against the particular answering defendant who makes them. An answer in chancery originally had a dual capacity. It was a mere pleading to aid in defining the issues to be tried, and also a means of obtaining evidence not otherwise procurable. Our statute (Laws 1867, p. 166; Chancery Act 1902, § 19 [Laws 1902, p. 517]) permitting the complainant to call for an answer without oath gives the complainant the option to obtain from his adversary a pleading which has no force as evidence, except so far as the defendant may see fit to make admissions. This statute, however, expressly provides that the complainant while calling for an answer without oath may annex interrogatories to his bill, to be answered under oath with the same effect as evidence "as the responsive allegations in answers required to be sworn to." The statute plainly permits the defendant to procure an answer which is a mere pleading, and also to force the defendant to make discovery under oath in regard to any parts of the case concerning which he sees fit to call for such discovery. Notwithstanding this special provision for interrogatories to be answered under oath, the practice is established of permitting the complainant to submit interrogatories in his bill to be answered without oath, and this procedure is considered a mode of obtaining discovery. Manley v. Mickle, 55 N. J. Eq. 563, 37 Atl. 738 (1897). The last-mentioned decision of the Court of Errors and Appeals, however, in my opinion lays down merely a rule of pleading. The complainant, according to the doctrine of the case, has a right to present to the defendant the opportunity of making admissions, not only in regard to the allegations of the bill, but also in regard to matters of evidence which will be dealt with on the trial, which admissions, if made, may be useful to the complainant. If the defendant answers falsely, so as to deprive the complainant of an advantageous admission, the only penalty which he incurs would seem to be a possible discrediting of his defense or an imposition of costs. When discovery fails, then jurisdiction also fails, as is conceded by those authorities which hold that jurisdiction for discovery founds jurisdiction for relief. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 455. Under no theory, in my opinion, can the jurisdiction of this court to decree an accounting be sustained on the ground that the complainant has a right to invoke the aid of the court for discovery, when the complainant waives an answer under oath and submits no interrogatory to be answered under oath, but abandons altogether the use of the answer as a means of putting the defendant under oath in the cause in advance of the trial, and thereby elects to have the answer stand as a mere pleading.

5. In determining whether the machinery of the courts of law is adequate to accomplish justice in a case like this, we must take into consideration that legal machinery as it exists to-day. We must look at the legal machinery which the law courts must set in operation for the purposes of this case, and not the legal machinery which the courts of law would have set in operation if a case like this had been presented to them a hundred years ago. Bellingham v. Palmer, 54 N. J. Eq. 136, 33 Atl. 199 (1895).

6. In the class of cases to which the present one belongs, it is said that the determination of the question whether a court of equity should intervene and investigate and enforce primary legal rights which have no color of equity is very largely addressed to the discretion of the court, a discretion which must be exercised largely according to the peculiar circumstances of each particular case. Bellingham v. Palmer, 54 N. J. Eq. 138, 139, 33 Atl. 199. In the case of Cranford v. Watters, 61 N. J. Eq. 284, 48 Atl. 316 (1901), Vice Chancellor Pitney, after examining a large number of cases, formulates the following rule or principle to guide the court in determining whether or not to take jurisdiction of cases of the class to which the present one belongs: "The test is, are the issues so numerous and so distinct, and the evidence to sustain them so variant, technical, and voluminous, that a jury is incompetent to intelligently deal with them and come to a final conclusion."

7. In the case last cited the point is brought out distinctly that this court may properly take jurisdiction of a case presenting a complex account, where the primary rights of the parties are strictly legal, after the inability of the machinery of the courts of law to meet the requirements of the case has been demonstrated by actual experiment, when, without such experiment, this court would refuse to act. It seems to me that this oftentimes is a safe and controlling principle. It is often dangerous in these days, when the remedial powers of courts of law are being expanded, not only by legislation, but by natural development, for a court of equity to say in advance that a court of law is incompetent to do justice in any particular case of which it has jurisdiction. It is a good general rule, I think, that courts of equity in many kinds of cases should hold off until the actual test has been applied and the inability of the court of law to do justice has been demonstrated, unless such delay will cause irremediable damage. See Kronson v. Lipschitz (N. J. Ch.) 60 Atl. 819, 821.

8. In the case presented by this bill, while the trial apparently may involve a vast number of items, the propositions of fact to be established after all are few and simple. The questions seem to be: (1) What was the total amount of freight transferred of each of the two classes specified in the contract? (2) What was the total amount of money paid by the defendant to the complainant for this work? (3) What was the amount and value of the extra work of which the bill alleges both parties kept an account? (4) If the complainant was entitled to transfer the freight which the bill alleges he was prevented from transferring by the action of the defendant, what was the amount of such freight, and what was the profit which the complainant would have earned if he had been permitted to do this work? The alleged right of the complainant to do the stevedore work at the freight stations established by the defendant after the date of the contract, and the alleged wrongful deductions which the defendant made on account of goods alleged to have been damaged by the complainant, are matters included within the above specifications. The complainant insists that he cannot have these matters investigated satisfactorily in an action at law. The defendant denies that such is the case, and claims the right to have the experiment actually tried. This is plainly a case where, if both parties accepted this court as the tribunal for the trial of this cause, the jurisdiction of the court would be beyond dispute.

9. In determining this disputed question between these parties, I think the conduct of the complainant in permitting what he now claims to be a complex case to be piled up from year to year is a matter to be carefully considered. The contract provides that the defendant should pay the complainant "on Saturday of each and every week such moneys as may be due * * * for the work performed under this contract during the previous week." The inference from the bill is that these payments, accompanied by written statements of account, were made weekly for five years. The complainant accepted these payments but alleges that the defendant "did not during the continuance of said contract pay * * * on Saturday of each and every week such moneys as he had earned during the previous week." How many of these weekly payments the complainant claims were short of the true amount is not alleged, but, assuming that all the allegations of the bill upon this subject taken together sufficiently show that large numbers of these payments were not up to the amount due, it still remains that the complainant received them and satisfied himself with "frequently" protesting. It appears, I think, from the bill quite distinctly that the complainant submitted to the numerous violations of the contract of which he now complains, contenting himself in some instances with protesting to an extent very vaguely described, and in some instances without protesting at all. The contract provides that the defendant "retains the right at any time to perform at the expense of the contractor any of the work herein specified, when, in the opinion of the manager of marine department of the company, the contractor is not proceeding with sufficient rapidity with the work," and "also that the contract may be terminated by the company at any time when the performance of any of the work hereinbefore specified is not satisfactory." These provisions perhaps suggest a reason why the complainant was willing to receive the benefits of the contract during the five years while he held in reserve and allowed to accumulate a mass of more or less minute legal claims which he now seeks to enforce in a single suit in a court of equity. It seems to me that a complainant who has allowed so many claims under this five-year contract to accumulate and to grow stale is at a decided disadvantage when he now asserts that the aggregate mass of his claims is too complex to be handled conveniently and justly by a court of law, in which each particular claim originally belonged. Each claim when it arose would have constituted the basis of a very simple action at law, but by allowing the claims to accumulate the complainant, it seems, has added to the whole the element of complexity, and has thereby founded the jurisdiction of a court of equity to compel the defendant to account. It would seem that the complainant, according to his theory of his case, by his own laches, by permitting a large number of strictly legal causes of action created during a period of five years to remain unprosecuted, has succeeded in founding an equity on his own behalf, viz., the right to compel his adversary to render an account in the Court of Chancery.

10. I do not admit that this court can take jurisdiction of an action for unliquidated damages for the breach of a contract, of which, if simple in character, the courts of law would have exclusive jurisdiction, on the ground that the items of damages are numerous and complex, or for any other reason impossible of accurate ascertainment by a court of law. See Courter v. Crescent Sewing Machine Co., 60 N. J. Eq. 413, 45 Atl. 609 (1899).

11. The defendant argues that the bill shows that there was a weekly account stated between the parties which bars any suit for an accounting in this court. Brown v. Van Dyke, 8 N. J. Eq. 795, 801, 55 Am. Dec. 250 (1853); 1 Story, Eq. § 526. I shall not set forth the allegations of the bill on this subject. I think the fair meaning of the bill is that the complainant "frequently"—i. e., from time to time—protested against the weekly statements rendered to him by the defendant as they came in. How many statements he objected to and how many he accepted and acquiesced in we are not informed. Two hundred and sixty statements must have been rendered in the five years. Perhaps only a dozen or two dozen were objected to. A large part of the complainant's complex and intricate claim may, for all that appears in the bill, be reduced to a state of extreme simplicity by the application of the doctrine of "account stated." It is evident that all evidence as to a very substantial part of the complainant's case, embracing very many details, may be excluded by a ruling of the trial court as to the construction of the contract. Taking every well-pleaded allegation of the bill to be true, I think the case exhibited is one which a court of law, with its modern methods of procedure, including orders for the production of books, examination of parties before trial, and the statement and settlement of accounts by references, may dispose of in as complete accord with all the principles of justice as would be possible in a court of equity. It seems to me in this peculiar class of cases, where the complainant is endeavoring to have an action at law tried in a court of equity, because of its alleged intricacy and complexity in respect of matters of fact, the bill must do more than show a case which might on trial in a court of law prove intricate and complex, so as to make the legal procedure applied to its determination inadequate. Where the defendant denies the right of the complainant to try his legal action or actions in the Court of Chancery, the complainant must show, at least presumptively, that the alleged intricacies and complexities will appear so as to embarrass, if not defeat, the useful operation of the machinery of the court of law in which the legal action might be brought. In such a case, in brief, I think the complainant must show that his remedy at law in fact is inadequate, and not merely that such remedy may in the end turn out to be inadequate. Of course, we are now concerned only about the correct rule to be applied to cases like this, where the sole foundation of the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery is the inability of the courts of law to provide an adequate remedy. An entirely different rule may be applicable to cases where there is a fiduciary relation, or an element of fraud, or mistake, so as to give a court of equity jurisdiction, apart altogether from the mere inadequacy of the remedy at law.

12. If this bill should be adjudged to present a case of equitable cognizance, I think that large numbers of actions of law on contracts of various kinds, which our law courts are constantly disposing of with complete recognition and enforcement of all the rights of the parties, could be transferred at the election of either party to the Court of Chancery. The prospect of such a transfer of jurisdiction is somewhat appalling.

13. The bill contains one charge of fraud which calls for some special consideration. This charge is set forth as follows: "That said defendant company did not during the continuance of said contract pay to your orator on Saturday of each and every week such moneys as he had earned during the previous week, but your orator charges and insists that the said defendant company, with the intent to and for the purpose of cheating and defrauding your orator, rendered to your orator incorrect and fraudulent statements of the amount of freight transferred and hauled by him, and paid your orator in accordance with said incorrect and fraudulent statements, and neglected and refused to pay him for freight actually transferred and handled by him under said contract. That your orator frequently protested to said defendant company in regard to said inaccurate and fraudulent statements of freight transferred and handled by him, but was informed by said defendant company that the said payments to him were made in accordance with the weight of said freight as the same appeared upon the waybills or receipts for said freight; but your orator charges and insists that said waybills or freight receipts did not correctly show the amount (or weight) of the said freight therein mentioned; that in many instances the weight or amount of freight as set forth in said waybills or freight receipts is not more than from 60 to 80 per cent. of the actual weight of said freight." There are several reasons I think why the foregoing allegations, which in a general way charge a fraudulent intent against the defendant, cannot in this case be deemed to give the court jurisdiction of the case presented by the bill. There is no charge that the defendant actually committed any fraud or even in any way deceived the complainant. On the contrary, it appears from the bill that the complainant was not deceived, but "protested to the said defendant company in regard to the said incorrect and fraudulent statements," and that upon such protest the defendant sought to justify itself by alleging that the payments were made in accordance with the weight of the freight as it appeared upon the waybills. The complainant thereupon "charges and insists" that the waybills were incorrect, and that in many instances the true weight was far greater than that set forth in the waybills. The bill, however, does not allege that the complainant notified the defendant of what he now charges and insists as above set forth. Nor does the bill allege that the defendant was guilty of any fraud in respect of the waybills, or was in any way notified that they were incorrect, or that statements taken from them would be liable to mislead or deceive the complainant.

Notwithstanding the distinct charge that the defendant rendered incorrect statements with intent to cheat and defraud the complainant, there are strong grounds for construing all the allegations above set forth embodying this so-called charge of fraud as in fact setting forth a transaction in which no fraud appears. It is not a sufficient charge of fraud in a bill to allege that the defendant has done something with intent to cheat and defraud, when the thing charged appears on its face entirely innocent and free from fraud. It is necessary that facts should be alleged from which fraud may be inferred. If the defendants took the weights which they set forth in their weekly statements from the waybills, knowing that the waybills were false, or knowing that the complainant might thereby be deceived, the bill should have so alleged. On the contrary, as I have pointed out, it appears distinctly from the bill that the complainant was not deceived. But, if on demurrer, the bill must be deemed to contain a charge of fraud, such charge relates only to conduct of the defendant affecting the evidence of a part of the complainant's claim. The bill is not filed to recover damages on account of this alleged fraud, but to recover the amount of money earned under the contract. At most, the alleged fraud or attempted fraud was a deception practiced or attempted to be practiced by the defendant, with intent to conceal a portion of the amount which the complainant had earned. I do not think that such a mere effort, an unsuccessful effort to deceive the complainant as to the amount of his earnings, can give a court of equity jurisdiction of an action to recover the amount actually earned and unpaid. If such were the case, then it seems to me that the jurisdiction of a court of equity on the ground of fraud might be extended to a very large number of strictly legal litigations in which one of the parties has practiced some deception in the way of concealment or suppression of evidence. Courts of law are now equipped with extensive powers for the discovery of evidence in such cases, and in many such cases a bill for discovery pure and simple will lie in this court in aid of the appropriate action at law. It must be kept in mind that the bill does not allege that the defendant was under any obligation to keep accounts of the complainant's work, or had notice that he was not keeping accounts, or had notice that he relied on the accounts kept by the defendant. Giving the greatest possible force to the allegations that the defendant rendered false statements, I do not think that the unsuccessful attempt of the defendant to deceive the complainant as to the extent of part of his earnings can justify this court in taking jurisdiction of an action at law to recover those and other earnings, which jurisdiction it would not assume if no such unsuccessful deception had been attempted.

14. My present conclusion is merely this: that the complainant's case as set forth in his bill is not one of which this court should take jurisdiction until the same has been subjected to the course of procedure which a court of law in New Jersey to-day can pursue for its determination. Whether, as in the case of Cranford v. Watters, after a court of law has attempted to dispose of the case, grounds will appear for transferring it to a court of equity, cannot now be determined.

VAN DER PLAAT v. UNDERTAKERS' & LIVERYMEN'S ASS'N OF PASSAIC COUNTY et al.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Dec. 7, 1905.)

1. INJUNCTION — BOYCOTT — INJURY TO BUSINESS.

A complainant, who showed no established undertaking business or the ownership of any appliance used in carrying on such business, cannot obtain an injunction restraining an undertakers' and liverymen's association from boycotting him.

2. SAME — EXPECTED INJURY.

The mere fact that the constitution of an association of undertakers and liverymen contains clauses the obedience of which would result in a boycotting of complainant did not entitle him to an injunction restraining such a boycott.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 27, Cent. Dig. Injunction, §§ 10, 11.]

Suit by Frank Van Der Plaat against the Undertakers' & Liverymen's Association of Passaic County and others. On order to show cause why an injunction should not issue. Heard on bill and affidavits. Order advised, discharging the cause.

Edward F. Merrey, for complainant. William B. Gourley, for defendants.

PITNEY, V. C. The object of the bill is to enjoin a boycott. The allegation of the bill is that the complainant is educated as an embalmer and undertaker, and has been, for two months prior to the filing of the bill, ready and willing to engage in that business in the city of Paterson in Passaic county, but has been prevented from doing so by the defendant association and its members. It will be observed at once that the complainant has not on his own show the least shadow of an established business. He does not own a single appliance necessary or convenient for the transaction of the business, but avers that he relies on purchasing coffins and other supplies of that kind from persons engaged in the business of furnishing such supplies, and on hiring hearses, carriages, and horses from persons engaged in keeping those articles for hire for funeral purposes. He alleges that the defendant association comprises all the undertakers in the county of Passaic and most of the livery stable men, and, as I understand the bill, all of those owning hearses and funeral carriages in the county of Passaic. He further alleges that he recently applied for membership in that association and was refused. He asserts further that he tried to buy a coffin from the only manufacturer or dealer in that article in the city of Paterson, and was unable to buy one, and was informed by the dealer, Mr. Keasing, that he was unable to sell him any for the reason that the members of the defendant's association would not buy of him if he should sell to a member outside of the association. That he applied to two different liverymen who kept hearses, namely, Mr. Zabriskie and Mr. Ackerman, and they each refused to hire him a hearse and carriages except at a higher price than that charged to the members of the defendant's association, and put their refusal on the ground that he was not a member of the association. He does not state that on either of these occasions he actually had in hand a corpse to be disposed of. The attempt to purchase the coffin and the attempt to hire the hearse and carriages were each of them mere experiments.

He produces and points out clauses in the constitution of the defendant association, which are as follows:

"Art. 10. The members of this association shall not deal with any manufacturers of caskets or other funeral furnishings, nor with any jobbing house in undertaker's supplies, who shall sell, or offer to sell, to parties not in the business, or (after due notice) shall sell or offer to sell to any undertaker who persistently violates any of the provisions of this constitution, or to an expelled member of this association.

"Art. 11. The members of this association shall not loan, sell, hire or exchange, either directly or indirectly, any part of their equipments or supplies to an expelled member, or to any undertaker who has violated any of the provisions of this constitution, or to any undertaker doing business in the county of Passaic, N. J., who is not a member in good standing in this association."

"Art. 17. No undertaker or liveryman shall let or hire any hearse or coach to any private individual or person not an undertaker or liveryman, for less than the schedule adopted by this association; neither shall he or she hire to aid or assist any undertaker or liveryman not a member of this association to secure hearse or coaches for any funeral. * * * Neither shall any undertaker hire hearse or coaches from any liveryman who shall violate the schedule of prices or who shall hire hearse or coaches to any undertaker of Passaic county who is not a member of this association after due notice has been given him."

The complainant's counsel cited a great number of adjudged cases in support of his argument that, upon the facts as above stated, he is entitled to relief in this court. Before coming to the affidavits in behalf of the defendants, I stop to say that I have found no case which warrants the interference of this court against a boycott against a person who has no established business to be subjected to a boycott. Coming now to the defendant's affidavits, they show that the complainant's applications for membership—there were two—were treated precisely as other applications were treated. The rules of the association require that the applicant should have certain qualifications as to moral character and financial standing, and should have served an apprenticeship of one year as assistant to a practicing undertaker. Two different committees were appointed, one after the other, to inquire into complainant's qualifications in these respects, and both found him deficient in the qualification of skill and familiarity with the conduct of the business, and that he had not served any apprenticeship as an assistant to an undertaker, and they were unable to find that he had been sufficiently, if at all, instructed in the process of embalming.

The only party—Mr. Keasing—in Paterson who makes a business of supplying coffins swears that he never was forbidden by the defendant association or any of its members to sell coffins or funeral supplies to persons in Passaic county other than members of the association, or threatened with the loss of trade if he did so. That in point of fact he has done so to an undertaker not a member of the association within a very short time. He gives a version of the interview with the complainant testified to by him, quite different from that given by the complainant. He denies emphatically that he gave as a reason for not selling the coffin that he was afraid of loss of business from the members of the association. Judging from his account of that interview, he (Keasing) was simply looking with proper prudence at the probability of his receiving payment for the coffin proposed to be purchased. The defendant's officers, ex-officers, and some of its members swear that its constitution was copied from that adopted by the Hudson County Society; that there never was any thought by any member of the association of employing the paragraphs above quoted to prevent anybody from doing business who was not a member of the association, and that those paragraphs never had been enforced against anybody; that there never was any occasion to enforce them, because every undertaker in the county of Passaic joined the association, and all are still members, except one, who withdrew from the association because he became insolvent and went through bankruptcy, and has lately been refused readmission, principally, if not wholly, on the ground of his insolvency. Notwithstanding his nonmembership, he has been doing business in Paterson as an undertaker in a small way without molestation by the defendant society. The officers and members of the defendant society swear that the attempt of the complainant to establish himself as an undertaker in Paterson did not excite any action on the part of the society, and did not receive or meet with any opposition on its part or any of its members.

With regard to the complaint that complainant was unable to hire a hearse and carriages, except at a rate higher than that charged to members of the society, it is to be remarked that the affidavits show, what is a matter of almost common knowledge, that it is the practice for the undertakers to make a profit of $1 each from the hire of the hearse and coaches, and the complaint is, not that complainant could not hire the hearse and coaches at the price usually charged for those for funeral purposes, but that he was unable to exact from the proprietor the profit of $1 each. But Mr. Zabriskie and the man, Van Houten, in charge of the stable of Mr. Ackerman, to whom the complainant applied, each give quite a different account of the interviews from that given by the complainant. Mr. Zabriskie swears that one evening, shortly before the bill was filed, the complainant came to him at his place of business just as he had returned from a business trip in the country, and asked him to let complainant have the use of a hearse and three coaches the following day. Mr. Zabriskie answered as follows, "I stated to him that I could not do that. I was busy the next day, and could not accommodate him." He proceeds to say he did not refuse to hire the hearse and coaches to him, on the ground that he was not a member of the defendant association. He also swears that the complainant did not offer to pay cash for the use of the articles, nor did the deponent refuse to take the money because none was offered. He further denies that he said to complainant that he could not do business with any one not a member of the association, nor did he tell complainant that at any time, and he swears that he never said that he was afraid to let complainant have the hearse and coaches by reason of a fear of a boycott by the association, or that they had threatened him. He swears that no such threat had been made to him, and adds: "I did not know anything about the financial standing of the complainant, and I decline to do business with any person, unless I have some reasonable knowledge of their ability to pay." With regard to Mr. Ackerman, his foreman, Van Houten, swears that the complainant called at Ackerman's stable and asked the hire of two coaches for the next day, and stated that he was an undertaker. Van Houten told him the charge was $5 each.

Complainant did not offer to pay, but later in the day called up Van Houten on the telephone and stated that he desired to have a hearse and another coach, to which he was answered that he "could have the coaches, but he did not let the hearse to everybody." To which he replied "that if he did not get the hearse he need not send the coaches." He denies that he said that complainant could not hire a hearse from Ackerman at any price.

Generally the statements in complainant's affidavits of the principal facts relied upon on this motion are thoroughly met and denied by the affidavits of the defendants, so that I am not satisfied that he has been subjected to any boycott, even if he had a business which was liable to be injured by a boycott. What he may be able to establish on final hearing, when he will have the power to compel the attendance of witnesses and exercise the right of cross-examination, I cannot of course anticipate. In short, the complainant's case at present rests on the mere existence in the constitution of the defendant society of the clauses above set forth, without any proof which satisfies my mind that the clauses in question have ever been enforced or threatened to be enforced against him, or that their existence has been the least obstruction to his success. On this point I can find no judicial authority that the mere existence of such articles without their being actively enforced form any ground for the interference of this court. I conceive it to be a fundamental rule governing the action of this court that it exercises its restraining powers only for the protection of some threatened injury to a property right or a right in the nature thereof. The mere unlawfulness of an act or a series of acts, even though that unlawfulness amounts to criminality, does not excite the action of this court, unless it affects the personal or property rights of some individual who asks the aid of the court. It follows, that granting that I may conceive that the clauses in question are capable of being so enforced by the defendants as to work an unlawful boycott against some person, yet until a person who is threatened with such injurious action, and is likely to suffer pecuniarily from it, applies to the court, I cannot take action against the defendants. The case is not within the rule upon which I acted in Martin v. McFall, 65 N. J. Eq. 91, 55 Atl. 465. There Martin was a baker in full possession of an established business, and declined a request of a labor union to close his shop at 8 o'clock, and was threatened with a boycott and actually suffered in his trade by the refusal of his old customers to deal with him. The difficulty at the interlocutory hearing was to charge any particular person as an individual or the union as a body with having instigated the boycott.

I will advise an order that the order to show cause be discharged with costs.

TRENTON TRUST & SAFE DEPOSIT
CO. v. ARMSTRONG et al.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Dec. 12, 1905.)

1. WILLS—CONSTRUCTION—INTEREST OF LEGATEES.

A will provided that upon the decease or marriage of testator's widow the estate should go to testator's three unmarried daughters, so long as they should remain unmarried, and in case they "all" should marry it should be equally divided between testator's five children or the issue of deceased children. Held, that the daughters took the use of the fund during the time they remained unmarried as joint tenants, with right of survivorship between them, and so long as any of the daughters remained alive and unmarried the trust continued for their benefit, although others had died unmarried, so as to make it impossible that "all" should ever marry.

2. SAME—VALIDITY OF BEQUEST—RESTRAINT OF MARRIAGE.

A provision in a will for the support of daughters so long as they continue unmarried and need support is a valid bequest, where the evident intention is, not to restrain marriage, but to provide support.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 49, Cent. Dig. Wills, §§ 1533-1535.]

3. SAME—DESCRIPTION OF LEGATEES.

A daughter of testator, who was a widow at the time of the making of testator's will, and who was specifically included by testator in a bequest to his "three unmarried daughters," must be considered as unmarried in construing the will.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 49, Cent. Dig. Wills, § 1078.]

4. SAME—ESTATES CREATED—REMAINDERS.

A will provided that upon the decease or marriage of testator's widow the estate should go to testator's three unmarried daughters so long as they should remain unmarried, and in case they all should marry it should be equally divided between testator's five children or the issue of deceased children. Held, that the will created an estate for life or during maidenhood in testator's daughters, with a remainder over to the children in the corpus of the estate, which became a vested interest on the death of testator, and took effect in possession upon the determination of the interests of the daughters either by death or marriage.

Bill for the construction of a will by the Trenton Trust & Safe Deposit Company, administrator with the will annexed of Ephraim W. Blackwell, deceased, against Mary Frances Armstrong and others. Decree advised.

James Buchanan, for complainant.

BERGEN, V. C. The complainant, as trustee and also as ancillary administrator with the will annexed of Ephraim W. Blackwell, deceased, having in hand a trust fund, part of the estate of said decedent, has filed this bill for directions as to the manner in which it shall execute the trusts created by the will of its testator. The complainant has in hand about $2,000, which it holds subject to the trust, if any, arising from the proper construction of the following paragraphs appearing in the will of the deceased, viz.:

"Item: I give, devise, and bequeath the net rents, interest, and income of all my estate, real, personal, and mixed, whatsoever and wheresoever of which I may die seised, possessed, or entitled, unto my beloved wife, Sarah Ann Blackwell, for and during the term of her natural life, provided she so long shall remain my widow, single and unmarried, but not otherwise; she paying all charges and taxes against said real estate.

And immediately upon the decease or intermarriage of my said wife, which shall first happen, I give, devise, and bequeath unto my three unmarried daughters, Sarah Elizabeth Thompson, Emily Blackwell, and Florence Blackwell, so long as they remain unmarried, to have all my property so long as they remain unmarried, in case they all marrying, to be equally divided between my five children, Mary Frances Armstrong, Sarah Elizabeth Thompson, Emily Blackwell, Theodore J. Blackwell, and Florence Blackwell, or the lawful issue of the same as shall then be deceased, or their respective heirs, administrators, and executors or assigns, forever, so, nevertheless, that such issue take and receive such part and share only as his, her, or their deceased parent would have taken if then living."

The widow, and also Sarah, one of the three unmarried daughters, are dead. Emily and Florence, two of the three daughters described in the will as unmarried, are still living. Sarah died after the testator, without leaving issue, having never married. Besides these three daughters the testator left a daughter, Mary Frances Armstrong, the wife of James C. Armstrong. She is still living, and also a son, Theodore, who survived the testator, and died, leaving three children. These persons are all of the parties interested in the present or future distribution of this fund. They have all been made parties defendant to this suit, and for want of answers a decree pro confesso has been taken against them.

The doubt as to its duty in the premises, which the complainant suggests, arises under the claim made by the two unmarried daughters that they are entitled to the whole of the income as survivors of their sister Sarah, and that such right will continue to the unmarried sister, should either of the present survivors marry or die, and that no distribution of the corpus of the fund can be made while either of the three live unmarried. Against this claim is the insistent on behalf of the children of Theodore that the three unmarried daughters took only an interest which was to be divested upon the death or marriage of either, and that upon the death of Sarah they became entitled to an immediate distribution of the whole fund between themselves, representing their father and their aunts, Florence, Emily, and Mary. The intentions of the testator are so inartistically expressed in his will as to make it difficult to clearly ascertain and define them according to well-settled rules of construction; but it seems to me that the dominating purpose of the testator was to provide for the comfortable support and maintenance of such of the women of his family as were unmarried and dependent upon their own exertions for support. His estate was small, and he devotes its income at first to the support of his wife during her widowhood. After this purpose is served the income is to be devoted toward the maintenance of such of his daughters as remained unmarried, and, when all were married, the preference was to cease and the fund divided equally among all the children, because in the mind of the testator they had then reached a common level; and my understanding of this bequest is that it was the testator's intention that the fund was to remain undistributed and the income applied to the use of any of the daughters unmarried until all were married, or the happening of some event which precluded the possibility of the fulfillment of the condition. The time fixed for the distribution is when all are married. The death of one unmarried makes it impossible to have this condition met, if the word "all" is to be applied collectively to the donees as a class, and my interpretation of this clause is that the word "all" applies only to so many of the class as remain capable of marrying; that the death of one does not destroy the trust because all of the class cannot marry, but it continues for the benefit of the remaining beneficiaries so long as any of them are alive and unmarried. The class may be diminished by death or marriage, but it is not extinguished so long as one of them lives and continues within the description of those for whose benefit the trust was created. The devise is to three unmarried daughters, so long as they remain unmarried, with remainder over in the event of "all marrying." It is a legacy given to two or more persons by name, without words indicating an intention to confer distinct interests, and the three daughters take the use of the fund during the time they remain unmarried as joint tenants, with right of survivorship. Noe, Adm'r. v. Miller's Ex'rs, 31 N. J. Eq. 234-236; Gordon v. Jackson, 58 N. J. Eq. 166, 43 Atl. 98. It, therefore, follows that the complainant, as trustee, should hold the trust fund so long as any one of the three daughters remain unmarried, and pay the income to all, retaining the qualification established by the testator. A provision made for the support of daughters as long as they continue unmarried and need support, where the evident intention is, not to restrain marriage, but to provide support, is a valid bequest. Graydon's Executors v. Graydon, 23 N. J. Eq. 229-237.

On the argument the attention of the court was called to the fact that Sarah Elizabeth

Thompson, one of the three daughters, being a widow, did not properly fall within the description "unmarried"; but this condition does not change the situation. She was a widow at the time of the making of the will, and, as the testator expressly names her as unmarried, we must adopt the evident intention of the testator and give to this word a secondary, and perhaps a less-accustomed, meaning, which is, "not being married at the time in question"; that time here being the making of the last will.

The next question presented is, has the testator made any disposition of the corpus of his estate? The gift over, as expressed by the testator, is to take effect when all of the three unmarried daughters are married, and it is insisted that the gift of the corpus is liable to take effect or to be defeated by the occurrence or nonoccurrence of an uncertain event, viz., the marriage, not of one, but of all, of these unmarried daughters, and therefore falls within the definition of a conditional legacy, and, as one of the daughters died unmarried, the condition upon which distribution depends can never happen, and that therefore the testator died intestate as to the corpus. In my judgment this insistence has not the sanction of the true rules of construction to be applied to a case of this character, and I am of opinion that the testator intended to create, and, under well-established rules for the construction of wills, did create, an estate for life, which was subject to an earlier termination upon the marriage of all of his then unmarried daughters, and that the remainder over takes effect on the determination of the preceding estate, whether by death or marriage, and that, although the bequest over is in terms made payable upon the marriage of the life tenant, it is to be extended by implication, so as to take effect on the determination of that estate, whether by death or marriage.

What the testator undoubtedly intended was a provision for his unmarried daughters during their maidenhood, even if that condition continued until their death, and in the event of the destruction of that previous estate, either by marriage or death, then the corpus of the fund was to be divided among his living children, which might include these three daughters if the determination of their life estate had been caused by marriage, and also among the issue, per stirpes, of any of his children who might have died before the determination of the previous estate. This construction has the authority of well-adjudged cases. In Eaton v. Hewitt, 2 Dr. & Sm. 184-192, the court said: "It is a rule now well established that where a testator gives to a woman a life interest, if she so long remains unmarried, and then directs that in the event of her marrying the property shall go over to another, although, according to the strict language, the gift over is expressed only to take effect in the event of the marriage of the life tenant, the gift over is held to take effect, even though the tenant for life does not marry." In Browne v. Hammond, Johns. Chy. (Eng.) 210, where the gift was to the wife, so long as she should remain the testator's widow, without being expressly for her life, the court held that it was concluded by the authorities, "which have determined that a devise or bequest over, though in terms made upon the marriage of the donee of the preceding estate, is to be extended by implication, so as to take effect on the determination of that estate by death." This case was cited with approval in Underhill v. Roden, 2 Ch. Div. 494.

The result I have reached is that the gift over of the corpus of this fund creates a vested interest, which took effect on the death of the testator, subject to the estate of the widow, which has now been disposed of by her death, and also subject to the joint estate of the three unmarried daughters during their maidenhood, or life if they never marry.

WILSON v. WEIGLE et al.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Sept. 22, 1905.)

1. BANKRUPTCY — PREFERENCES VOIDABLE — INTENT OF DEBTOR.

Under Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 60b, 30 Stat. 562 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3445], providing that if a bankrupt shall have given a preference, and the person receiving it or to be benefited thereby, or his agent acting therein, shall have had reasonable cause to believe that it was intended thereby to give a preference, it shall be voidable by the trustee, and he may recover the property or its value, the party receiving payment must have had reasonable ground to believe that it was intended thereby to give a preference before he can be held liable to refund.

2. SAME—ACTION TO RECOVER PREFERENCE.

In an action by a trustee in bankruptcy to recover a payment made by the bankrupt, on the ground that it was an unlawful preference, evidence held insufficient to show that defendants had reasonable ground to believe that a preference was intended.

Bill by Henry L. Wilson, trustee in bankruptcy of David Freedman, against Frederick Weigle and another, to recover a payment on the ground that it was an unlawful preference. Decree for defendants.

Frank Benjamin, for complainant. Egbert J. Tamblin, for defendants.

PITNEY, V. C. The complainant, Wilson, is trustee in bankruptcy of David Freedman, a bankrupt, of Chicago, Ill., a dealer in jewelry. The defendants, Weigle and Rose, are manufacturing jewelers of Newark, N. J., and prior to February 11, 1904, were creditors of Freedman in three several promissory notes maturing on the 10th, 15th, and 20th of January, 1904, and which were protested for nonpayment, and on the 29th of January amounted, with protest fees and interest, to $511.71. On the 3d of February, 1904, they settled with Freedman, and accepted from him $200, a trifle less than 40 cents on a dollar, and gave a receipt in full for their claim. On the 7th of March involuntary bankrupt proceedings were instituted against Freedman, on the 22d of March he was duly adjudicated a bankrupt, on the 29th of April the complainant was appointed his trustee in bankruptcy, and on the 2d of May, having given his bond, was authorized to act as such and took possession of the bankrupt estate. He now files his bill in this court to recover back the payment of $200 so made by Freedman to the defendants, on the ground that it was an unlawful preference. The special allegation of the bill on that behalf is this: That on or before February 3, 1904, Freedman was insolvent, and that his liabilities amounted to $6,800, and his assets to $2,000, which rendered him insolvent, and the defendants had due notice of it. That the assets in hand at the time of filing the bill, January 11, 1905, were only about $400.

The facts which are admitted, or which clearly appear in evidence so as not to be open to dispute, are as follows: Previous to the month of January, 1904, Freedman was doing business as a dealer in jewelry in a room in the Masonic Temple in the city of Chicago. He had a safe, showcase, desk, and all the implements necessary for his business, and was undoubtedly solvent. He kept regular books of account, about the accuracy of which no serious dispute was made. They showed his indebtedness with substantial accuracy, and also the amount due him from his debtors. An important item of fact is that the character of goods in which he mainly dealt was what is known as staple goods, consisting mainly of gold rings and gold chains. The evidence is quite clear that for some time previously he had been arranging with his creditors in such manner that his indebtedness had taken largely the shape of promissory notes falling due in January, 1904. He swears, when called by complainant as a witness, that on the morning of the 6th of January he had on hand over $3,300 cash in his safe. Mr. Rose, the defendant, who examined his books of account with care about the 1st of February, swears that his cashbook showed that he should have had on hand at that time the amount of cash which he claimed to have and swore in this cause that he did actually have. On that day, January 6, 1904, he claimed to have been forcibly robbed of about $3,400 in cash, $141 in a check of a customer not yet deposited, and $500 or $600 of merchandise, making a loss by robbery in round figures of $4,100. On the 9th of January he caused to be prepared and mailed to his creditors a letter stating these facts, and showing his present financial condition. By that he showed that his assets on that day were: Cash on hand, $810; stock on hand, $1,950; fixtures and safe, $150; book accounts (both good and doubtful), $2,265. If we add to this the alleged losses by robbery, $4,100, we have $9,275. In the same letter he states his liabilities at $6,780, showing an ability, if his remaining assets were good as stated, to pay 76 cents on a dollar. He swears that his book accounts were worth at least 75 cents on a dollar, which would leave him able to pay 70 cents on a dollar.

Mr. Rose, shortly after receiving this letter, started out on a business trip, which brought him to Chicago toward the latter part of the month, when he set about looking into Mr. Freedman's affairs in a thorough and businesslike manner. He first heard his story about the robbery, and that of the witnesses. He had, in addition, read a second letter written by Mr. Freedman to his creditors, under date of January 14th, giving a detailed account of how he happened to have so much money on hand, and also the details of the robbery. This letter had reached the firm after Mr. Rose started out on his trip, and had been forwarded to him at Chicago. He then conferred with the police officials, with the result that he became satisfied that there had been no robbery, and he found the police officials, and all who had made any investigation of the affair, were of that opinion. He then examined into his actual financial condition and means. He took his word that he had on hand in cash, on the day the letter was written, the sum of $810. He found satisfactory evidence that he had paid out some money since the 9th of January in settling with some of his creditors and in living expenses. He examined his stock of goods, made a careful inventory of them, which is produced, found them to consist mainly of rings and chains (with the value of which he was familiar, because he manufactured them), and appraised them at $1,911.50, nearly the amount which Freedman claimed them to be worth in his circular. He found the fixtures and safe to be worth what Freedman claimed, $150. He then examined the credits on his ledger. He had a list of those credits furnished him by Freedman, which amounted to $2,265, and with the aid of his counsel went over Freedman's ledger and checked them off, and found the charges all there, and saw no reason to doubt that they represented an actual indebtedness as therein stated. He therefore concluded that his statement in the circular letter of his assets was substantially correct, and that, taking the value of the establishment as a going concern, it was worth about $5,000, which would enable Freedman to pay 70 cents on the dollar or thereabouts. He also learned that the man Rosenfeld, who appears to have prepared the circular letter of January 9th, proposed to go into business with Freedman.

I should have stated that he found Freedman in complete control of the premises, and apparently doing business as if nothing had happened. He also learned from Freedman that, after conferring with his friendly creditors, he had made up his mind to try to settle with his creditors at 40 cents on the dollar; that he had already settled with some of them at that rate, and had made arrangements to raise money to settle with the rest on the same basis. Naturally Rose, believing as he did that Freedman had within his control over $3,000 in cash of which he had pretended to have been robbed, did not feel any mistrust of his ability to raise the money to make the settlement; but he did inquire carefully into the probability of his being able to settle with all his creditors on those terms, and received from Freedman satisfactory assurances and information on that subject. Though he does not say so in so many words, I cannot but think, from a reading of the whole testimony, that he felt that Freedman would be willing to pay more than 40 cents if it were necessary so to do in order to settle. He finally concluded to accept the 40 cents and gave a receipt accordingly.

There is no proof before me as to what disposition was made by Freedman of his assets between February 3, 1904, and May 2, 1904, when the trustee took possession, nor as to the character of the assets which the trustee took into his possession. An ex parte affidavit made by the trustee on the 3d of July, 1905, states that the appraised value of the assets coming into his possession was $1,962.15, and that the amount of assets then on hand, July 3, 1905, was $184.11; over $200 less than the amount in hand when the bill was filed January 11th. The parties in this settlement were entirely at arm's length. There is nothing to warrant the inference that Freedman intended to treat the defendants better than he at that time intended to treat his other creditors. The clear weight of the evidence is that he was financially able at that time to have settled with all his creditors upon the same terms, and so far as appears he was then quite willing to do so. There is nothing to explain his not doing so, except the inference that some of those creditors refused to accept his offer. Upon these facts the question is whether, under the bankrupt laws of the United States, the defendants should refund the $200 received by them in full of their claim of $511 on the 3d of February, 1904.

The object of the bankrupt law is to produce an equal distribution among his creditors of the assets of the insolvent, and to that end they provide against unlawful preferences made by the insolvent in anticipation of bankruptcy, and they provide for a recovery back by the trustee in bankruptcy of any unlawful preferences made within a certain period of the bankruptcy. Undoubtedly Freedman was insolvent in the sense in which that word is used in the bankrupt act at the time he paid the money to Rose, because he did not have sufficient assets over and above those which Rose believed he had concealed to pay his debts in full. The first section of the act declares that a person shall be deemed insolvent within the provisions of this act whenever the aggregate of his property, exclusive of any property which he may have conveyed, transferred, concealed, or removed, or permitted to be concealed or removed, with intent to defraud, hinder, or delay his creditors, shall not, at a fair valuation, be sufficient in amount to pay his debts. Rose dealt with him as an insolvent, but he did not consciously accept the payment as a preference. I find as a fact that Rose thoroughly believed that Freedman was able and willing out of his unconcealed assets to pay each of his creditors considerably more than the 40 cents on the dollar, which he offered, and that he would, if pressed, pay more than that, and that Rose had no reason to believe but that every creditor would be able to receive, if he chose to accept it, the same rate of payment which he received on behalf of the defendants. Further, there is nothing in the case to indicate that Freedman intended to prefer Rose over his other creditors or supposed that he was doing so, so that the element of intentional or conscious preference of one creditor over another nowhere appears in the case up to the moment of the settlement with Rose. Further there is no reason to believe that, at that time, Freedman did not intend, in good faith, and was not able to settle with all his creditors at the rate mentioned. What may have been conceived and accomplished by him in the way of making further fraudulent disposition of his assets, between February 3d and March 7th, when he found that all his creditors would not settle on these terms, there is nothing to show. No proof was offered by complainant on that topic, for, as before remarked, the character of the assets which came to the hands of the trustee on the 2d of May has not been shown; nor has he shown what efforts he made, if any, to find other assets or to ascertain what had become of those which undoubtedly existed on the 3d of February.

Turning, now, to the statute (Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 60, 30 Stat. 562 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3445], we find the provisions governing the transaction as follows:

"(a) A person shall be deemed to have given a preference if, being insolvent, he has, within four months before the filing of the petition or after the filing of the petition and before the adjudication, procured or suffered a judgment to be entered against himself in favor of any person, or made a transfer of any of his property, and the effect of the enforcement of such judgment or transfer will be to enable any one of his creditors to obtain a greater percentage of his debt than any other of such creditors of the same class. Where the preference consists in a transfer, such period of four months shall not expire until four months after the date of the recording or registering of the transfer, if by law such recording or registering is required.

"(b) If a bankrupt shall have given a preference, and the person receiving it, or to be benefited thereby, or his agent acting therein, shall have had reasonable cause to believe that it was intended thereby to give a preference, it shall be voidable by the trustee, and he may recover the property or its value from such person. And, for the purpose of such recovery, any court of bankruptcy, as hereinbefore defined, and any state court which would have had jurisdiction if bankruptcy had not intervened, shall have concurrent jurisdiction."

It appears by this legislation that the party receiving the payment must have had reasonable ground to believe that it was intended thereby to give a preference before he can be held liable to refund. The actual intention to give a preference on the part of the insolvent is a necessary ingredient and the creditor receiving it must have reasonable cause to believe in the existence of such intent. Counsel for complainant does not contend, in his ingenious argument, that there is any evidence in the case to warrant the existence of such intent, or to warrant the inference that Mr. Rose, or either of the defendants, had reasonable cause to believe that Freedman intended to give the defendants a preference over his other creditors or to show them any special favor. He boldly argues that every creditor of an insolvent debtor has a right, by the statute, to have his estate administered in the bankrupt court, and that a party who accepts a composition from an insolvent takes it with notice of that right on the part of the other creditors, and that no matter how fair the offer is, and how willing and able the debtor is to make it, yet if any one of the creditors shall decline to accept it, and throw the debtor into bankruptcy, and after the waste and wear and tear of a winding up in bankruptcy, the estate shall not pay as much to the nonassenting creditors as the debtor paid to those who did assent, the creditors who accepted the composition will be liable to refund. In other words, he construes the mere fact that the debtor is compounding with his creditors at a fair rate, is evidence "that it was intended thereby to give a preference." I am unable to follow that reasoning or adopt that construction. It seems to me that it necessarily involves a plain perversion of the clear meaning of the statute. One thought in that connection may be worth mentioning. An actual preference is fatal if made within four months of filing the petition in bankruptcy. A settlement with creditors may have been perfectly fair when offered, and may have been accepted by several of them, and before all of them have had the opportunity to consider it, and then before the lapse of four months, misfortunes may have overtaken the insolvent, and the means which he had carefully preserved for the purpose of carrying through his original plan of settlement may have been swept away through no fault of his, nevertheless, according to the complainant's argument, all the creditors who had accepted would be compelled to refund.

Several cases were cited by the complainant's counsel, which were decided under the previous bankrupt act of 1867. The controlling language of those acts is different from that of the present act in stating the description of a debtor who is liable to be thrown into bankruptcy. The part of the act of 1867 controlling the present question is as follows: "Or who being bankrupt or insolvent, or in contemplation of bankruptcy or insolvency, shall make any payment, gift, grant, sale, conveyance, or transfer of money or other property, estates, rights or credits, or confess judgment, or give any warrant to confess judgment, or procure his property to be taken on legal process, with intent to give a preference to one or more of his creditors." And the liability of the creditor to refund is expressed as follows: "And if such person shall be adjudged a bankrupt, the assignee may recover back the money or property so paid, conveyed, sold, assigned or transferred contrary to this act; provided, that the person receiving such payment or conveyance, had reasonable cause to believe that the debtor was insolvent, and knew that a fraud on this act was intended." One case relied upon by complainant is In re Hapgood et al., 2 Low. 200, 7 Am. Law Rev. 664, Fed. Cas. No. 6,044, decided by Lowell, J., in 1873. That was a petition by a dissatisfied creditor to throw the insolvents into bankruptcy after they had settled with the great majority of their creditors at 50 cents on the dollar and had assets enough left to pay the nonaccepting creditors in full, and a handsome surplus. The reliance of the petitioners was upon the bare act of compounding with their creditors and paying them a percentage without the consent of everyone of them. Judge Lowell held that there had been no act of bankruptcy. Some of his language and argumentative propositions may be construed as favoring the complainant's position; but, taken as a whole, the opinion does not seem to me to help the complainant. The head note in Lowell's reports is this: "Payment by an insolvent debtor of a percentage on claims of a part of his creditors which does not lessen the percentage which the other creditors will receive is not a preference." Another case cited is Hackney v. Raymond Bros. Clarke Co. (Neb.) 10 Am. Bankr. Rep. 213, 94 N. W. 822. The governing principle found in the headnotes is as follows: "The trustee in bankruptcy may recover money paid by the bankrupt as a preference only when the person receiving it had reasonable ground to believe that a preference was intended. If the creditor has reasonable ground to believe that the debtor is insolvent, and the obvious effect of receipt of the money under those circumstances is to give him an advantage over other creditors, he is chargeable with notice of intent to prefer. Whether a creditor had reasonable cause to believe his debtor insolvent, within the purview of section 60, is a question of fact." If this be an accurate statement of the law it is fatal to complainant's argument.

I have examined most of the cases cited by counsel for complainant, and find none which go far enough to warrant a recovery in this case, and so, therefore, advise a decree for defendants.

DRIVER-HARRIS WIRE CO. v. DRIVER.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Oct. 3, 1905.)

CONTRACTS—CONSTRUCTION—SUBSEQUENT INVENTIONS—DISCLOSURE OF FORMULA.

A contract for the purchase of defendant's stock in plaintiff corporation provided that defendant should not concern himself in the manufacture or sale of resistance or steel armature binding wire, etc., but might experiment in making such goods at his own expense, and, if the results of such experiments should meet plaintiff's approval, the latter would manufacture the goods, pay for selling the same, "and the profits thereon, after paying for the raw material," should be divided between the parties, etc. The contract also declared that such inventions and improvements subsequently made by defendant should belong to him, and, if plaintiff did not approve the same, defendant might make and sell the goods on his own account, paying 10 per cent. of the selling price to plaintiff. Held, that defendant, having invented a new wire, was not entitled to offer plaintiff as a compliance with the contract the material invented in a state ready to be drawn into wire, but was bound to disclose the formula and permit plaintiff to manufacture the same from raw materials.

Suit by the Driver-Harris Wire Company against William B. Driver. On exceptions to the answer to the supplemental bill. Sustained.

Edward A. Day, for complainant. Alfred F. Stevens, for defendant.

PITNEY, V. C. I am asked to give my reasons, for the purposes of appeal, for sustaining the exceptions to the answer to the supplemental bill. The object of the original bill, filed May 15, 1905, was to enforce by preventing the breach by the defendant of a contract entered into between the parties hereto on the 16th of February, 1905, and consummated on or about the 5th of April, 1905. The defendant was the president of the complainant corporation and largely interested in its capital stock, and by the agreement he conveyed to complainant all his stock for the sum of $60,000, payable in installments, as specially provided in the agreement. Then follows an agreement on the part of the defendant that he will not "for a period of fifteen years, from April 1st, 1905, engage directly or indirectly, or concern himself in carrying on or conducting the business of making or selling resistance or steel armature binding wire, sheet or strip, or any brass or copper wire, sheet or strip or so called Antique Bronze wire, or Bronze wire made approximately of seven (7) per cent. of tin and ninety-three (93) per cent. of copper and imported from Germany, in competition with the business of the said company in" certain of the states of the United States. Then follows this further clause: "But the party of the first part has the privilege of experimenting in the making of the above mentioned goods at his own expense, and if the products and results resulting from such experiments shall meet the approval of the said company, then the said company shall furnish the machinery and labor for the manufacture of such goods, and the party of the first part shall pay the expense of selling the said goods, and the profits thereon after paying for the raw material shall be divided equally between the said wire company and the party of the first part, it being understood that the party of the first part shall have the right to fix and determine the selling prices for said goods; but if the said company does not approve the said goods and is unwilling to manufacture them on the terms above stated, then the party of the first part may make and sell such goods on his own account, and agrees to pay ten (10) per cent. of the selling price to the said wire company, rendering a full and true account of all sales every six months to the said company. It being understood that all inventions, discoveries, developments and improvements growing out of the experiments of the said party of the first part shall belong to him and that the said company shall not attempt to infringe the same; and that the wire company will not experiment or attempt improvements in alloys for resistance wire, sheet or strip during the term of this agreement unless the party of the first part shall have abandoned his experiments in the making of such alloys and shall have so notified in writing the wire company. And the said wire company, in consideration of the sale of said stock as herein provided, and in consideration of the party of the first part refraining from competition as above provided, hereby agrees to pay to the said party of the first part the sum of twenty five hundred ($2,500) dollars per annum for ten (10) years from April 1st 1905, in semi monthly installments, and the party of the first part agrees that he will do all in his power to assist the welfare of the said company by advice regarding business methods and customers at any time that he is consulted by the wire company or its officers." The bill charged specific breaches of this agreement commencing almost immediately after the 5th of April, 1905. An answer was filed on the 13th of June. Affidavits were annexed to each, and arguments were had thereon.

The supplemental bill was filed September 11, 1905, and the answer to it on September 20th. Exceptions were immediately filed to this answer for insufficiency, were promptly brought to hearing, and sustained on the 3d of October. The answer to the original bill and statements and admissions by counsel at the argument informed the court as to the meaning of the technical words used in the contract. The supplemental bill recites the original bill and the contract; and, after referring especially to the provision that the defendant might experiment as therein set forth and alleging that by the true meaning and construction of the contract any invention, discoveries, developments, and improvement by the defendant must possess substantial novelty and must be useful and new to the trade, it proceeds to state that since the filing of the original bill defendant had offered to complainant certain formulas for the making of resistance wire, giving the composition of those, and then contains this clause: "And also a resistance material composed of copper, nickel, and manganese in proportions unknown to your orator, which the said defendant claims gives a resistance of about 425 ohms per mil foot or about 40 times that of copper, and which will not rust, and has a higher resistance than any metal on the market which will not rust, which he claims to be improvements in resistance wire produced as the result of his experiments." The supplemental bill then charges that the defendant claims that any change in any of the articles, which by the contract defendant is prohibited from selling, however unsubstantial or unimportant it may be, gives to the defendant the right, under the contract, to join with the complainant in its manufacture and sale. The bill then alleges the continued breach by the defendant of the contract, and prays relief against the clause giving the defendant an annuity of $2,500; and claims the right, pending the litigation arising out of the pleadings, to abstain from deciding whether to accept or decline the offers of defendant of new inventions. In its prayer for answer the complainant asks as follows: "And more especially that he shall set forth and discover the formula, alloy, and ingredients in their relative proportions of the resistance material of copper, nickel, and manganese which he claims gives a resistance of about 425 ohms per mil foot or about 40 times that of copper, and which will not rust, mentioned and set forth in the foregoing bill, and also mentioned in a letter from him to your orator bearing date on or about the 28th day of August, 1905." The defendant by his answer declines to answer this interrogatory in the following language: "And this defendant denies the right of the complainant to insist upon the disclosure of the proportions of copper, nickel, and manganese contained in the last product offered to it by this defendant, for the reason that the product, by the terms of the contract, is his, and, if it differs in the results it accomplishes from the products of the complainant, so that it is demonstrated to be an improvement, he is entitled to offer the same as he has done in the shape of wire to the complainant, which can be tested and found to accomplish what he has stated it will accomplish."

The reason given by defendant in his answer and at the argument for declining to disclose the proportions of the composition of the alloy is that it is not necessary for the complainant, and it is under no obligation to furnish the "raw product," whatever that may mean, required for the manufacture of defendant's improved product, and, if defendant provides such product, there will be no necessity for complainant knowing its composition, and charges that complainant intends to disclose the secret of his goods and have them known to the public, and thereby the value of them will be lost to him. In his argument he further alleged that the value of his products could be determined by experiments in testing its power of resistance. Before measuring the value of this argument, I shall state that an examination of the pleadings, together with the statement and admissions of counsel made at the argument (and without relying upon the knowledge derived by me from a reading of the numerous affidavits presented to the court before the hearing on the exceptions, including the oral examination of witnesses on a motion for a judgment of contempt against the defendant, for a breach of the injunction issued against him), shows that the meaning of the words in the contract "resistance or steel armature binding wire, sheet or strip, or any brass or copper wire, sheet or strip" is some alloy of copper used in the manufacture of electrical apparatus which does not conduct electricity as freely as does pure copper, and hence is called a "resistance" wire, sheet, or strip. Copper is the best conductor of electricity, and is used in the art as a standard of least resistance, and different alloys of it are made with varying degrees of resistance. The different materials which produce these alloys are tin, zinc, steel, manganese, nickel, and, I believe, some others, and they may be mixed with almost infinite variety of relative proportions. The complainant claims in argument that the words above quoted include substantially any and every alloy of copper, since, unless it be in some manner alloyed, it will not be properly termed a resistance wire, sheet, or strip. I express no opinion on this claim at this time.

On the merits of the exception, the complainant claims that it cannot judge of the value of any new alloy presented to it without knowing the proportions of its ingredients; and that, if a sample be furnished, as it must necessarily be, it would have the clear right to analyze it to ascertain its component parts, and that it should not be subjected to that expense and trouble. In answer to defendant's argument that it is not necessary for the complainant to furnish or provide the "raw product," since the defendant can do so and is willing to do so, the complainant says that the provision of the contract in question is that the complainant shall furnish the machinery and labor for the manufacture of such goods, and that that provision implies, not only a duty on the part of the complainant to manufacture, but a privilege on its part so to do, and thereby save all the profits that arise from the manufacture, which includes, of course, the mixing of the alloy and the putting it into the shape of thin billets or rods ready to be drawn out into wire or sheets or strips as may be demanded by the trade. Further, it argues that, if it manufactures the goods, it is responsible to the trade for their character and composition. To this the defendant answers in argument that the character and quality of the goods may be determined by complainant by actual test of its powers of resistance to the current of electricity. I thought at the argument, and still think, that the contentions of the complainant in this behalf were sound and unanswerable. The offer of the defendant—I so construe the answer—to furnish the "raw product," by which I understand he means the billets or rods ready to be drawn into wire, sheets, or strips, is clearly inadmissible, since it would put the complainant at the mercy of the defendant in the matter of price to be charged for it. The clear spirit of the agreement is that the complainant has the liberty to go into the original market and buy the raw material and combine it and manufacture it as cheaply as possible, and for that purpose it is quite clear that it is entitled to know what those raw materials are, and in what proportions they should be combined. And here certain language in the agreement is significant, namely, "and the profits thereon after paying for the raw material shall be divided equally," etc. Now the words "raw material" there undoubtedly mean the several articles of which the alloy is to be composed, and cannot mean the billets and rods ready to be drawn into wire, which I infer was intended by the words "raw product" used by the defendant. And, over and above all, complainant is entitled to know those proportions for the purpose of judging and determining whether they wish to undertake the manufacture or not.

In short, the practical result of adopting the construction claimed by the defendant would be to give him the opportunity to gradually enter into competition with the complainant in the manufacture of all sorts of "resistance wire, strips, and sheets" upon condition that he pay the complainant 10 per cent. of the selling price thereof.

WRIGHT et al. v. LEUPP et al.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Dec. 15, 1906.)

1. TRUSTS — SPENDTHRIFTS — ASSIGNMENT OF INTEREST.

A provision of a spendthrift trust, requiring the trustee to hold the principal and income of the fund free from all claims of creditors and providing that the beneficiary shall have no power to anticipate, charge, or encumber the principal fund or the income, does not preclude the beneficiary from assigning to his wife a half interest in the income of the fund, as it may accrue and become payable, for her support and that of her minor children.

2. DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION — RIGHTS OF SURVIVING HUSBAND.

A husband is not only entitled to the administration of his wife's estate, but is also entitled to the whole net personalty of such estate.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 16, Cent. Dig. Descent and Distribution, § 153.]

3. SAME.

An assignment by a husband to his wife of one-half of the income of a trust fund as it may accrue and become payable, which provides that the wife shall support and maintain herself and the children of the parties without charge to the husband, and which makes no mention of the personal representatives of the wife, does not give the children any interest in the trust after the death of the wife, but after such event the husband is again entitled to the total income of the trust fund, free from any claim of the children.

4. PARENT AND CHILD — DUTY OF PARENT — SUPPORT OF CHILD — AGREEMENTS FOR SUPPORT — EFFECT.

An agreement by the wife to support the children of herself and husband without expense to the husband, in consideration of an assignment of the interest in a trust fund to the wife, does not relieve the husband, as between himself and his children, of the parental duty of supporting the children.

5. TRUSTS — ASSIGNMENT OF BENEFITS — LIMITATION TO BENEFICIARY'S LIFE.

Where a deed creating a spendthrift trust gives the body of the estate at the death of the beneficiary to his next of kin, without any right of testamentary disposition in the beneficiary, the latter cannot assign to his wife any interest in the income of the trust fund which may accrue and be payable after his death.

Suit by Henry J. Wright, as administrator of Hetty H. Furniss, deceased, and others, against William H. Leupp and another. Final hearing on bill, answer, and agreed statement of facts. Decree advised.

Frank Durand, for complainants. Willard P. Voorhees, for defendant Leupp. Randolph Perkins, for defendant Furniss.

PITNEY, V. C. The complainant Wright is the administrator, appointed by the surrogate of the city of New York, of Hetty McFarland Furniss, deceased, who was the wife of the defendant William P. Furniss. His standing in this court is acquired by having filed in the proper office a copy of his letters of administration. The complainants Clinton Furniss and Ruth Furniss are the children of the deceased, Hetty, and the said William P. Furniss. The defendant Leupp is the substituted trustee under a deed of trust made by the defendant William P. Furniss and his sister, Grace Livingston Furniss, then residents of New Jersey, to Solon Humphreys, also such resident, which deed of trust was dated the 31st day of July, 1882. That agreement was before the court in Furniss v. Leupp (N. J. Ch.) 58 Atl. 374.

The present action is in effect brought by the administrator of the wife and the children of the husband and wife against their father. It is based on a post-marriage contract between the husband and wife, dated the 24th of February, 1895, which recites a marriage between them on the 25th of January, 1883; the birth of the two children above named—the son Clinton C. in December, 1883, and the daughter Ruth on the 17th of April, 1885; that they have lived separately since May, 1885; that the husband had commenced a suit for divorce against his wife in this court in February, 1894, and the wife had commenced a suit against her husband in September, 1894, in the Supreme Court of New York, for judicial separation and alimony.

The deed provided that both suits should be discontinued, and then provides in the third clause as follows: "Third: One-half of that part of the income, as it may accrue and become payable, of a certain trust fund, whereof Solon Humphreys is trustee for the party of the first part, and which is mentioned and described in the answer of the said Solon Humphreys in the action last above mentioned, is hereby assigned and transferred to the party of the second part, from and as of the first day of September, 1894, and the said trustee is hereby authorized and directed to pay over to the said party of the second part, or to her order, such half part of said income as shall have accrued since the said first day of September, 1894, and as may hereafter accrue during the lifetime of the party of the first part. During such period the party of the second part agrees to support and maintain herself and the said children without charge to the party of the first part."

The defendant Leupp, as substituted trustee, has answered the bill, setting up certain facts which are admitted for the purpose of the suit to be true, and has submitted himself to the direction of the court. The defendant Furniss defends on several grounds presently to be considered.

Neither of the parties complainant or defendant were present in person at the hearing. Counsel for defendant, before entering upon the actual trial of the cause, suggested that he had reason to suspect that an error had crept into the copy of the contract between the husband and the wife, and that there should be a production of the original instrument in order to verify its correctness, as set out in the bill. Neither party had the original in court, and the argument proceeded with a reservation of the right to the defendant Furniss to be considered as not waiving the objection, and to ask to be relieved from the admission, contained in his answer herein, of its accuracy as set out in the bill.

The first point made by the defendant Furniss is that the assignment made by the third clause of the agreement between the husband and wife, as set forth, is forbidden by one of the clauses of the deed of trust of July 31, 1882 (see Furniss v. Leupp [N. J. Ch.] 58 Atl. 374), as follows: "(1) The said trustee, party of the second part, shall hold principal, increase and income of said fund, free from all claims, attachments, judgments, executions and liens of every nature by creditors, against either of said parties of the first part, and the said parties of the first part shall not have, nor shall either of them have, any power to anticipate, charge or encumber the said principal fund or any part thereof, or the increase, interest or income thereof, or in any way defeat the intent of this instrument as herein expressed, which is to make provision for the support, maintenance and personal comfort of the parties of the first part, free from liens and claims of creditors." A careful reading of that clause fails to satisfy me that such contention can be sustained. The clause is what is known as a "spendthrift clause," and was intended to protect the cestui que trust against his own improvidence, and against directly or indirectly anticipating the income; that is, against spending it in advance of its accrual by running in debt, or mortgaging it for a sum at present in hand. Now, the providing for the support of his wife and children by assigning a portion of his income, as it accrues and no faster, to be paid to the wife, is not charging or incumbering it in the sense in which that language is used in the clause in question, nor did it defeat the intention of the instrument, unless I am to hold, which I decline to do, that its object was to provide for himself personally, to the exclusion of any wife or children he might have.

The next point made by the defendant, however, has more substance; and that is, that the clause in the contract between husband and wife above recited, relied upon by the complainants, became functus officio upon the death of the wife. The argument on this part of the case is that as, at the making of the contract, the children were still young, one 12 and the other 10 years old, and were by implication left in the custody of the wife, the provision was made for her support and that of the children during her lifetime, and for no longer, which would be as long as she could perform the covenant made by her, in consideration of the assignment, to support the children, and, of course, as long as she would need support herself. This view is strengthened by the circumstance that the personal representatives of the wife are not mentioned in the deed.

Moreover, by the common law, which prevails in New Jersey, and which, in the absence, as here, of contrary allegations and proof, is presumed to govern this case, the husband is not only entitled to administration of his wife's estate lying in this state, but, whoever may administer it, he is entitled to her whole net personalty. Hence any fund which might come to the hands of the complainant administrator must, after paying her debts, go to the husband defendant, unless an enforceable trust in favor of the children can be found in the contract of assignment. I am unable to find in the contract any such trust of which this court can take notice, or attempt to define or enforce. The only mention of the children, except the statement of their birth and age, is that found in the last clause of the section above recited: "During such period the party of the second part agrees to support and maintain herself and the said children without charge to the party of the first part." All that this amounts to is an assumption by the wife, in consideration of the assignment, of the whole parental duty of supporting the children. As between the father and those children, he was not relieved of that duty, and, as there is no proof that the father was ever possessed of any fund belonging to the children upon which a court could lay its hand, I am aware of no basis upon which any court could ascertain and determine how much of the fund assigned to the wife should be spent in supporting the children. Be that as it may, the wife died on the 12th of April, 1904, at which time the oldest child was of age and the second one 19 years old. All obligation on the part of the husband to support the son, the elder, had then elapsed, and his obligation to support the younger survived in full force, without any protection arising out of the covenant by his wife in that behalf.

But the complainant points out and relies upon the definition of the period found in the assignment: "As may hereafter accrue during the lifetime of the party of the first part;" and it is just here that counsel for defendant fancies a mistake has crept into the copy. He fancies it should read "during the lifetime of the party of the second part," the wife. But I am now considering it as it reads, and must construe it in connection with the terms of the trust as set forth in the answer of Solon Humphreys to the suit for support and maintenance mentioned in the contract between the husband and wife, and recited in the answer of the trustee herein; and that trust is the one created by the deed of July 31, 1882, which is still in force and of which the defendant Leupp is trustee. By that deed, as I interpret it, at the death of the defendant Furniss, the body of his estate will go to his next of kin. He did not therein reserve any right of any testamentary disposition, so that he reserved only a life estate therein, and could not properly bind himself to pay anything to his wife after his decease. This situation accounts for the limitation of the husband's liability to his lifetime.

My conclusion is that the complainant administrator is entitled to recover a few dollars, which, by applying the doctrine of apportionment of time, will be found to be due to the wife at the time of her death; but the children are not entitled to anything, and as to them the bill must be dismissed, with costs.

DUKE v. DUKE.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Dec. 21, 1905.)

1. DIVORCE—JURISDICTION OF SUBJECT-MATTER.

Under P. L. 1902, p. 508, § 4, par. 1, giving the Chancery Court jurisdiction of a divorce suit for adultery, where the adultery was committed without the state and complainant and defendant, or either of them, resided in the state at the time of the adultery and at the time of filing the bill or petition, mere residence in the state of either party at the times specified is enough to give the court jurisdiction of the subject-matter.

2. ABATEMENT—JURISDICTION OF SUBJECT-MATTER—PLEAS.

Though the question of lack of jurisdiction of the person can be raised only by plea, and the benefit of it is lost by general answer, the defense of lack of jurisdiction of the subject-matter need not be raised by plea, but may be set up in the answer to the merits.

3. DIVORCE—JURISDICTION—DOMICILE—EXTRATERRITORIAL SERVICE.

Evidence in a divorce suit held to show that petitioner at all times from before his marriage had his domicile in the state, which after the marriage became the domicile in fact of the wife, the matrimonial domicile so established continuing till the separation of the parties shortly before the suit was commenced, so that the married state exists within the territorial jurisdiction of the court, authorizing it to proceed against defendant, who has become a nonresident, by service out of the state.

Petition by James B. Duke against Lillian N. Duke for divorce. Hearing on plea to the jurisdiction by evidence in open court. Plea overruled.

R. V. Lindabury and A. A. Clark, for petitioner. Chauncey G. Parker and Samuel Kalish, for defendant.

PITNEY, V. C. (after hearing counsel for the defendant). I do not care to hear you further on the part of the petitioner.

This is a suit for divorce by a husband against his wife, commenced by petition, charging her with adultery committed in various places in the city and state of New York. It avers that the marriage took place in the state of New Jersey on the 29th of November, 1904, and that from that time up to the filing of the petition the parties have been, and now are, inhabitants and residents in this state. The plea avers that the court has neither jurisdiction of the subject-matter nor of the person of the defendant, and alleges that the petitioner was not at the time of the marriage, and has not been ever since, a resident of, or a citizen of, or domiciled in, the state of New Jersey, but was a resident of, and a citizen of, and domiciled in, the city of New York, and that the matrimonial domicile and residence of the parties was at the time of the marriage, and thence until the commencement of the suit, in the state of New York, and not in the state of New Jersey. The plea further sets up that the defendant was not served with process within the jurisdiction of this court, and has not consented thereto, and that the proceedings are without due process of law. The plea then invokes the provision of the Constitution of the United States forbidding any state to deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, etc.

The charge on the part of the defendant of lack of residence and domicile in New Jersey strikes at the jurisdiction of the subject-matter as well as of the person. This appears, when we consider that the subject of divorce is not within the general jurisdiction of a court of chancery. In this state it is wholly statutory, and in this case comes under the second part of paragraph 1 of section 4 of the act concerning divorces (P. L. 1902, p. 508), "where the adultery was committed without this state and the parties complainant and defendant or either of them resided in this state at the time of the adultery and at the time of filing the bill or petition." If, then, the party petitioner or defendant resided in this state during the period covered by the petition herein, this court, by our statute, has jurisdiction of the subject-matter. But, in order to obtain jurisdiction of the person of the defendant by extraterritorial service of process, it is possible that something more than a mere residence is necessary. I stop here to say that, in order to raise the question of jurisdiction of the subject-matter, it was not necessary for the defendant to plead as she has done. That defense may be, in my judgment, set up in her answer to the merits. It is the lack of jurisdiction of the person that can be raised only by plea, and the benefit of which is lost by general answer. According to all the authorities, in order to obtain jurisdiction of the person by extraterritorial service, there must be what is called a "res" within the territorial jurisdiction. In fact there can be no decree strictly in personam based upon an extraterritorial service of process. But the court may deal with the rights of parties residing out of the territorial jurisdiction in matters such as land and personal chattels within its jurisdiction. The foreclosure of mortgages, where the owner of the equity of redemption is not within the reach of domestic process, is an example. So with the enforcement of debts by attachment against nonresidents levied on their property within the territorial jurisdiction.

In cases of matrimonial offenses the res or matter within the territorial jurisdiction, which, it has been held by the courts of all the states, except New York, and finally by the Supreme Court of the United States (reversing the Court of Appeals of New York), is sufficient to give the courts of a state jurisdiction to proceed against a nonresident on service out of the state, is the married state. If the married state exists within the territorial jurisdiction, the court of that jurisdiction may proceed to deal with it by extraterritorial service on the absent party. This arises out of the very necessity of the case, since, unless such jurisdiction could be exercised, the offending spouse who should be able to escape beyond the jurisdiction before service would thereby be able to deprive the other spouse of his or her just remedy. By our statute a mere "residence" in the state is sufficient, and it has never been here determined, as I am aware, whether that residence must be or have been a matrimonial domicile—that is, whether it is necessary that the spouses should have had their joint home in this state—or rather, I should say, that it has been held in this state that it was not necessary that there should be a matrimonial domicile here. But the Supreme Court of the United States has never, as I am aware, dealt with that precise question. In the Atherton Case, in which they held extraterritorial service sufficient, there was a matrimonial domicile in Kentucky, and the service was in the state of New York. However, in the present case the petitioner, who assumed the burden of proof, very properly undertook to show a domicile as distinguished from a mere residence at the time of the marriage, and from thence until the separation. He alleges that the county of Somerset, in this state, has been for several years before the marriage the chosen domicile of the petitioner, and that it continued to be such after the marriage, until the separation, which, by the evidence presently to be mentioned, occurred some time in July of the present year. And he argues that, in the absence of a separation, the domicile of the husband is the domicile of the wife, wherever they may have been actually sojourning. And he avers that it was the actual residence of the wife for a portion of the time between the marriage and the separation.

One other remark before coming to the facts: There may be a domicile without an actual present residence, and, vice versa, there may be a present residence without a domicile, as in the case of our foreign ministers who reside abroad without losing their domicile in the United States, and our Cabinet ministers and many of our members of Congress, who reside in Washington, but are domiciled in their respective states. Again, a man may have two or more residences, but only one domicile. He may have a country residence and a city residence, and each with all the paraphernalia of a home. Such instances are very common, and then it becomes a matter of choice. He chooses which one of the residences shall be his domicile and his choice is final, if made in good faith, although he may spend less time at his domicile than at his residence. Now, the marks of the domicile are numerous. They include the character of the place, and the acts and declarations of the party in connection therewith, provided, of course, the declarations are made in good faith, sincerely, and ante litem motam. In this country one of the most important indications of a domicile is the exercise of the electoral franchise.

Let us now look at the facts of this case, and that includes many years of the life of the petitioner. He was born and bred in Durham, N. C., where his father was engaged in dealing in and manufacturing tobacco. The petitioner was interested with his father as one of the firm of W. Duke's Sons & Co. Twenty-one years ago, when he was 28 years old, in the year 1884, he came to New York City, and established a tobacco business there. He was a bachelor from thence until his present marriage, and he lived in New York City from 1884 for 10 years. He never voted there. His domicile of origin was, of course, in the state of North Carolina, and so remained until he determined to change it, and he had a right to retain that domicile, although living in New York. He admits that he did, as he supposed, change it some time before the end of the 10 years; but he is unable to fix the date when he did change it to New York, if ever. At the same time he was described in official and other documents as of the city of New York as early as the year 1890. In the year 1893 he purchased the old Veghte farm of 300 acres, lying just south of the Raritan river, near Somerville. On it was a large old-fashioned mansion house. In the conveyance, as originally prepared, he is described as of Somerset county, but that description is erased, and the words "New York City" inserted, so that we may conclude that at that time he considered his residence in New York, and had not finally determined to make Somerset county his home. But in the year 1894 he moved the furniture of his suite of rooms in New York City to the old Veghte house and set up housekeeping there. From that time on he has been described in all official and semiofficial papers as of the county of Somerset, N. J. He was the New Jersey director of the corporation or corporations in which he was interested. He commenced directly from 1893 on to purchase more land, and from time to time for the next six or seven years bought several tracts of varying sizes, nearly every one adjoining each other until he had acquired over 1,700 acres. He was shortly after (1894) enrolled by the official canvasser as a voter in the township of Hillsboro, in the county of Somerset, and was thenceforward taxed yearly upon his poll.

He actually voted there in the years 1896, 1900, and 1904, when he was sent by the congressional district of which Somerset county is a part to the Republican Convention in Chicago as a delegate. He always spoke of that place as his home. He first repaired the Veghte house, and set up a small home establishment. Later on he built a large and expensive addition to it, costing, as I recollect the evidence, some $50,000 or $60,000, erected in the most substantial manner, with all modern conveniences, with heating apparatus throughout, and with electric light. He furnished it throughout, at an expense of over $60,000, with the most substantial and expensive articles, and hung its walls with oil paintings. He established a corps of servants, with a regular housekeeper and several maids and a man of all work. He provided a larder, which was at all times supplied and ready to entertain himself and his guests without warning. He built a stable at an expense of $55,000, and installed it with horses and carriages, and later on with automobiles. In short, the establishment had all the paraphernalia of a permanent home. In the meantime he was spending enormous sums of money in beautifying the grounds, which were sufficient in acreage to make a parallelogram one mile wide and nearly three miles in length. These grounds he laid out in a park with macadam drives, artificial lakes, waterworks to supply his house and buildings, and planted a great number of trees and shrubs, such as rhododendrons and other expensive plants. Now, he swears that he all the time intended to make this his home.

We have, then, first, the buying of this property, and the shaping it into a solid, substantial, elegant, and expensive home, fitted for both summer and winter residence. We have it furnished as such, and provided with a housekeeper, corps of servants, and a larder, always ready for him and his friends, when they came, including heat in winter. We have him declaring over and over again to various individuals, when talking about the improvements he was making, that he was making a home for himself. We have him making that his place of voting, and nowhere else, and we have him swearing that he always intended that as his home. We have, further, no evidence that he had any other home besides that of his birth, unless it be in the city of New York. The defendant alleges that all this time, and up to the time of commencing this suit, his real home and residence was in the city of New York. Let us look what the proof is as to that. Petitioner was an assiduous and attentive business man, and his business was mainly in the city of New York. It really extended all over the United States, and the company of which he was and is the head had large factories and places of business in many of the large cities of the United States. These were all managed, however, from the central office in the city of New York. In that office petitioner spent most of his business hours when in the neighborhood of New York. He usually, however, went out to Somerville on Friday evening, and sometimes, but not frequently, on Thursday evening, and remained over until Monday morning. Sometimes he went out for a night in the middle of the week. The proof satisfies me that he spent as many nights in the course of a year in Somerville as he did in the city of New York. He gave as a reason for not spending all of his nights in Somerville that his business cares were so exacting that he could not afford to spend the time, about two hours in the morning and two at night, required to go from his place of business on Fifth avenue, New York, to his farm. So he had a residence in the city of New York, where he could always go and had a right to go. He kept there horses and carriages and a coachman. That residence was with the defendant, with whom he lived as his mistress. I should not speak so plainly, but it was openly stated by her counsel in his able and ingenious argument, and abundantly appeared by a letter, written by the petitioner to the defendant in August, 1904, and offered in evidence by the defendant, in which he asked her to marry him and set at rest certain disagreeable rumors or scandals. The connection with the defendant commenced in 1892. He furnished her the money to buy a handsome and commodious house in a fashionable part of New York City, and also the money wherewith to furnish it, and there he always had a room and a home, if it be proper to call a residence like that, unsanctioned by marriage, a home. Some two or three years before the marriage ceremony took place the defendant sold the house previously occupied by her, and after a short vacation purchased another, No. 11 West Sixty-Eighth street, a fairly commodious house costing over $40,000, and continued her residence there, and the petitioner went with her. To each of these houses he carried a night latchkey, and came and went as he pleased. On the 29th of November, 1904, the parties were married at the house of the defendant's aunt in Camden, N. J., and immediately took steamer for Europe on a wedding trip, from which they returned the latter part of January, 1905. Before their departure, however, wedding cards were sent out, in the name of the aunt, announcing the marriage of her niece, Mrs. Lillian Nannette McCready, to James Buchanan Duke. With that announcement card was sent a card in the following words: "Mr. and Mrs. James B. Duke will be at home after the first of February, at 11 West 68th St., New York."

Counsel for defendant laid great stress on the use of that phrase "at home." It is proper to say that Mr. Duke disclaims all responsibility for it. He says it was some of his wife's foolishness. But, charging him with full responsibility for it, what, after all, does it mean? Why, simply that at that time and place they would be ready to see and receive visits from their friends. It would have been quite as appropriate if it had been used to invite their friends to call on them at some hotel in San Francisco or London or Paris, where they found it convenient to be shortly after their marriage. For instance, it might have read: "Mr. and Mrs. James B. Duke, at home at the Hotel Cecil, London, from the first to the tenth of February"—or it would have been equally appropriate, if the defendant had not owned or occupied a house in New York City, if they had made their home at the residence of Mr. Duke's brother, Benjamin N. Duke, which he then owned and shortly afterward occupied with his wife and two children in New York City. In short, it has the same significance, no more and no less, as the society phrase put in the mouth of the servant who opens the door to a casual visitor, and declares to that visitor that the lady of the house is not at home, and which is understood by everybody to mean simply, and no more, that she is not ready to receive visitors. It does not necessarily refer to a domicile.

Reliance was also placed by counsel on an expression found in the letter before referred to, written by petitioner to defendant in August, 1904, and addressed to her at a hotel in the White Mountains. He advises her to come home. When confronted with that letter, he said he meant her home, and I think that is the proper construction to put upon it. Not being then married, his Somerville home was not her home. But let us look at the movements of the parties after their return in January, 1905, to the United States from their wedding trip. They went together, first, to the Somerville house, and then to North Carolina to visit his father. From there they went to Florida; then returned to the defendant's house in New York City. The petitioner was, at or before that return, disabled with gangrene in his foot, and laid in bed under the doctor's care for six weeks, which brought them down to some time shortly after the 1st of May, when he took his wife out to his Somerville home, and they stayed there off and on until some time about the 1st of July, making their home there. The defendant was, indeed, restless and desirous to get away. The petitioner was insisting on her making her home there. She threatened to go back to New York. He told her he would sell off his stable belongings there, and cut her off from the use of the carriages. She said she would resort to livery. He said he would not pay the bills. Just when they ceased to cohabit was not shown, but they never did cohabit after he sailed for Europe on the 16th of July, 1905.

But in determining the value of the defendant's contention that, granting that petitioner's domicile was in Somerset county up to the time of the marriage, yet that it was then changed to New York City, another important and well-established, and, in fact, admitted, fact is here to be noticed. About the time of the marriage, and probably for some time before and after, the petitioner was entertaining the intention of building an elegant and costly mansion on the Somerville farm. He was devising and studying plans for it. He started on a $500,000 basis, and we all know what that means as to cost, and in all this his wife was consulted. And in the spring of 1905, when he was about to prepare the ground surrounding the site he had contemplated for this mansion, she was also consulted about that, and at her suggestion he changed the proposed site, and immediately put a large force of men, and I suppose machines, at work in grading and terracing for this new mansion. When, if ever, this work was stopped, did not appear, as far as I at this moment recollect. But, as before remarked, it is a well-established fact that while he was living with his wife on the farm—the place was called "Duke's Farm"—in the spring of 1905, he was actually engaged at great expense in preparing the ground for an elegant mansion for himself and his wife. Now, this I consider a very important and significant circumstance on the question of any change of intention on his part as to his domicile.

But the defendant does not stop there. When the petitioner returned from Europe in the latter part of August, 1905, just before the filing of the petition herein, he did not return to his wife's house, or, so far as appears, see her at all, but promptly set about providing a comfortable place and residence for himself in the city of New York. His brother, Benjamin N. Duke, a wealthy gentleman, with a wife and two half-grown children, was the owner of a handsome house in a fashionable neighborhood, which he had not yet occupied, or at least which was not fully furnished. Petitioner immediately set about having that house furnished. He brought in from Somerville, for the purpose of overseeing the placing of the furniture, his housekeeper, a very efficient woman. He managed to entice away from his wife all or nearly all of her housemaids and installed them in his brother's house. Asked why he did this, he said he wished to find out from them how his wife had been behaving herself during his absence, and his object in promoting the establishment in his brother's house was manifestly to keep within his reach and control those servants. Pressed on cross-examination, he frankly stated that there was no bargain between him and his brother on the subject, but he had no doubt that his brother would sell him the house and furniture and whole establishment at any time he might wish it, but that all the expense attending the setting up of the establishment was borne by his brother, except the regular salary of his Somerville housekeeper. This provision for a new residence in New York City was made after suit brought, and the house, when furnished and prepared for habitation, was occupied by his brother Benjamin and his wife and two children, and petitioner had, as I understand the evidence, a comfortable resting place there, but he voted in Somerset county in the fall of this year. He must have known—and he was all the while provided with the most able counsel—that anything in the way of a change of residence might be fatal to the success of his suit already instituted in the state of New Jersey, and I cannot think that he at that time seriously contemplated for even a moment abandoning his thoroughly established domicile in New Jersey for New York, and I infer from the evidence that this work of preparing his brother's house was all done after the filing of the petition, which was on the 2d of September.

Now, with regard to the facts that have been recited, it is proper to say that they are substantially undisputed, except some altogether trifling and immaterial disagreements in the evidence of the parties as to the household establishment at Duke's farm. I recollect but two conflicts upon the real merits of the case. Defendant swore that petitioner never intended to make his farm his home, but that he intended, after spending enormous sums in turning the greater part of his immense holding of land into a beautiful private park, to make a present of it to the town of Somerville or the county of Somerset—I forget at the moment which. Now, the petitioner swears that he never heard of any such thing until he heard it from the defendant on the stand, and he denies her evidence in that respect in toto. Now, I believe him and not her. I think her story falls as proof of its own weight. Neither the town of Somerville nor the county of Somerset have either the authority to accept such a gift, or the power or financial ability to keep the park in order and properly maintain it, if accepted. The whole idea approaches the absurd.

The other matter is this. The defendant swore that the petitioner, during all these years, did not enjoy his visits to the farm, and did not enjoy remaining there any length of time, and declared that he did not like to be absent from New York, even a few nights at a time. Now, it would have been ungallant, to say the least, in petitioner not to express a desire to enjoy defendant's society continually; and as soon as the postnuptial journeyings were over, and he had recovered from the long and serious disability which he suffered from his gangrene, he immediately transferred his wife to his Somerville home, and apparently tried to domesticate her there, where he could enjoy more of her society. He testified that he had been very much confined by the exactions of his business relations, but that for the last year or two he had made such business arrangements as to enjoy more liberty and have more time at his command, and to be able to be more at his farm. This fits in with his determination to build there a modern palace for his home life with his wife.

Upon the whole I conclude that the petitioner's domicile was for all these years in the state of New Jersey, that all his declarations in that respect were made in good faith, that whatever of a home he had in New York was not inconsistent with his actual domicile in New Jersey; and, granting that he had a residence in New York, he deliberately chose his domicile in New Jersey, and that choice was made in good faith at a time when its importance and consequences were not of consequence to any then immediate interests. I am further of the opinion that that domicile became, on their marriage, the domicile of the wife as a presumption of law, and that it became such domicile in fact when, in the spring of 1905, he took her out there to live with him as his wife. Thus we have here a matrimonial domicile actually existing up to at least a very short time before the commencement of the suit. Hence I doubt if the question which I mentioned during the argument is raised by the circumstances of this case. That question is whether, where spouses have their home in one state and there live together, and then separate, and one migrates to another state and there establishes a residence and a quasi domicile, which is not matrimonial, such residence or domicile will be sufficient, in the view of the Supreme Court of the United States, to create such a matrimonial status in that state as will justify the spouse so establishing it, and the state, in taking jurisdiction of the other spouse, not a resident in that state, by extraterritorial service of process. That question, as far as I am at present informed, though thoroughly settled in this state, has never been dealt with by the Supreme Court of the United States. It was on the supposition that this case, as finally developed, might raise that question that I expressed the hope that it might be carried to the Supreme Court of the United States. But while that question, if it had arisen, is one of great importance because of the numerous cases in this country where spouses are called upon to answer each other's complaints by suits in jurisdictions thousands of miles away, in this particular case it is of little importance. It seems to me that it makes little difference to the defendant whether she tries the merits of this case in New York or New Jersey. Indeed, I think the chances of actual justice are better in New Jersey than in New York, because there the issue must be tried before a jury all at one session, uninterrupted except by the hours of rest and holidays, and where either party is liable, especially in a case of this kind, to surprises in the matter of evidence, but which might be, but cannot be, successfully met for want of time, while here hearings may be put over, from day to day and time to time, till all the available evidence bearing on the issue has been produced. It may be said that the infidelity is charged to have taken place in New York City, and hence the witnesses are naturally to be found there, but, as the burden of proof is on the petitioner, that seems to me to furnish no cause of objection by the defendant, and whatever witnesses she may have in New York may be examined there, if unwilling to come to New Jersey.

There is no hint of lack of financial means on the part of the defendant to properly defend herself in this cause. If such lack of means exists, counsel for the defendant know how to remedy it.

I will advise a decree overruling the plea, and directing the defendant to answer within 30 days; and proper verbiage must be added to preserve her right to prosecute her appeal, notwithstanding her answer.

DUKE v. DUKE.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Jan. 2, 1906.)

1. APPEAL—FROM INTERLOCUTORY DECREE—STAY OF PROCEEDINGS.

Defendant in a divorce suit may not have proceedings stayed pending her appeal from an order overruling her plea to the jurisdiction, the court having no doubt as to the correctness of its ruling on the plea, the amount of business before the Court of Errors and Appeals being such that the appeal cannot be determined for some time, during which plaintiff's evidence might be lost; and it makes no difference that defendant has in mind the putting forth of a counterclaim against petitioner.

2. DIVORCE—CROSS-BILL—ALLEGING JURISDICTIONAL FACTS.

Defendant, in a divorce suit in which the court has ruled that it has jurisdiction, need not allege jurisdictional facts in her cross-bill, incorporated, as it may be, in her answer.

3. SAME—WAIVER OF APPEAL.

Defendant in a divorce suit, who by the order overruling her plea to the jurisdiction has been directed to answer in 30 days or suffer a decree pro confesso, with a provision that the filing of the answer shall not be taken as a waiver of her right to appeal from the order, having taken an appeal, will not by answering be considered to have appeared generally, and so to have waived her appeal.

Petition by James B. Duke against Lillian N. Duke for divorce. Defendant moves to stay proceedings pending appeal. Denied.

Chauncey G. Parker and Samuel Kalish, for the motion. R. V. Lindabury and Mr. Fuller, opposed.

PITNEY, V. C. This is a motion on behalf of the defendant to stay proceedings pending an appeal from an interlocutory decree. The order appealed from was one overruling a plea to the jurisdiction of the court, which was heard on the merits upon evidence adduced in open court. The order overruling it directed the defendant to answer within 30 days or suffer a decree pro confesso. A special clause, however, was added by my directions in these words: "The filing of said answer shall not be taken as a waiver of the right of the defendant to appeal from this order, or as a bar thereto." The general rule of practice of this court, which has not been disturbed by any statute, is that an appeal from an interlocutory order does not stay proceedings unless this court shall hold that they should be stayed for reasons applicable to the particular case. Many reasons can be imagined in special cases why this court should say: "Let us stay proceedings until we hear what the Court of Appeals has to say." But, I repeat, the unvarying practice of this court is to proceed on the idea that its orders and decrees are final and binding, precisely as if there were no appeal. If counsel will consider, they will perceive that it is quite impracticable to conduct the business of the court on any other basis. It is overlooked oftentimes because it is so easy to appeal, but it ought not to be overlooked. Now, I am asked to exercise the discretion of this court to stay proceedings pending this appeal, on, as I understand the arguments which have been addressed to me, three grounds:

First. Counsel insist that the decree which I advised on the 21st ult. was based upon such a doubtful set of facts that I ought not to subject the parties to the expense of a litigation on the actual merits of the case until the opinion of the Court of Appeals has been taken on the subject. Now, if I felt that the result at which I arrived is a matter of serious doubt as to its accuracy, and, further, that it would be a hardship for the parties to be compelled to litigate the actual merits of the case on which the petitioner has put himself in his petition, I might feel disposed, if there were not other serious considerations leading to an opposite conclusion, to grant the motion. But in fact I do not feel the least doubt about the correctness of my ruling the other day. Moreover I do not think that there is any hardship in compelling the parties to proceed. The petitioner, in exercising his rights in that behalf, proceeds at his risk. If he shall succeed and show that the defendant is guilty of the serious marital offenses with which he charges her, and she subsequently succeeds, either in our own Court of Appeals or in the Supreme Court of the United States, in showing that this court was without jurisdiction, or, what is the same thing, power, to proceed against her, any decree that this court may have rendered in the meantime against her will at once become null and void, and it will be the duty, and I may add, the pleasure, of this court to so declare by its decree annulling the former decree. If, on the other hand, the petitioner shall fail to make good his charges, and the defendant shall be acquitted, and declared innocent thereof, then I feel quite sure that she will have no cause to complain. With regard to the expense of the litigation, I remarked the other day, in disposing of the plea on its merits, that there could be no difficulty on that score. If the defendant is in the least degree impecunious, her counsel are well aware of her remedy in that respect.

But there is another consideration of great importance in determining this matter. In the present unfortunate condition of business in our Court of Appeals there is little hope of this appeal being reached and determined within a year, and, if determined adversely to the defendant, her plea is so framed, and intentionally so framed, that she will be entitled to an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, if that court will take cognizance of an appeal from an interlocutory order of this nature before final decree, where another two or three years, at least, will elapse before it will be reached and disposed of. I think it would be oversanguine to expect it could be finally disposed of within five years. And the same reasons which the counsel now urge for a stay pending an appeal to our Court of Appeals, will be equally potent for a stay pending the appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. Now, all that delay might possibly be incurred without serious prejudice to the parties, if the subject-matter of the litigation were of a nature which would not be seriously injured during the appeal, and if the evidence in support of the right of the party appealed against were of such a nature—say of record or of documents—as to be absolutely protected against danger of loss.

But such is not the present case. Notoriously, the evidence of matrimonial offenses rests in the memory of witnesses who are liable to die or wander beyond the reach of the process of the court, and whose memories fade, and who, after a lapse of years, when put upon the stand as witnesses, answer the questions put to them with a non mi ricordo. This consideration alone is, in my judgment, of very great weight against the exercise of the discretion asked by the defendant. Moreover, the subject-matter of this suit is the marriage relation. The evidence adduced before me on the hearing of the plea was of such a nature as to render it impossible to suppose that the petitioner was not and is not acting in good faith in prosecuting his suit. Now, pending this suit the petitioner is, of course, debarred from the privilege of entering into the marriage state, so that the case resembles somewhat the exclusion of a life tenant from the enjoyment of his estate with no remedy for such exclusion. Every consideration, then, that I can conceive ought to influence the court in a case of this kind, is against granting that delay.

The second matter urged by the defendant is that she has in mind the putting forth of a counterclaim against the petitioner. The answer to that argument is that she is at liberty, quite irrespective of the present proceedings, to sue her husband for relief on any claim which she may have, and it is not necessary that it should take the shape of a cross-bill to his petition herein. She may bring an independent suit, either in New York or New Jersey, as she shall choose and be advised, for it abundantly appears that petitioner is amenable to process in either state, and she may, in that suit, entirely ignore the existence of the present suit. If, however, it be the object and desire of the defendant not to destroy, but to preserve, the marriage relation, and to use the charge, which she suggests that she has good ground to make against the petitioner, only and strictly as a defense to the present action for the purpose of enforcing the equitable doctrine of in pari delicto, I am still unable to see how she is prejudiced or embarrassed in setting up such defense any more than she will be prejudiced or embarrassed in answering by way of traverse.

It was suggested that it would be necessary for her, in order to file a cross-bill by way of defense, to allege therein the statutory grounds of jurisdiction, namely the residence of the petitioner (defendant in her cross-bill) in this state, and thereby admit the jurisdiction of this court in this cause. But I do not so understand the practice. Subject to her appeal, she is now, against her protest, within the jurisdiction of the court, and is entitled to make any defense which the law of the land and the practice of the court allows to her, and the defense of guilt on the part of the petitioner is one of those defenses, and, as it seems to me, it is a good defense, if simply set up in her answer without resorting to the machinery of a cross-bill, which seems to me to be necessary only in case she asks for affirmative relief against the petitioner, and that relief she can only get in case she proves in the end to be herself innocent. But in any aspect of the case her cross-bill, incorporated, as by the practice it may be, in her answer, requires no allegation of jurisdictional facts, because, as before remarked, the court has already entertained that jurisdiction, and it would be entirely inadmissible for the court to entertain a motion to strike out the pleading for want of that allegation.

Third. But the matter mainly relied upon by the defendant is this: That under a decision of our Court of Appeals, if she shall now answer the petition, she will thereby be deemed to have appeared generally to the action, and will thereby lose the benefit of the appeal, notwithstanding the special clause added to the order above referred to. Counsel for the petitioner claims that her right to prosecute her appeal, notwithstanding her answer, was perfectly safe without that special clause. That may be, and its insertion at my suggestion may have been quite unnecessary. Be that as it may, I am unable to conceive that her answer under the specific direction of the court, accompanied, as it is, with a direct threat of a decree pro confesso against her if she fails, can possibly be held to be a waiver or abandonment of her appeal, or a bar to its prosecution, or a general appearance in the cause.

Counsel argued that the moment she answered the petition a motion would be made against her to dismiss her appeal, and that the court will dismiss it in strict pursuance of the doctrine of a case which they cite. I cannot so believe. The case relied upon is Polhemus v. Holland Trust Company, 59 N. J. Eq. 93, 45 Atl. 534, and, on appeal, 61 N. J. Eq. 654, 47 Atl. 417. There the complainant proceeded against the Holland Trust Company, by service upon an agent, in this state, as I understand the report, though it may be that the service was extraterritorial. Reading from page 98 of 59 N. J. Eq., page 536 of 45 Atl., I find that the learned Vice Chancellor uses this language: "In the second place, a plea to the jurisdiction of this court to take cognizance of the subject-matter of the suit was filed to the bill, and the ground of such plea was that the defendant was a foreign corporation not amenable to service of process in this state. The plea was overruled upon the single ground that if the person who, it was alleged in the bill, sold the bonds in this state, at the time he made the false representations set out in the bill, was the agent of the trust company to sell such bonds, then the cause of action arose here, and this fact conferred jurisdiction upon this court in this state. The court refused to try the question of agency under the issue raised by the plea, because it involved directly the whole merits of the controversy, and because the facts stated in the plea, being such as defeated the suit, could be pleaded as such, and therefore were not a fit ground for a plea to the jurisdiction of the court. National Condensed Milk Co. v. Brandenburgh et al., 40 N. J. Law, 112. The plea being stricken out, the objection to jurisdiction was reserved in the answer." No appeal was at any time taken from the order striking out the plea. An answer was filed, and the cause tried on its merits, and the bill dismissed. An appeal was taken by the complainant, but none by the defendant, and came on for hearing, and the result is reported in 61 N. J. Eq. 654, 47 Atl. 417, and the decree of the Chancellor was reversed on the merits. The counsel for the defendant and appellee attempted to raise the question of jurisdiction of the person of the defendant trust company by virtue of a clause inserted in its answer, setting up want of jurisdiction substantially as pleaded in the plea which was overruled. The Court of Appeals held that this could not be done under the well-settled practice of this court, and that the defendant should have appealed from the order overruling his plea, and, not having done so, its answer must be considered as a voluntary appearance, and an abandonment of its plea. This is the language used by the Court of Appeals on that subject: "If the plea was wrongly overruled, the remedy was by appeal; if rightly overruled, the answer still stood. The defendant did not appeal, but voluntarily submitted to a trial on the merits under its answer and a general replication. It could not, on final hearing, object to the jurisdiction to which it had submitted." The essence of that decision is that the appearance by answer was voluntary. But, in my judgment, it is quite plain that it would not have been voluntary if the defendant had appealed from the order overruling its plea. Instead of doing that, it acquiesced in the accuracy of the court in overruling its plea, and it was that acquiescence which was fatal to the defendant's objection. The Court of Appeals did not decide that if the defendant, before answering, had appealed from the order overruling its plea, the court would have refused to hear its appeal, and would have refused to give the defendant the benefit of any error found therein, which is the question here. The case is an illustration of what I said before about the presumption that all orders made by this court are absolutely just and right until reversed upon appeal, and it cannot be presumed or averred that any of them are wrong until they are reversed upon appeal.

Now, in the present case the defendant has appealed from the order overruling her plea, and thereby she protests against its accuracy and justice. If, notwithstanding that appeal and protest, she shall, under threat of a decree against her, answer the petition, I think it would be quite absurd to hold that she voluntarily appears to the action and loses the benefit of her appeal. She has in fact done all that she can to object to the jurisdiction of the court, and any further proceedings that she takes ought not to be treated as voluntary, but as compulsory. That was the view taken by the Supreme Court of the United States in Harkness v. Hyde, 98 U. S. 476, 25 L. Ed. 237. There a party who had been subjected to extraterritorial service appeared specially for the purpose of setting aside the process as improperly served, and his motion in that behalf was overruled. He then answered, and went to trial on the merits. The Supreme Court of the United States held that such answer was not a waiver of the lack of jurisdiction. I read from page 479 of 98 U. S. (25 L. Ed. 237): "The right of the defendant to insist upon the objection to the illegality of the service was not waived by the special appearance of counsel for him to move the dismissal of the action on that ground, or, what we consider as intended, that the service be set aside, nor, when that motion was overruled, by their answering for him to the merits of the action. Illegality in a proceeding by which jurisdiction is to be obtained is in no case waived by the appearance of the defendant for the purpose of calling the attention of the court to such irregularity. Nor is the objection waived when, being urged, it is overruled, and the defendant is thereby compelled to answer. He is not considered as abandoning his objection because he does not submit to further proceedings without contestation. It is only where he pleads to the merits in the first instance, without insisting upon the illegality, that the objection is deemed to be waived." The record shows that the defendant in this cause did in the first place move to set aside the service in this case because made out of the jurisdiction, and the motion was overruled, with leave to file a plea to the jurisdiction. I suppose that practice was adopted in order to enable the defendant to have the case put in shape to give her a right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. It is further to be observed that in the Supreme Court of the United States there is neither writ of error nor appeal until final judgment or decree.

For these reasons I am entirely satisfied that the defendant is in no danger of losing the benefit of her appeal by answering the petition, and I shall therefore decline to grant a stay.

This motion for a stay was renewed to the Court of Errors and Appeals on Friday, January 5, 1906, and was refused.

LONG BRANCH COMMISSION v. TINTERN MANOR WATER CO.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Nov. 1905.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES—MUNICIPAL SUPPLY—CHARGES—REGULATION.

Where a water company was organized to supply certain municipalities, under P. L. 1876, p. 318 (Revision 1877, p. 1365), requiring the consent in writing of the corporate authorities proposed to be supplied, a municipality had power to impose terms as to the rates to be charged for both public and private consumption.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 48, Cent. Dig. Waters and Water Courses, § 292.]

2. SAME—CONTRACTS FOR SUPPLY—MODIFICATION.

Under P. L. 1876, p. 318 (Revision 1877, p. 1365), providing for the organization of a water company to afford supply to a municipality, and authorizing a municipality to make contracts for a period not exceeding 10 years, the municipality has power to revise its contracts with the water company as to rates for public and private consumption at the end of every decade.

3. SAME.

A municipality, independent of statute, has power and owes a duty to protect its inhabitants against extortion in the price charged for water supplied by a private corporation furnishing water to it for public and private consumption, and to compel the corporation, to furnish water at reasonable rates.

4. SAME—ESTABLISHMENT OF RATES—REASONABLENESS—METHOD OF DETERMINATION.

In a suit to determine reasonable rates at which a water company should be compelled to furnish water to a city for public and private consumption, such rates should be established as would enable the water company to derive a fair income, based on the fair value of its property at the time it is being used by the public, taking into account the cost of maintenance or depreciation, current operating expenses, and the right of the public to have no more exacted than the service in itself is reasonably worth, including a fair income to the stockholders on their investment.

5. SAME—REASONABLE RATES.

Rule for the establishment of reasonable rates to be charged by a water company for furnishing water to a city applied, and rates fixed for the various services performed.

Action by the Long Branch Commission against the Tintern Manor Water Company, to restrain defendant from cutting off water supply to the city of Long Branch and to fix reasonable rates for such supply. Decree for complainant.

Robert H. McCarter and C. G. Van Note, for complainant. William H. Corbin, for defendant.

PITNEY, V. C. The municipal government of the borough of Long Branch (the Long Branch Commission) by its bill, filed July 31, 1903, as originally framed, sought an injunction against the Tintern Manor Water Company, which for many years (under the name of the Long Branch Water Supply Company) had been, and was still, supplying Long Branch and its inhabitants with water, to enjoin it from carrying out a threat recently made in writing to discontinue its supply of water to the municipality for public purposes, unless the municipality should pay certain arrears of dues for water furnished it for about two years then last past. On the return day of an order to show cause why such restraint should not be granted, it appeared that the contest arose out of a dispute as to the rates to be charged by the water company, not only to the municipality for public purposes, but also to private consumers. In fact, it was practically a continuation, in another form, of the contest, instituted by a citizen, but in fact supported by the municipality, in the Supreme Court, of which a report is found in Hicks v. Long Branch Commission, 69 N. J. Law, 300, 54 Atl. 568, 55 Atl. 250. It further appeared that the dispute at the present moment, August, 1903, was not so much over the terms of the agreement which was defeated by the Hicks suit, and which was, as we shall see further on, sufficiently favorable to the municipality, as over the rates to private consumers which had been established by the water company on June 1, 1903, and which were an amendment and slight reduction of rates established on June 1, 1902.

At the argument on this order to show cause, August, 1903, the water company contended that the municipality had no right, or power, to interfere with the rates established by the water company for private consumers, or to make any terms for such consumers, and that the rates fixed by the water company, which was organized under the act of April 21, 1876 (P. L. 1876, p. 318; Revision 1877, p. 1365), were final under the thirteenth section of that act, which declares that the company may sell its water at such price as the company may think proper. But I held that the true construction of the last clause of the second section gave, by implication, authority to the municipality to impose terms upon the water company in limine. That section requires the nascent corporation to annex to its certificate of organization "the consent in writing" of the "corporate authorities" of any town or city proposed to be supplied "with water." And it has been held that the certificate of organization without such consent was null and void. See Tyler v. Plainfield, 54 N. J. Law, 526, 24 Atl. 493; Hampton v. Clinton Water Supply Co., 65 N. J. Law, 158, 46 Atl. 650; Franklin Tp. v. Nutley Water Co., 53 N. J. Eq. 601, 32 Atl. 381. This clause puts it in the power of the municipality to impose terms as to the rates to be charged to both the public and private consumers, and it has frequently been exercised. It was not, however, done in this case. But, further, a statute permits the municipality to make contracts such as that mentioned for no longer than 10 years, thus leaving it open to the municipality to revise its contracts with the water companies every decade. The result is, as it seems to me, that the municipality has the power either by statute or by the implication therefrom, over the whole subject. But, independent of such statutory provision, I think it is the province and the duty of the municipality, whenever opportunity offers, to exercise its power in the protection of its inhabitants against extortion, and to secure them a supply of water and of gas from corporations, assuming to furnish those commodities, at reasonable rates. I so held in Public Service Corporation v. American Lighting Co. (N. J. Ch.) 57 Atl. 482. And, see, Davis v. Town of Harrison, 46 N. J. Law, 79, at page 85; Lake v. Ocean City, 62 N. J. Law, 160, at page 162, 41 Atl. 427, and Mayor v. City Trust Co. (N. J. Sup.) 54 Atl. 815.

The water company is exercising a public franchise, which, from its nature, and mode of exercise, is necessarily, during its continuance, a practical monopoly, and it follows beyond all question that its charges for its supply must be reasonable. And it would be strange indeed if the municipal government, which, so to speak, imposes this monopoly upon its citizens, were powerless to protect them against unreasonable charges. However, the counsel for the defendant, at the hearing of the order to show cause, cheerfully acquiesced in my ruling, and it was at once agreed in open court that the bill should be amended by inserting a clause asking the determination by this court of the question of the reasonableness of the scale of charges demanded by the water company, as well those to the private consumers as those to the municipality. This amendment was made and the bill, as amended, was answered, and the jurisdiction of this court in the premises submitted to by defendant, and the cause brought to a final hearing and a mass of testimony taken on the issue so raised in the spring and summer of 1904, and again in September, 1905. In the meantime an injunction against shutting off the water from the municipality was granted on terms that it should forthwith pay to the defendant four-fifths of the arrears already accrued, and of the dues thereafter to accrue pending the suit. The rate to private consumers to stand and be enforced according to the scale of June 1, 1903, until the final decree of this court.

Coming, now, to the determination of the matters submitted, I find it necessary, for the full understanding of the affair, to give a short history of the water company which has been for years supplying Long Branch with water. The defendant, the Tintern Manor Water Company, is the successor by process of merger and consolidation (under sections 104-107 of the act of 1896, concerning corporations [P. L. 1896, p. 277]) of the Long Branch Water Supply Company, which was organized in 1882 under the act of April 21, 1876, supra. The declared object of the latter company was to supply with water "the township of Ocean" (Monmouth county) "and the seaside resorts of Long Branch, Monmouth Beach, and Seabright, and the places adjoining thereto." The only one of the places so mentioned then incorporated was Long Branch. Attached to its articles of incorporation was the formal joint consent of the municipality of Long Branch and of Ocean township to the incorporation by the gentlemen mentioned in the certificate for the purpose above mentioned, and to the laying of water mains throughout the territory mentioned, and operating its works therein. The language of the consents is full and ample. No terms were imposed. The territory of Ocean township covered by this certificate is about nine miles in length on the seashore, and varies in width from less than one-half a mile to upwards of two miles. Being bounded on its northwest side for about five miles by the Shrewsbury river and Pleasure Bay. At the southwesterly end, at Elberon and Deal, it extends several miles into the interior. The Long Branch Commission covers about one-half of the southeasterly part of the ocean front of this tract. This company proceeded to supply the territory mentioned, and took its supply from the Whale Pond creek, a stream rising in the interior, and running at right angles to the coast, and emptying into the ocean in about the middle of the territory of the Long Branch Commission, and about a mile and a half southwest of the center of the old village of Long Branch. The point of diversion is about a half a mile from its debouche into the sea, and is called Takanassee. It there established a pumping station and a water tower about 80 feet high and laid mains throughout Long Branch and thence northeasterly along the beach to North Long Branch, Monmouth Beach, the old fisherman's village of Gallilee, Lowmoor, and Seabright, a distance of at least six miles. It also laid its mains southwest to Elberon and South Elberon, as rapidly as population demanded. In response to such demand, it, from time to time, added more mains of greater size, and, apparently, always kept well up to, if not in advance of, the demands of its patrons, and always served them, so far as appears, with entire satisfaction.

On September 21, 1891, it entered into a written contract with the municipality of Long Branch to continue for 10 years. By that contract the municipality gave the water company the exclusive right to furnish water for municipal purposes, also the right to extend its mains through any of the streets of the municipality, and agreed to pay it $4,000 a year for the municipal supply, including street sprinkling and hydrant service, for hydrants then in use, with a further charge of $40 a year for each hydrant thereafter to be added. The water company agreed to pay an annual tax, or whatever it may be called, of $250 a year, and to furnish at all times a complete and adequate supply of water. The municipality further granted to the water company the exclusive privilege of furnishing water for private use to the residents of the community, upon condition that the rates charged for the use of water should not exceed the rates charged at the date of the contract, reserving the right to the water company to supply water to any premises through a meter at 20 cents per 1,000 gallons (equal 133 cubic feet).

In point of fact, there never was any scale of charges for unmeasured water established or enforced by the Long Branch Water Company until June 1, 1902, and a great inequality and lack of uniformity arose out of the absence of such an established scale. Very few, if any, meters were introduced, and none, I believe, for water used for ordinary domestic purposes. So great was this inequality of charges that at and before the attempt to establish rates on June 1, 1902, in many instances private consumers were receiving for $10 a year a supply of water for which others were paying $40 per year. It was the attempt to adjust this inequality by raising the charges of those who had been served at a low rate which formed one of the causes of the previous and present contest. In the meantime in the latter part of the last century the growth of the population in the territory covered by the articles of association had grown from about 6,000 in 1880, including about 4,000 for Long Branch, to over 14,000 including about 9,000 for Long Branch, and the use of water had increased in a greater proportion. Such greater proportion was due, as we all know, to the somewhat modern lavish use of water for personal bathing, for lawn sprinkling and for street sprinkling. The result was that the officers of the Long Branch Water Supply Company found that in a very dry season their demand for several days was equal to the supply, and they took into consideration plans for increasing such supply.

Now this, I conceive it to be well settled, was their undoubted duty. It was so declared by Mr. Justice Van Syckel, speaking for the Court of Errors and Appeals in Olmsted v. Morris Aqueduct, 47 N. J. Law, 311, at page 329. A company, which seeks and obtains a franchise to supply a certain territory with water for public and domestic uses is under a moral, and, in my judgment, a legal obligation to furnish a supply which shall be equal to all emergencies which may be reasonably anticipated, including unusual droughts and unusual conflagrations, and to bear constantly in mind the prospective increase in population and a consequent increased demand for water. The evidence taken herein in September, 1905, showed that the Takanassee supply in the immediately preceding summer, was entirely inadequate and fully justified the necessity for some action on the part of the defendant company. The problem thus presented to the old company was not easy of solution. They could have built a reservoir to store the waters of Whale Pond brook above Takanassee which would have prolonged their supply, according to Mr. Sherrerd, upon whose opinion I place great reliance, for about 10 years. But the contour of the earth presented no favorable location for such a reservoir. It would consist mainly of very shallow water which is not desirable for storage purposes, and Mr. Sherrerd's approval of the plan I thought, and still think, was not very hearty. Its cost would have been about $220,000, and at the end of 10 years, and I think sooner, as the evidence indicated, an insufficiency would still have arisen.

But, in addition to all that, the supply at Takanassee was not central. It was six miles away from Seabright, the northeasterly end of the territory, and the mains already laid for that populous resort were already worked to their full capacity, after having been once more than duplicated. So that properly to supply Seabright would have required the laying of several miles of new mains. Then at the end of 10 years it was said that a supplemental supply could have been found by sinking in Long Branch City artesian wells a few hundred feet in depth, to tap the now well known layer of water-bearing gravel existing along the shore, precisely as predicted by Professor Cook many years ago, and from which several towns in Monmouth county derive their supply. But I am not able to say that I think this bed of water-bearing gravel, which seems to be a continuous one, has been so far tested or explored as to render it certain that its storage capacity will stand an unlimited draft upon it. For it must be borne in mind that it is a mere storage reservoir receiving its supply of water from rain falling on an outcrop in Monmouth county some miles inland from the seashore, and its storage capacity is undoubtedly limited. It appears that it has been tapped by a private individual in the city of Long Branch and water drawn therefrom.

This, however, can hardly be considered as a complete test of the reliability of the storage at that point. And if a plant had been established in the northerly part of Long Branch depending upon this subterranean supply it would have required, in order to make it available, the establishment and continuous maintenance of a complete additional pumping station, and would have required two pumping stations constantly in operation, thereby in some respects doubling the expense. The officers of the old water company looked elsewhere and fixed upon Swimming river, which rises farther in the interior, has a water shed ten times larger than that of Whale Brook pond and empties into the Navesink river, six miles northwest of Long Branch. They then united by articles of merger with a small water company which had been organized at Deal Beach southwest of Long Branch, and was in successful operation, a small one at Seabright, and two or three others which had only a paper existence, and with the Tintern Manor Water Company, then recently organized and adopted the name of the latter. Their pumping station is about one mile from Red Bank. From thence they laid a 36-inch main through Little Silver and Oceanport, about eight miles to the westerly suburbs of Long Branch, and there connected with a small 8-inch main of the old Long Branch system. This connection was merely temporary and quite insufficient to supply the town without the aid of the Takanassee plant until the new system could be continued into the middle of the main town, there to connect with the large mains of that system. Besides this, from the 36-inch main at Little Silver they laid a 16-inch main along the south shore of the Navesink river, through Fair Haven, Oceanic, then across Rumson Neck and the Shrewsbury river to Seabright, there connecting with the northerly end of the old Long Branch system. This last connection was an important one, in that it enabled the company to fulfill its implied contract to supply Seabright and the other shore towns between it and Long Branch, and at the same time to reach with its flow the northerly part of Long Branch.

At the time the bill was filed and at the hearing the two plants, Takanassee and Swimming river, were still in use, but the plan of the defendant was, and is, to abandon Takanassee as soon as it shall have laid in the town of Long Branch the proper mains to enable it to do so from the Swimming river alone. It is admitted that the new works are supposed to be amply sufficient, both as respects the supply of water and the size of the principal mains, to supply the region within its reach for 50 years to come. Indeed, the size and costliness of the plant is a matter of complaint by the complainant, and it insists that it should not be called upon or required to pay rates for water sufficient to pay a fair return for so great an expenditure. There is a measure of soundness and justice in this contention. The inhabitants of the borough of Long Branch ought not to be compelled to pay water rates adjusted to pay an income on a greater outlay in a plant than is reasonably needed for its supply. Just here I make the remark that the fact that the complainant is joined with the whole breadth of Ocean township, of which Long Branch covers only a part, is due to the facts that the municipal authorities of Long Branch voluntarily joined with those of Ocean Township in a scheme which embraced both. But I suggest that it is highly probable that it will be found in the end that the whole territory can be supplied to a better advantage as a whole by one plant than it could be if broken up into parcels and supplied by several distinct plants. I have said that a duty rested upon the old water supply company to furnish and maintain a sufficient supply for the territory embraced in its articles of association so long as it appeared that the municipalities within that range relied upon it to furnish them with such supply. I think it follows that so long as those municipalities and their inhabitants tacitly acquiesced in being so supplied it does not lie in their mouths to question the wisdom of the means adopted by the water company to fulfill its obligation in that behalf, provided the action of the latter is taken in good faith. The selection of these means, so far as relates to the choosing the source of supply, is somewhat speculative at best.

In the present case there is no reason to doubt that the water company acted in good faith in deciding to abandon the Takanassee plant, even if they made a mistake in judgment in so doing. I am unable to believe that the business men and capitalists who owned and controlled the Long Branch Supply Company, deliberately abandoned, and, so to speak, threw away their pumping plant and property and rights of diversion at Takanassee without being thoroughly satisfied that it was wise to do so. But I do not think they did make a mistake in judgment, I do think that the evidence fully justifies them in their decision. And here intervenes an important consideration. Any municipality supplied with water under 10-year contracts and circumstances like the present, has the power, at the expiration of one of its contracts to take measures to supply itself, either by erecting completely new water works, or by taking by condemnation the whole or a part of those already in existence. They hold that power in reserve both as a weapon of offense and defense against oppression by the existing water company. In the present case there is no reason for the belief, nor was it contended, that the contemplated change, which was, in fact, undertaken a few months prior to the expiration of the contract of 1891, was concealed from the authorities of Long Branch, and that they were taken by surprise in the premises. In short, the complainant appears to have concluded, and wisely, as I think, to accept the situation, and to obtain the best terms it could from the water company for its future supply.

This explanation of the situation of the parties and their relative duties brings us to the consideration of the very matter submitted, viz.: First. What annual compensation ought the defendant to have for the supply of water which it is giving, and agrees to continue to give, to the inhabitants of the territory covered by the Long Branch Commission? Second. How shall that compensation be distributed between the municipality, as such, for public purposes on the one hand, and the private consumers on the other? Third. As between the private consumers themselves?

The principle governing the first question is plain enough, but difficult of application to particular cases. It becomes complex as soon as an attempt is made to apply it. The subject has received careful consideration in two very recent cases one of Brymer v. Butler Water Co. (1897, by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania) 179 Pa. 231, 36 Atl. 249, 36 L. R. A. 260, and later (1900) in Kennebec Water Co. v. Waterville, 97 Me. 185, 54 Atl. 6, 60 L. R. A. 856. In the former case the subject was brought under direct adjudication. In the latter, it arose incidentally, but received most exhaustive consideration, and the result is sustained by a wealth of authority. In the Pennsylvania case, Mr. Justice Williams, speaking for the Supreme Court, at page 251 of 36 Atl. (36 L. R. A. 260), says: "By what rule is the court to determine what is reasonable and what is oppressive? Ordinarily, that is a reasonable charge or system of charges which yields a fair return upon the investment. Fixed charges and the costs of maintenance and operation must first be provided for. Then the interests of the owners of the property are to be considered. They are entitled to a rate of return if their property will earn it, not less than the legal rate of interest; and a system of charges that yields no more income than is fairly required to maintain the plant, pay fixed charges and operating expenses, provide a suitable sinking fund for the payment of debts, and pay a fair profit to the owners of the property, cannot be said to be unreasonable. This whole subject was brought to the attention of the learned judge by a request that he should find, as matter of law, that the reasonableness of the charges must be determined with reference to the expenditure in obtaining the supply, and providing for a fund to maintain the plant in good order, and pay a fair profit upon the money invested by the owners, and that a rate which did no more than this was neither excessive nor unjust. This the learned judge refused to find, saying, in reply to the request: 'We have no authority for such a ruling, and it would be unjust to the consumer, who would have to pay full cost of the water, provide a sinking fund, secure a reasonable profit upon the investment, and have no voice in the management of the business of the company. The act of assembly in this regard can bear no such construction.' This ruling cannot be sustained. The cost of the water to the company includes a fair return to the persons who furnished the capital for the construction of the plant, in addition to an allowance annually of a sum sufficient to keep the plant in good repair, and to pay any fixed charges and operating expenses. A rate of water rents that enables the company to realize no more than this is reasonable and just. Some towns are so situated as to make the procurement of an ample supply of water comparatively inexpensive. Some are so situated as to make the work both difficult and expensive. What would be an extortionate charge in the first case might be the very least at which the water could be afforded in the other. The law was correctly stated in the defendant's request, and the court was in error in refusing it." In the Maine case, which is largely relied upon by the counsel for the complainant herein, the following propositions were held: "The basis of all calculation as to the reasonableness of rates to be charged by a public service corporation is the fair value of the property used by it for the convenience of the public. At the same time, the public have the right to demand that the rates shall be no higher than the services are worth to them, not in the aggregate, but as individuals. Summarized, these elemental principles are the right of the company to derive a fair income, based upon the fair value of the property at the time it is being used for the public, taking into account the cost of maintenance or depreciation and current operating expenses, and the right of the public to have no more exacted than the services in themselves are worth. The reasonableness of the rate may also be affected, for a time by the degree of hazard to which the original enterprise was naturally subjected; that is, such hazard only as may have been justly contemplated by those who made the original investment, but not unforeseen or emergent risks. And such allowance may be made as is demanded by an ample and fair public policy. If allowance be sought on account of this element, it would be permissible at the same time to inquire to what extent the company has already received income at rates in excess of what would otherwise be reasonable; and thus has already received compensation for this hazard. In determining the present value of the company's plant, the actual construction cost thereof, with proper allowances for depreciation, is legal and competent evidence, but it is not conclusive or controlling. The request that 'under no circumstances can the value of the plant be held to exceed the cost of producing at the present time a plant of equal capacity and modern design' should not be given. Among other things, it leaves out of account the fact that it is the plant of a going concern, and seeks to substitute one of the elements of value for the measure of value itself."

These propositions are sustained by elaborate reasoning and abundant authority. I do not think it worth while to cite the latter. The supplying company is, as we have seen, under obligation to keep in advance of the present demand and take liberal account of the probable increase of demand due to increase of population. I think the language of Mr. Justice Dixon, in Slingerland v. Newark, 54 N. J. Law, 62, at page 69, 23 Atl. 129, at page 131, is apt on this point: "It would, of course, be absurd for the city to construct water works adequate only for its present wants, and the prosecutor does not assert that the works now contemplated are unreasonably large in view of the city's prospective growth." This is in strict accord with what was said (and above referred to) by Justice Van Syckel, in Olmstead v. Morris Aqueduct, 47 N. J. Law, 329, as follows: "In a matter of extreme necessity all contingencies must be provided for, and the supply must be so ample that a lack of water cannot be apprehended." To the same effect are the more extended remarks of Judge Parker in the Supreme Court in the same case, reported in 46 N. J. Law, 500. The learned judges in these cases were discussing the question of necessity for the exercise of the eminent domain. The argument from such premises to the present is a fortiori.

These considerations lead to the conclusion that the water company when it starts with new works, or a large addition to the original supply, is entitled to an income therefrom somewhat greater than what is due to the cost of work sufficient merely to meet the present demands. I say "somewhat greater" for I do not mean to be understood as holding that capitalists ought to expect an immediate compensatory income from an enterprise of this character. But on the other hand it would be manifestly unjust to expect them to invest their money in a plant necessarily larger than present demands require and take as an income therefor such a sum as would satisfy an investment sufficient to meet present demands. For here comes in again, with great force, the consideration previously mentioned, that the municipality cannot bind itself for more than 10 years; and, in fact, need not bind itself at all for any period, and it holds in its hand the absolute power to oust the water company at any time it shall so choose and may exercise that power as soon as by the increase of population and demand, the investment by the capitalists shall have become actually profitable. This is one of the risks spoken of and provided for by the Supreme Court of Maine.

Now, let us inquire what is the cost or the fair value of the works of the defendant:

First. The Takanassee works. They were put into the new corporation at $425,000 or rather $625,000, subject to a mortgage for $100,000 to secure outstanding bonds. That included the plant at Takanassee and all the street mains both within and without the limits of Long Branch. It was said by Mr. Sherrerd that the mains within the limits of Long Branch just before the date of the hearing, May, 1904, could be replaced at about $115,000, but I think that was a very low estimate, even at the then very low price of pig iron, which, as we know, fluctuates largely. The mains, in fact, probably cost twice the sum mentioned. I think no estimate was made (none was given) on the value of the mains outside of the corporate limits of the commission. To the value of the mains is to be added the removal value of the pumping engines and the fixtures and apparatus at Takanassee which was considerable. Then $71,000 was paid for the Deal waterworks.

This brings us to the cost of the new plant, in producing proof of which a large amount of time and space were occupied. They were commenced by a contracting company under specifications of the work given in detail and were to be paid for in $1,200,000 in first mortgage bonds and divers shares of the capital stock of the par value of $100,000. Difficulties were encountered in carrying out this contract according to its terms, and the plans were changed. The result of this was that the contractors were not held to their bargain, but were paid in bonds and stock according to the actual amount of their expenditures. In order to ascertain these expenditures an inventory of the work done was taken, and the cost was ascertained by the vouchers and checks furnished by the contractors. The reliability of this mode of ascertaining the cost was fiercely attacked by counsel for the complainant, but I think this attack was not founded in justice. It is true that it was alleged, and I believe proven, that some of the persons who were interested in the construction company were also interested in the water company. But the committee of the water company who undertook to make up the cost of the new works were not interested in the contracting company, and they went about their work, and carried it through in the usual mode that business men would adopt under such circumstances. Of course, it was easy enough to measure up the 15 or more miles of water mains laid, and ascertain the sizes and the prices paid for it and the cost of laying them, and so with the cost of the pumping engines, filter plant, so far as finished, and the great dam across the Swimming river. Moreover, maps of all these works were laid before the court by defendant, and complainant had an opportunity to put experts upon it and give estimates of its probable cost, but did not avail itself of the chance. The committee to ascertain this cost consisted of Ex-Senator Blodgett, who had been connected for some time with the old company. Mr. La Monte, its engineer and superintendent, and Mr. Conant, who at that time was its secretary, and all of whom were watching the construction as it progressed. They found that the contracting company had expended $936,000 and large sums were afterwards expended, and more yet have still to be expended so that its cost may be fairly stated at $1,000,000. The contractors, however, paid for all their work in cash. The defendant estimates the cost including the Takanassee and Deal works at $1,500,000 and upwards, without counting the shares of stock which were issued and which may be here treated as a mere bonus. Several distinct criticisms and objections are made to the details given of this valuation. First, it is said that the cost of the site for the reservoir, amounting to $76,000 is too great. The land itself, consisting of several hundred acres, cost $40,000 and the cost of clearing, $35,500. In fact, only about one-third or one-half of this land has been so far covered with water, and much more than the amount covered has been cleared. The fact is that the original plan provided for a very large reservoir, including a very high dam, but in carrying it out a lower dam and smaller reservoir were adopted. It is admitted that the present supply is ample for many years to come. I shall deduct from the total $25,000 on this account.

The next item criticised is the cost of the dam itself, the total cost of which was $89,500. The objection to this is that it was laid out and erected to its present height of a width sufficient for a dam two or three times as high, and that such construction cost nearly or quite twice as much as it would have done for a dam of its present height. I think this objection is well taken, but not to the extent claimed by complainants. I shall deduct $30,000 on account of the excessive cost of the dam.

The next objection is to the size of the principal main laid, viz., about 42,000 feet of 36-inch main, which was much too large and expensive, and that complainant ought not to be charged with an income on so great an outlay. Defendant admits that its plans were adapted to a future estimated growth of 50 years. Mr. Sherrerd says, and I agree with him, that 50 years is too long for a forecast. He fixed 30 years as the usual limit. Now it is readily perceived that the difference in cost between a 36-inch main and a 24 or 30-inch main is, or may be, so great that if it be saved and invested it will with the accrued interest in a period of 30 years reach a sum sufficient to lay an additional main if the first shall at that time prove to be insufficient. I have estimated by the use of standard hydraulic tables the difference in the cost and carrying capacities of a 30-inch main and a 36-inch main. These items vary according to the squares of the diameters of the respective mains. The square of 36 is 1,296, and the square of 30 is 900. The proportion then in round figures is as 13 to 9. Applying that in practice I find that the tables give the carrying capacity of a 36-inch main with a head of 1 foot in 1,000 feet length to be 15,000,000 gallons in 24 hours, and the carrying capacity of a 30-inch pipe under the same head is 9,500,000 gallons. Now, taking the summer population of Long Branch at 50,000 (which is double what it actually is, as we shall see directly) and estimating its daily consumption, including street sprinkling, at 75 gallons per head (which in my individual judgment is 50 per cent. more than it ought to use) we have 3,750,000 gallons per day. But, supposing that consumption is confined (which, however, it is not) to 12 hours a day, and call the rate 7,500,000 gallons a day; and add to that for 10 fire streams at a rate of 3,000,000 gallons a day and we have a total maximum demand of 10,500,000 gallons to be supplied through 33,000 feet of 30-inch main, intervening between the Newman Springs pump and the city. Now, the tables show that a 30-inch main, 32,000 or 33,000 feet long will deliver water at the rate of 10,500,000 gallons per day under a friction head of 35 feet or 15 pounds to a square inch, which as we all know is a trifling pressure. If we add to this 40 pounds to the square inch as a proper pressure to be maintained, at the hydrants, we have a pressure at the pump of only 55 pounds to the square inch, which is also a very moderate water piston pressure for a steam pump. The evidence is that the pressure at the works is maintained at 60 pounds to the square inch as a normal condition, and the works are arranged so as to maintain a pressure of 85 pounds to the square inch. By increasing the pressure at the water piston of the pump, we can easily and readily increase the carrying capacity to 20,000,000 gallons in 24 hours, and this can be done without improperly increasing the pressure on the steam piston by increasing the size of the steam piston as compared with that of the water piston. This is the familiar mode of arranging pumps to raise water to high altitudes, 1,000, 2,000, or 3,000 feet.

Here it is to be observed that while the old system limited the amount of pressure to the amount of head in the standpipe, the new system inaugurated at Newman Springs is not so limited. It is, in fact, the Holly system, which operates without a standpipe, in which a constant pressure is maintained automatically. That the estimate on a 10,500,000 gallons supply is liberal appears when we consider that the largest amount ever pumped in one day up to and including the year 1903, was 5,400,000 gallons, measured by the strokes of the pumps, from which it must be deducted the "slip" estimated by Mr. Sherrerd at 10 per cent. This was for the whole system including Seabright and the other smaller towns. I conclude, then, that a 30-inch main from the dam to the pumping station (nearly two miles), and from thence to the town (over six miles) is ample, flanked, as it is, by an 18-inch main from Little Silver to Seabright, each of these aiding the other in the case of an emergency of fire. Besides, I am entirely satisfied that the estimate for 75 gallons per head per day would be reduced below 50 gallons per day by the general introduction of meters, and such reduction of consumption, or rather of waste, will result in the saving of fuel for making steam. This I think it is the clear duty of the defendant to accomplish as soon as practicable. By the use of the same hydraulic tables showing the relative weights of 30 and 36 inch mains, and the difference in weight in lead used in joining the same, I conclude that the reduction of cost of the 36-inch main laid, if a 30-inch main had been used, would have been one-quarter. The total cost of the eight miles of 36-inch main with the appliances was $300,000. One-fourth of that would be $75,000 which I shall allow on that account.

The next objection is to the item of $110,800 of interest and $7,000 of coupons paid on bonds. It is argued that while an interest account in such cases is allowable the above-stated amount is too great for these works, but I think that the amount of excess, if any, is too trifling to be taken into consideration in this connection.

The next objection is to the amount paid,

$425,000 for the old works. No reliable statement was made as to what those works originally cost the old company. All that was said was that the present proprietors would not sell them for less than $325,000 besides the bonded debt, but then we must consider that there was not an actual sale for cash, but a merging into a new corporation. On the other hand there was some actual loss in the abandonment of the old plant and the amount spent in and about the dam and pumping station at Takanassee. I estimate it at $100,000. I deduct then from the $1,500,000 as follows:

|----------------------------|---------------|
| Whole cost of works..... | $1,500,000 |
| Loss on Takanassee..... | $100,000 |
| Overcost of 36 in. main... | 75,000 |
| Overcost of dam..... | 30,000 |
| Overcost on reservoir..... | 25,000 |
| | <hr/> 230,000 |
| Leaving | $1,270,000 |

—as the amount upon which defendant ought to receive dividends.

The next question is, what proportion of that sum of $1,270,000 ought to be charged, so to speak, to the defendant. The defendant suggests two-thirds. I heard from complainant no serious objections to this proportion. It accords with the present and recent proportion of consumption of water by the complainant as compared with the total consumption. This would require the complainant to pay a fair income on $847,000. This seems a large sum of money, but let us see what the demands of Long Branch are at present and what they are likely to become in the future. It has about 73 miles of streets laid out on paper and ready to be improved and built upon, and which according to the evidence are gradually coming into use. Of these only 23 are at present piped and supplied with water. The population is steadily increasing by the building of country residences, villas, and small boarding houses, which latter are taking the place of the large caravansary hotels, which are going out of fashion pari passu with the destruction of the business of gambling. The permanent population was nearly 9,000 five years ago, and is at this time probably 10,000 or more. The summer population, which is also increasing, is variously estimated at from 25,000 to 100,000. The higher estimate was put upon it by Dr. Reed, formerly mayor, and a strong supporter of complainant in its present suit. His evidence is this: "It is estimated that we have a population of between 75,000 and 100,000 in the summer." He says the permanent population of Monmouth Beach is probably 300 or 400 in winter, and in summer possibly 4,000 or 5,000. He gives Seabright a permanent population of 500 and in summer it is variously estimated at from 25,000 to 30,000. The same great variation probably applies to Deal. Mr. Blodgett estimated the population of Long Branch in summer at from 50,000 to 60,000. By virtue of his position as president of one of the railroads controlling two distinct lines of transportation carrying persons to and from Long Branch, I should think his judgment more reliable than that of Dr. Reed. Then we have the assessor of Long Branch who estimates the summer population at 25,000. His estimate is based upon observation of the capacity of the houses taken in making his assessment. These are all mere guesses, not made up from any recorded observations or reliable data, unless Mr. Blodgett's may be so considered.

There is, however, a mode of reaching a safer conclusion, and that is by comparing the recorded consumption of water (as shown by the numbers of the strokes of the pumps) in the winter months with that in the summer. Mr. La Monte has furnished us with a table for the years 1891, 1901, 1902, and 1903. The lowest number of gallons pumped in any month in 1891 was 15,502,769 in January, the greatest was in the month of August, 49,911,478. The average per day in January was 500,000, in July 1,658,687. This makes the consumption a little more than three times greater in summer than in winter. Whether the sewer system had then been introduced in the town has not been shown by the evidence so far as I recollect. A sewer system in general use, as is now the case, undoubtedly has the effect of increasing the apparent consumption in winter, for the reason that people are liable to allow their faucets to run in cold weather to avoid freezing.

Coming, now, to 10 years later, 1901, 1902, and 1903, we find that in 1901 the smallest flow was in the month of January, 40,214,260 gallons, an average of 1,297,234 daily, and the greatest consumption was in August, 104,727,946, or a daily average of 3,378,320 gallons, or a little more than 2½ times that in January. In the year 1902 the smallest consumption was again in January, 42,063,518 gallons, or a daily average of 1,356,887 gallons, and the greatest was in July, 104,716,960 gallons, a daily average of 3,377,966 gallons a day, almost precisely the same as in the month of August in the previous year, and a little more than 2½ times the minimum amount in January. In the year 1903 the smallest amount consumed was in the month of February, 51,000,850 gallons, or a daily average of 1,821,458, and the greatest consumption was in July, 129,090,408, or a daily average of 4,164,206 gallons per day. Here we have the summer flow just about 2½ times the winter flow. Applying that ratio here, and counting the winter population of Long Branch at this time as 10,000, we have the summer population, for the purpose of consumption of water at least, at about 26,000 or 27,000. If this estimate be reliable, it greatly strengthens the conclusion at which I have arrived as to the capacity of a 30-inch main to supply the whole district.

Now, in fixing the share of the whole cost to be charged to Long Branch, one other consideration comes in. The municipality has acquired the habit of using a very large amount of water in sprinkling its streets in the summer months. It uses daily in summer, except just after a rain, 16 or 17 sprinkling carts which are going continuously, some of them early in the morning and late at night. Besides these are two or three maintained by the county on such streets as were improved by the county. These carts use an average of 550 gallons at a load and, except in case of rain, distribute from 26 to 32 loads each day. That will amount to nearly 300,000 gallons, or 4,000 cubic feet, of water a day, enough to supply a population, for domestic purposes only, of 6,000 persons. Taking the population to be served with water during the summer months at 30,000, which considering the amount used for sprinkling is small enough, I think the estimate of the cost of the plant to be charged to Long Branch is none too great. For it must be borne in mind that the size and capacity of the waterworks must be fitted to the highest population to be supplied, precisely as if that population were permanent and not fluctuating with the season. I also think that waterworks costing $800,000, or more are none too great or costly for a town of that population.

The next question is, what is a fair income for the defendant to derive on that sum? I have intimated that the defendant ought not to expect, at the start, a compensatory income such as that stated by Judge Williams in the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, and by the Supreme Court of Maine, above cited, but I do think they ought to get at the start a moderate rate of interest, say 5 per cent. on their investment after paying all expenses of operation and maintenance and a moderate allowance for depreciation in value. This latter item as applied to the water mains is slight. If originally laid of iron of proper quality and properly coated on the interior, they are practically immortal. They are, however, liable to diminution in carrying capacity, due to the growth on the interior of tubercles of rust. This is an unascertainable quantity, which varies materially with the quality of the iron, the character of the coating, and the characteristics of the water. The fire hydrants, steam pumps, boiler and filters, and buildings certainly do depreciate in value each year to an appreciable extent over and above the amount which may be expended upon them for reasonable and ordinary repairs. Mr. La Monte put this depreciation at 5 per cent. on all the mains and hydrants. I think that too great, and fix it at 1 per cent. on so much of the $847,000 as is represented by the material so subject to depreciation. Just what proportion of the whole that represents must be a mere estimate; with insufficient data I put it at $600,000.

It follows that the net income which the defendant ought to receive at the start from Long Branch should be 5 per cent. on $847,000, which amounts to $42,350, and 1 per cent. on $800,000, making $8,000, and a total of $46,350. To this must be added the costs of maintenance and administration including ordinary repairs and taxes. Mr. La Monte had made up and submitted and been cross-examined upon a very careful estimate of those items showing the amount to be $30,000. I have carefully scrutinized it and believe it to be a fair and just estimate. Allotting two-thirds of this to Long Branch, we have it charged with $20,000 a year. This seems a large sum, but it must be borne in mind that the works must in their size and operation be gauged to the highest population in the crowded season, and to the extravagant use in which Long Branch indulges for street sprinkling. Taking those matters into consideration, I do not find it oppressive. The amount then which Long Branch should pay to the water company is as follows: Net income on investment $46,000, add for expenses $20,000, and we have $66,000.

We come, now, to the proper division of this duty laid upon the municipality at large, between what is called service for public purposes, fire hydrants and street sprinkling, and what is properly called private service, enjoyed by the individual citizens. An equal distribution of this burden is a difficult problem, and one not capable of exact solution, and it may be stated thus: How much of the general cost of maintaining the water supply should be assessed against the property owners as other municipal taxes are assessed, without regard to the individual benefit by each therefrom, and how much should be distributed among the citizens according to the use each one makes of the water? While probably incapable of solution with any degree of exactness, yet, it is fortunate that a mistake in its solution is not serious, since it is quite certain that a good and reliable water supply tends materially to promote the general prosperity of the municipality and increase the value of all land within its limits whether or not it is served at present with water. Lands facing on the 40 or 50 miles of unpiped streets in Long Branch are benefited to a greater or less extent by the bare existence of the water supply and the certain availability of it for them in the future. The same remark applies with greater force to the vacant lots facing on streets already piped. I shall first consider the case of the municipal supply.

The contested contract of November 24, 1902, framed after the schedule of rates to private consumers of June 1, 1902, had been established and published by the water company, provides as follows: $25 per year for each hydrant, then erected, or thereafter to be erected, and $100 a year for each wagon engaged in sprinkling the streets, with liberty to the municipality to put in use as many wagons over 16 as it saw fit without further charge, and the water company to pay a franchise tax of at least $650 a year, which I feel sure is much less than the actual tax. It also contained a provision that the rates for private consumers should not be increased during the 10 years period of the contract. A new table of rates to private consumers was adopted, as we have seen, on June 1, 1903, which, in some respects reduces the rates of 1902. This contract of November, 1902, never went into effect, and at the hearing counsel for the complainant expressed his satisfaction with it as to the municipal rates, and asked the court to adopt it. This proposition was not acceded to by the counsel for the water company. He declared that if the water rates to private consumers established by the company, either those of June, 1902, or those of June, 1903, were to be disturbed and revised by the court he demanded that the rates of the unexecuted contract of November, 1902, should also be revived. In this I think the counsel for the defendant is entirely in the right. The offer, so to speak, of the water company in the fall of 1902 to enter into the contract in question was based on the condition that the scale of charges to private consumers of June 1, 1902, should stand unchallenged by the municipality. The income which the water company expected to derive was based upon estimates of income from the two sources combined. I shall, therefore, disregard the terms of that contract, except so far as they indicate what was in the minds of the parties at the time.

First. The annual rent of fire hydrants. There were on May 1, 1904, 146 fire hydrants placed and in use, as I understand, being located at intervals of an average of about 1,000 feet. I think a fair rental of these is $25 each. That is about the average rental in the various municipalities whose rates were proven before me. In Plainfield they are charged at $15 each, but are placed much closer together, and are therefore much more numerous in the same territory. This, in my judgment, is a wise plan, and economical in the long run, since it enables the firemen to reach a fire with a much shorter length of hose, and thereby relieves the hose from the severe strain upon it due to the pressure necessary to force a stream through a long line of it. If the fire hydrants in Long Branch were placed as close together as in Plainfield, I should feel inclined to reduce the rental. At $25 each the rental for those in Long Branch will amount to $3,650 a year. This seems a large sum of money to pay regardless of whether or not they are used for extinguishing fires. But the charge has a substantial foundation in reason. In the first place, the water company comes under a serious obligation, somewhat like that of an insurance company, to keep itself in a continuous uninterrupted and unfailing readiness to furnish at each fire hydrant a sufficient supply of water under a reasonable and adequate continuing pressure. I stop here to say that some discussion arose at the hearing as to whether any decretal condition should be imposed upon the defendant as to the degree and extent of this pressure at the fire hydrants, and it was concluded, as I understood, that there was no occasion to impose any such condition, and it was remarked that there was no authority for any such action on the part of the court. To this I agree. But I make this further remark, that the examination which I made into the carrying capacity of the 36-inch main, the result of which, I have already stated, satisfies me that there is no appreciable danger that there will ever be a deficiency of pressure at the hydrants. As already remarked, the normal pressure at the pump is 80 pounds, and, under ordinary circumstances, with a 36-inch main, that pressure will not be reduced at the fire hydrants to a degree which will impair their usefulness. Moreover, the town very wisely has adopted and employs three very large steam fire engines, the successful operation of which will be affected very slightly, if at all, by a mere lack of back pressure at the fire hydrants, and these engines will always be well supplied if they find sufficient water in the main to fill them. A failure in that respect will indicate a complete failure of the water company's whole system. Speaking as an amateur engineer, I should say that it would not be necessary in a case of an alarm of fire to even stop the sprinkling carts. Another solid basis for the charge of hydrant rent is found in the fact that it is necessary for the water company, in order to maintain a sufficient flow at the fire hydrants, to install a much larger general system of street piping than is necessary, or at all valuable for the distribution of water for mere domestic supply. This I think they have done. The map indicates a range of sizes of mains much larger than would be required for mere domestic purposes. I find 8 and 6 inch mains laid where 6 and 4 inch mains would have been quite sufficient, but for the requisition for fire purposes. This surplus size must be continued in the future, and if the least defect in this respect is discovered, it must be promptly remedied by gridironing with cross-mains. I fix $25 as a proper annual rental for fire hydrants and the water company is to keep the same in repair, except when injured by external violence.

I come, now, to the item of street sprinkling. This item is capable of more accurate treatment. The amount of water used is capable of approximate ascertainment and the only question is, what rate shall be paid for it? The capacity of the wagons in present use, it was agreed, would average 550 gallons each. The number of runs each would make, in an ordinary day, when not stopped by rain, or drizzly weather, was also ascertained with reasonable certainty. Moreover, the amount distributed can be ascertained with absolute certainty by the introduction of a meter for each wagon. But I do not deem that exactness to be requisite unless both parties agree to it. The principal and important matter is to settle the rate which the municipality should pay. The evidence shows that the rates per 1,000 gallons for metered water in different municipalities varies all the way from 10 to 30 cents. The variation is due, first, to the general cost and value of the water at the point delivered; and, second, to the quantity delivered at a single outlet. The greatest variation in price is found in the quantity delivered, and that arises out of the difference between supplying goods at wholesale and retail. The lowest rate I have heard mentioned is that for the water furnished by the city of Perth Amboy to the municipal authorities of South Amboy by a single branch leading from its great main, through which it obtains its water from the south side of the Raritan river; and the water so taken by South Amboy is distributed to its citizens in the ordinary way. That rate is 7 cents per 1,000 gallons. It will be perceived that the seller of the water incurs no expense whatever in the cost of distribution of the water or collecting the money for its proceeds. I believe that it charges the same low rates for the very large quantities taken the year around by factories. The other instances of rates running from 7 to 10 cents per 1,000 gallons are those of factories taking very large quantities steadily the year around.

I do not think that Long Branch can put itself in the position of claiming rates on the basis of these year around takers of very large quantities, for the simple and sufficient reason that Long Branch takes only in the summer time. For the other months of the year the great plant necessarily arranged for the highest consumption is for present purposes lying idle. This last consideration is of the greatest importance, not only in this connection, but in others to be hereafter considered. Mr. Sherrerd tells us that the sale by the city of Newark to the street sprinklers is based on a rate of 15 cents per 1,000 gallons or at less rates on a sliding scale. His evidence is not definite, but the actual charge is $6 per week for each wagon, which would be $26 a month. I think, after a careful examination of the rates charged for measured water by other companies and cities, that those charged by the city of Perth Amboy to factories are the most reasonable and favorable to the complainant, and range from 7 to 25 cents per 1,000 gallons. Applying that here, after making allowance for the circumstances that the sprinkling is practiced only in summer, and mainly in the three or four months when the supply from the springs and streams is the lowest, I think that 11 cents per 1,000 gallons is sufficiently favorable to the complainant. I make the average amount used by a sprinkling wagon in one month to be 872,000 gallons. In this I make no allowance for days on which sprinkling is omitted by reason of rain or mist, and I think no allowance on that account should be made, for the reason that the water company must make and keep up all its arrangements at the pumping station on a basis of the water being drawn every day, and it is doubtful if it will save during a rainy day any appreciable amount even in the quantity of fuel consumed. 872,000 gallons in one month at 11 cents per 1,000 gallons makes $40.92. Counsel for defendant offered at the hearing to take $40 a month for each wagon, or to join the city in the expense of a meter put on each wagon at such a rate per 1,000 gallons as the court should fix. I think this offer was reasonable, and I shall adopt it. At that price for four months the amount which the city would pay for 17 wagons would be about $2,720. I say four months. As I interpret the evidence, the full equipment of 17 wagons is only maintained during four months in the midst of the season, and that for the one month on each side of the season a less number are used. I estimate for those extra months the probable income at that rate will bring the total amount paid for sprinkling up to $3,400 a year. This makes the total paid by the city for the two items in question, viz., fire hydrants and sprinkling service, about $7,000 a year, which I think remarkably cheap.

We come, now, to the rates to be charged to private consumers. Here I must repeat what I said before, that the rates must be so arranged that the defendant can have an income on a plant adapted to a population at its highest point in the course of 12 months. The only saving by reason of the diminution of population in the winter months arises from a saving in fuel. The same attendants at the pumping station are necessary. Then, again, the item of the cost of distribution intervenes and that depends upon the compactness with which the town is built, which affects the length of main necessary to furnish the supply. The complainant relied greatly upon several scales of charges for water furnished by towns and small cities, which own and operate their own works. Here, again, a consideration of some importance intervenes, and that is the item of profit and of a provision for a sinking fund referred to and approved in the authorities to which I have already referred. It is intended to cover the risk of such an enterprise. A private capitalist who undertakes to supply a town with water sinks his money, so to speak, in the earth in a shape that he cannot readily turn it into money, and he assumes the risk of the accuracy of his engineering and the durability of his works and the permanency of their need and the probability of their requiring at some time in the future a recasting and a rebuilding either in whole or in part. This latter is an experience which all the great public works of the last century have undergone. Now, a municipality which erects its own public works assumes that risk, and sooner or later, in all human probability, it will go through the same experience of being compelled to rebuild and renew. The examples in this respect of the cities of New York and Newark are familiar to all. However fortunate the small towns in Monmouth county, whose present success is put forward as examples by the complainant, may have been up to this time, there is no certainty that they will not be compelled in the future to abandon and lose forever a good share of the expense already incurred. Some, in fact, have already had that experience. For these reasons I cannot accept the rates of any of those as furnishing a proper estimate for the present case. A municipality which permits a private company to undertake to supply it with water and gas must expect to appear, at least, to pay a little more for its supply than it might, at first, do if it undertook to furnish its own supply. Especially is this true when it is so fortunate as to have near at hand an abundant supply which is easily appropriated by simple methods. Then if we compare the rates established by the defendant with those established by private companies furnishing water to private consumers we find a great variation in the mode of making up the items. So that a comparison in that respect is not easy. I speak now, of course, for charges for unmeasured water.

My own decided opinion is, as expressed at the hearing, that the fairest and most satisfactory mode of charging for water is by measuring it and fixing a price by the gallon or cubic foot. But the defendants have made their scale of charges without measurement, and the system of charging by measuring has not become so general in its use as to warrant me in imposing it in this instance on the defendant, although I strongly recommend it. The defendants make two objections to selling their water by measuring: First, the expense involved in immediately installing 1,200 or 1,500 meters, which they assert, and I entirely agree with them, must fall on the water company, because it should own and control all the meters; second, that it would throw an unreasonable burden on the permanent residents by unduly favoring the summer residents who would pay for only three or four months' supply. This last, I am decidedly of the opinion, can be overcome by charging a high rate, say 25 or 30 cents a hundred cubic feet for four or five summer months and half that for the winter months.

Coming, now, to the rates they have established, and before examining them in detail I will notice the more serious objection to them which is, that the charge is precisely the same to those takers who use water for only three or four months and those who use it the year around. It seems to me that this rule of the company works the hardest against the large country houses which are occupied, presumably, by persons who live in the style indicating that they can afford to pay high rates for water, and that it works in favor of the permanent resident, and this includes the majority of the citizens living in a more simple style. But the point is made by the municipality which may be supposed to have in view the interests of its permanent citizens and it must be considered. Here, again, I must remark that the only difference that I can perceive which will be experienced by the defendant by the closing of the large country seats and villas for eight or nine months in the year is in the single item of fuel, and this can only be considerable if the defendant can dispense with one or two of its pumps and clean out the fires from one or two of its boilers. But, nevertheless, I think some allowance should be made for nonuse in the winter. Here, again, a difficulty arises. The evidence tends to show that very few of the large country houses are entirely closed in the winter. A caretaker or housekeeper is frequently left in possession all winter. Then again, many of the large boarding houses are occupied by the proprietors in winter but the guests' rooms are entirely vacant and the extra water-closets and bathrooms are not used. I think these difficulties can be overcome by an actual disconnection and cutting off of the fixtures not needed in the winter season, and by reducing the charge on fixtures so disconnected to, say two-thirds of the regular rates for the length of time they are so disconnected. This will reduce the rates for the year on fixtures not used to about four-fifths of the rates charged for those used the year round. The expense of the disconnection and the reconnection in the fall and spring should be borne by the water takers.

Coming, now, to the details of charges: It will be found quite difficult to compare it with those of other water companies just as it is difficult to compare the charges of any other two companies. Mr. Robt. M. Kellogg, who is secretary and superintendent of the Middlesex Water Company supplying several towns in that county and of the Bergen Aqueduct Company, which supplies some towns in Bergen county, has adopted an ingenious mode of making a comparison. He collected and produced the rates of 36 towns and cities mostly in New Jersey, and many of whom own their own supply, and then took as a standard a dwelling with the following water taps, viz., one kitchen sink with hot and cold water, one water-closet, one bath tub, one washstand in bathroom and three laundry tubs. He found the Long Branch charges for such a house to be $18. He found 11 of the 36 to be the same. He found 8 of the 36 to be more than $18. He found 14 less than $18. The highest was $25, in Flemington, N. J., and the lowest was $14, in Vineland, Lambertville, and Rahway, N. J. The average cost was $17.77. This result shows that I cannot interfere with the rates already established, except as hereinbefore provided, unless the result of their enforcement will produce more income than the defendant is entitled to. There is a rate by meter for laundries, liveries, and boarding stables, at 35 cents per 1,000 gallons with a provision for an unmentioned lesser rate where the consumption is continued during the winter months. I cannot say that I think this is too high, provided, a reasonable allowance is made for a large quantity used in the winter season.

Let us now inquire how these rates will work out in practice. The income of the defendant from private takers within the limits of the Long Branch Commission for the years ending June 1, 1903-05, was as follows: 1903, $43,707.34; 1904, $44,079.34; 1905, $45,510.15. If we add to the latter for fire hydrants and street sprinkling, $7,000 and estimating for use by the county at $1,000 we have $53,510.15. Deduct from this the cost of administration, taxes, etc., $20,000, we have $34,000 to be devoted to income and depreciation of the plant; a sum which would make the income between 3 and 4 per cent. upon the amount I have allotted to the Long Branch Commission. I believe the above statement does not include the amount paid by the city for water in its public buildings. Add $500 for this item, we have a total of $54,000. This sum is $11,000 less than I have found is a proper income for defendant to receive yearly from complainant for water service. If, instead of allowing defendant 5 per cent. on the $847,000 found to be complainant's share of the total cost of the works, we make it 4 per cent. free of taxation, the defendant will still be short $3,000 of paying that moderate income. Or, to take another view. The defendant will receive between 4 and 5 per cent. from the cost of its works, without allowing anything for depreciation, except what is included in the estimate for repairs forming part of Mr. La Monte's estimate of annual cost of maintenance and administration. But then another element comes in. If, under the conclusions I have arrived at, the water takers are relieved of part of their annual payment by a deduction due to disconnecting fixtures in the winter time, the annual income will be somewhat reduced. Just how far of course, is a mere estimate. But it is quite manifest that the defendant will not under the rates which I have approved receive anything more than a fair income on their property even if the value of the works should be reduced considerably below the figure at which I have placed them. So that if I have erred against the municipality, I feel quite confident that that error has not gone so far as to injure it.

I believe I have now gone over all the questions submitted to me and I shall close with one remark. It is well nigh impossible to embody in a decree the rules and regulations and standard charges for the supply of water to a town, and it is quite impossible to so arrange them as to make the charges uniform, and at the same time distribute them equally among the different private consumers. Much must necessarily be left to negotiations in particular cases. Some towns, as shown by Mr. Kellogg, allow the amount of frontage of an establishment to affect the charge, and this I think is right for reasons previously stated. Then there is the element of vacant lots, and then when a new street is opened and partly built upon the cost of laying the mains is precisely the same as if it were immediately closely built up, and that cost, of course, enters into the cost of supplying the pioneer builders on the street. These and other matters must be taken into consideration, and dealt with in a spirit of accommodation and with a desire to treat all customers alike. The water company should at all times bear in mind that they are exercising a public franchise, which it is to use and not abuse. And the municipality must bear in mind that the stockholders of the water company are entitled to a fair income on their investment.

WRIGHT et al. v. WRIGHT et al.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Nov. 15, 1905.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—ALLOWANCE OF CLAIMS—JUDGMENTS.

Gen. St. p. 2368, § 53, providing that judgments entered against a decedent in his lifetime shall have a preference in payment of claims against the estate, has no application, where execution was levied on lands during the decedent's lifetime.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 21, Cent. Dig. Execution, §§ 157, 273; vol. 22, Cent. Dig. Executors and Administrators, § 957.]

2. PARTITION—PROCEEDS OF SALE—DISTRIBUTION—EQUITIES.

Gen. St. p. 2368, § 58, relating to the powers and duties of the ordinary, and the orphans' court and surrogate, provides that judgments of record against a decedent in his lifetime and funeral charges and expenses shall have preference and be first paid out of the estate of decedent. Execution on a judgment was levied on the judgment debtor's undivided interest in lands. After institution of partition the debtor died, and by decree the lands were sold, the judgment creditor being relegated to the proceeds of the sale, which were insufficient to pay his judgment, and after sale parties to the partition sought to have a claim for funeral expenses preferred over the judgment creditor. Held, that not having asserted their claim sooner, so that the judgment creditor might have protected himself by bidding at the sale, such parties were not entitled in equity to the substantial benefits of the statute.

Suit by L. Wright and others against D. P. Wright and others for partition, in which certain defendants petitioned for preferential payment. Petition refused.

Thomas B. Hall, for petitioners. E. S. Fogg, for respondent Charles E. Allen.

GREY, V. C. The bill in this case is filed for the partition or sale of certain lands lying in the county of Salem between certain tenants in common, one of whom was Frank Wright, who, pending this suit and before the sale of any lands herein, departed this life intestate. In the lifetime of Frank Wright a judgment was entered by Charles C. Allen in the circuit court of the county of Salem, an execution issued thereon, and a levy made thereunder upon his undivided interest in the lands affected by this partition suit. On this judgment and levy $778 remain unpaid. The judgment creditor, Mr. Allen, is made a defendant because of his lien under his judgment, execution, and levy on the undivided share of the defendant Frank Wright, and the master has reported in this cause, or it has been proven, that the judgment was entered and execution thereunder levied as above stated. Since the death of the defendant Frank Wright, the partition proceedings have been prosecuted to sale. Mr. Allen, the judgment and execution creditor, being a party defendant to this partition proceeding, has been cut off by the effect of the decree from any right or claim in the lands, and relegated for his judgment debt to the proceeds of this partition sale. This is the effect of the statute. Mr. Allen is now entitled to move this court in this partition suit to pay the proceeds of the partition sale of the defendant Frank Wright's share, on which Allen had levied his execution in Wright's lifetime to satisfy that levy.

The master has ascertained that there is due to Mr. Allen on his judgment the sum of $778. It will be noted that there are less than $200 which can be applied to pay Mr. Allen's judgment and levy, on which $778 remain due.

At this stage of the proceedings a petition is filed in this court by the sisters and mother of Frank Wright, who themselves are parties defendant or complainant in this suit, asking the court to make an order that they be paid nearly the whole of the share of Frank Wright, prior to Mr. Allen's judgment, to reimburse them the amount of money by them expended in and about the bringing of the body of the decedent, Frank Wright, from the state of Texas, where he died, and the expenses of his funeral and burial in this state.

The petitioners base this motion wholly upon section 66 of the orphans' court act, as revised in Laws 1898, p. 738, c. 234, which is as follows: "Judgments entered of record against the decedent in his lifetime, funeral charges and expenses, and the physician's bill during the last sickness, shall have preference and so be first paid out of the personal and real estate of the testator or intestate." That section is found in an act entitled "An act respecting the orphans' court and relating to the powers and duties of the ordinary, and the orphans' court and surrogates." Preferences to the payment of funeral expenses were recognized at common law (Haines v. Price, 20 N. J. Law, 483) and by early statutes prescribing the order of payment of claims against insolvent estates, and excepting certain claims from the operation of the rule staying actions within six months after the death of the decedent debtor (Paterson's Laws, p. 435; P. L. 1820, p. 169; Rev. Laws 1821, p. 766). This earlier legislation was enacted before the adoption of the state Constitution of 1844, which first introduced the provision that a statute should have but one object, which should be expressed in its title. Const. N. J. art. 4, § 7, par. 4. That legislation was all contained in statutes which in terms dealt with insolvent estates, and with the duties of executors and administrators in respect to the disposal of the property of the insolvent decedent which came to their hands. After the Constitution of 1844 required each statute to have but one object, and that such object should be expressed in its title, the older legislation was re-enacted under the title "An act concerning the estates of persons who die insolvent." Rev. St. 1846, p. 346, tit. 10, c. 6, § 2. This statute controlled the subject until the Revision of 1877, when it was repealed (page 1384), and the provisions relating to insolvent estates were re-enacted in the orphans' court act (Revision 1877, p. 770, § 81 et seq.). The section in the act which declares what claims against a decedent shall be preferred is section 58. As it is collated and expressed, it is a direction to executors and administrators regarding the order in which they shall pay claims against the estates which they are settling. This provision, to be found in section 58 above cited, is not mere rearrangement of previous enactments by way of revision. It is new legislation, because the previous and repealed statute applied only to insolvent estates, and in the re-enacted statute section 58 has been so broadened in its scope that it extends to all estate, solvent as well as insolvent. The title of this act is "An act respecting the orphans' court, and relating to the powers and duties of the ordinary, and the orphans' court and surrogates." The same provision has been continued, under the same title, in the subsequent revisions (Gen. St. p. 2368, § 58; Laws 1898, p. 738, c. 234, § 66), where it appears in the language first above quoted.

It is, I think, a matter of some doubt whether provisions in the body of a statute, which by its title expressed its object to be legislation regarding the ordinary, the orphans' court, and the surrogates, can be held to be of constitutional force, when they affect the judgments of every other court in the state. It was declared by the Supreme Court, in Evernham v. Hult, 45 N. J. Law, 56, interpreting article 4, § 7, par. 4, of the Constitution of this state, that the scope of a statute is by that provision of the Constitution limited to the object of the act which is expressed in its title. In that case the title of the statute under consideration expressed its object to relate to the court for the trial of small causes. One of its sections, however, sought to affect the judgments of other courts. To this extent the Supreme Court held the statute to be unconstitutional and void. In the case at bar, the object of the legislation, as expressed in the title of the act here in question, relates to orphans' courts, the ordinary, and the surrogates. Nothing in the title refers in any way to judgments of other courts, but under the petitioners' contention as to the effect of section 58, any judgment of the Supreme Court, or of the circuit or common pleas courts, may be nullified by postponing the application of the property, upon which it is a lien, to the payment of the funeral expenses of the decedent defendant. The statutory provision refers only to judgments entered of record in the lifetime of the decedent, and does not seem to include cases in which execution has been issued on the judgment and levy made on the defendant's lands during his life, as in the case at bar. In 1824, in Den v. Hillman, 7 N. J. Law, 188, the case turned upon the question whether a judgment which had not only been entered of record in the lifetime of a decedent, but on which execution had been issued and levied on the defendant's lands, also in his lifetime, could be lawfully enforced to sale of those lands after the defendant's death, when his estate was insolvent. The provisions of the then existing statute above referred to were invoked as controlling the case, and preventing proceedings on the judgment and execution after the defendant's death. The Supreme Court (page 188) unanimously declared that where the judgment was entered in the defendant's lifetime, and execution was tested and levy made during the same period, the proceedings were unaffected by the statute in question, "because that statute was not intended to interfere with executions lawfully sued out. It relates only to judgments." In the case at bar execution was issued and levied on the lands in question, and the plaintiff's rights therein were fixed, all in the lifetime of the defendant. Under the principle declared by the Supreme Court in Den v. Hillman, the statute which the petitioners invoke to defeat the operation of the plaintiff's judgment has no application.

Aside from the control of the present proceedings by the interpretation given to the provision in question by the law court, it is worthy of inquiry whether it is equitable, under all the circumstances of this case, to grant the petitioners' prayer. The statute in question applies directly only when the decedent's estate is in the hands of an executor or administrator in process of application to the payment of claims against the decedent's estate. That is not the present situation. This proceeding is not a petition to the orphans' court that the executor or administrator of Frank Wright may be directed preferentially to pay his funeral expenses. All that the petitioners can possibly claim here is the equitable application of the provision they have invoked; that is, they may show that under the circumstances it is just and equitable that the substantial benefits of that statute should be allowed to them in this court in this cause. The proceeding which brought this fund under the control of this court is a suit in partition. The respondent held a judgment, execution, and levy (all undisputed) charged against the share of Frank Wright in the lands sold in this suit. By the decree of this court those lands were so sold that they were discharged from the respondent's lien. He was thus not only invited, but compelled, to see that the proceeds of the sale satisfied his levy, if he would secure any benefit therefrom. There is on file a decree for distribution dated September 16, 1904, directing payment of the portion raised from Frank Wright's share to the respondent, in whole or in part satisfaction of his levy. Apparently this decree is still in force. The petitioners are parties to this partition suit, charged with knowledge of its several steps. The sale has been had upon the above ascertainment of the position of the respondent's judgment, and the proceeds are about to be paid to satisfy the respondent's execution and levy. At this stage of the case, when the respondent has no longer a chance to protect himself by bidding the lands to a higher price, the petitioners intervene, and ask that the money raised by the partition sale for the respondent shall be taken from him and given them, to reimburse them for expenses they incurred in burying the defendant Frank Wright, before any sale had been made.

The petitioners, if they had any preferential right to payment of Frank Wright's funeral expenses out of the proceeds of the sale of the decedent's lands, knew before the sale that they had such a claim. There is nothing to show that the respondent ever knew the petitioners asserted such a right. The petitioners were equitably bound to announce and assert their right before the sale, so that the respondent, having notice of this claim of preference for funeral expenses, might, if he chose to do so, protect himself by bidding up the property to such a price as would not only pay the amount of his levy, but also the alleged preferential claim of the petitioners for funeral expenses. In fact, the petitioners' claim is disclosed for the first time only after the respondent had been assured by the master's report and decree that the proceeds of sale should go to pay his levy, and after the sale of the lands had actually taken place under that report and decree. In my view it would, under such circumstances, be inequitable at this late day to order these proceeds of the sale to be taken from the respondent and given to the petitioners.

I think the petitioners' prayer for such an order for preferential payment should be refused, but without costs.

BARTOW v. ERIE R. CO. 737.1.17

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 13, 1905)
DAMAGES—ACTIONS OF TORT—LOSS OF PROFITS.

Loss of profits in business are recoverable as damages in actions of tort, when they are capable of being estimated with reasonable certainty; but, where the proof furnishes no data from which the jury may find with reasonable certainty the amount of the profits recoverable as damages as the result of the accident, it is error for the court to submit this element of damages to the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Damages, §§ 72-83.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Passaic County.

Action by James Bartow against the Erie Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Argued June term, 1905, before GUMMERE, C. J., and REED and FORT, JJ.

Collins & Corbin, for plaintiff in error.
Peter J. McGinnis, for defendant in error.

FORT, J. There are a number of grounds for reversal assigned in this case, but a careful examination of them leads us to conclude that there is but a single one that has substance. It is clear, under the proof, that the plaintiff could not have been nonsuited, nor a verdict directed for the defendant, upon the testimony.

There were no reversible errors in the rulings of the court upon the admissions of testimony excepted to, nor in the charge of the court, except in one respect, with relation to the allowance of damages for loss of profits in the business of the plaintiff. Exception is taken to the refusal of the court to charge the defendant's second request. That was as follows: "As there is no definite proof of the amount of the loss of profits sustained by the plaintiff in his business, no damages can be allowed for his loss of profits." And exception was also taken to what the court did say upon the question of the right of recovery by the plaintiff for loss of profits, and the leaving to the jury of the question whether, under the evidence, the plaintiff was making any profits from his business.

We think the second request should have been charged in this case in lieu of what the court did charge. There was no proof in the cause which would justify the jury in assessing any damages to the plaintiff for loss of profits. The only testimony given on the subject was that of the plaintiff himself, and that amounted to nothing more than a mere statement that he took in, in his business, from $1,000 to $1,100 per annum. This was proof only of the gross amount of his business. His books were not produced, nor was there given by him any estimate of the expenses incident to the conducting of his business, or of the proportion of the expenses to the gross income. To justify a finding of loss of profits as a part of the verdict in a cause, the proof must be such as will show the jury with reasonable certainty what the profits alleged to have been lost would have been, but for the injury to the plaintiff. Profits must be proved. They cannot be estimated by the jury without data to justify their finding. East Jersey Water Co. v. Bigelow, 60 N. J. Law, 201, 38 Atl. 631. There being no proof of loss of profits in the business of the plaintiff which the jury could, under the proof, arrive at with reasonable certainty, it was error for the trial judge to submit the question of this class of damages to the jury, and he should have charged as requested.

For this error, and this alone, the judgment is reversed.

NEW JERSEY SUBURBAN WATER CO.
et al. v. TOWN OF HARRISON.

SAME v. MAYOR, ETC., OF BOROUGH OF EAST NEWARK.

(Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey.
Nov. 20, 1905.)

WATERS — LIABILITY OF CITIES — COMPENSATION FOR SUPPLY.

Each of the municipalities, which are defendants below, had, before these actions, been possessed of mains and pipes for a supply of water for public purposes, and for distribution to private consumers for pay, and each had been receiving and using water transmitted through a pipe claimed by Jersey City, and had made compensation to Jersey City for water so supplied, but without express contract. Defendants in error gave notice to each municipality that they had acquired the right to water thus supplied, and should claim compensation therefor in the future. Jersey City also claimed the right to the water and compensation therefor. Each municipality continued to receive and distribute the water, and to collect pay from consumers. Each filed a bill of interpleader against the respective claimants, and afterward these actions at law were brought to recover compensation for the water so received and used.

Held that, although there was during the period covered by the actions no express contract between plaintiffs and defendants, an obligation to make compensation to the owners of the water will be implied from its reception and the conduct of the municipality receiving it.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Supreme Court.

Action by the New Jersey Suburban Water Company and the New York & New Jersey Water Company against the town of Harrison and the mayor and council of the borough of East Newark. Judgments for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Michael T. Barrett, Edward Kenny, and George L. Record, for plaintiffs in error. Collins & Corbin, for defendants in error.

MAGIE, Ch. The judgments brought before us by these writs of error were entered in two separate actions, involving like questions. The cases have been argued together, and may be disposed of by the same opinion. The actions were for the recovery of compensation for water delivered to the municipalities, which are the plaintiffs in error, for public purposes, and for distribution to the inhabitants thereof. The declarations contained only the common counts, and the general issue was pleaded in each case. The issues were tried together by a justice of the Supreme Court sitting without a jury. The findings of fact were that plaintiffs below had furnished to each of the municipalities, during the periods respectively covered by the actions, certain quantities of water; that such water had been delivered to the municipalities by transmission from the point at which plaintiffs below received it, through a pipe originally laid by the city of Jersey in a public street of the township of Kearny, to the mains and pipes of each municipality; that the water had been received by each municipality and used for public purposes and also distributed to private customers at specified rates, which each municipality had collected, or was in process of enforcing and collecting; that moneys collected from such rates went into the municipal treasuries, and were used in maintaining the respective water systems, and any surplus was used for general municipal purposes; that the water which was thus furnished to each municipality was the property of plaintiffs below, and its reasonable value as furnished was such as made up the respective amounts found to be due, and upon which the judgments were entered. It was also found that each municipality had filed in the Court of Chancery a bill of interpleader against the city of Jersey City and the plaintiffs below, whereby each municipality admitted its liability for the water supplied, but set up that compensation for the same had been claimed by the city of Jersey City, and also by the plaintiffs below, and that it was unable to determine to which one it was indebted.

There was evidence on which the trial justice could reach these conclusions of fact, and they are not open to review on these writs of error. The exceptions and assignments of error are conceived by counsel to raise two questions of law, which will be considered.

It is first urged that the use of the pipe laid in the township of Kearny, and claimed to be owned by the city of Jersey City, divested the water companies of any right to claim compensation for the water transmitted thereby. It is unnecessary to say more respecting this claim than that the unauthorized use of the vehicle for the transmission of water could not deprive the owner of the water of his property therein. He might be required to pay for the use of the vehicle, or possibly be compelled to cease its use. But so long as he had, in fact, transmitted the water and delivered it to persons who accepted it, so long he would be entitled to recover on a quantum meruit in all ordinary cases. This view was taken, and formed the ground of decision in New Jersey Suburban Water Co. v. Harrison.

It is next, however, insisted that a municipality cannot be held for such compensation, except by an express contract, which, it is conceded, had not been made at the time this water was furnished. Such a contract was afterward made, but these suits are for water furnished before. The insistence is that, where a municipality is entitled to make a contract, it must be an express contract, and none will be implied from the mere acceptance and use of materials or supplies. This contention is mainly supported in the argument on the authority of the case of Swackhammer v. Hackettstown, 37 N. J. Law, 191, and Car Spring and Rubber Co. v. Jersey City, 64 N. J. Law, 544, 46 Atl. 649. The first of these cases was decided in the Supreme Court, and Chief Justice Beasley, speaking for the court, held that a municipality having powers of local government and improvement, with power to raise money by tax for such purposes, possessed no implied power to borrow money. It having appeared in that case that money thus illegally borrowed had, in fact, been used for legitimate purposes of the municipality, and it being argued thereon that the law, on general principles, would compel repayment, the Chief Justice disposed of the argument by declaring that to admit the application of such principles to an unauthorized municipal loan would render the doctrine he had laid down of little value, or, as he sententiously put it, "although repudiated in the abstract, it would be ratified in the concrete." The other case was in this court. It presented the question of the liability of a municipality for three separate bills for supplies ordered by employees and used by the city. The power to order such supplies and to contract for their payment was in a board. That board had formally ordered payment of one of the bills, and it was held by this court that thereby the board had adopted the act of the subordinates and ratified it, and recognized an enforceable contract. But it was further held that the other bills which had arisen from the ordering of subordinates without the knowledge of the board, and which had never been ratified or ordered paid, were not enforceable claims against the city, on the ground that there was no acceptance by the authority authorized to bind the city. There was an intimation, unnecessary to the decision, that such an obligation might not arise, even if the supplies in question had been ordered by the subordinates and used, with a knowledge of the board, without some formal action on its part.

Whether the doctrine thus intimated will be sustained when a case for its application arises need not be determined. The case now under consideration presents the counterpart of the bill for supplies furnished and used, for which Jersey City was held liable, because the board which had the power to order and contract for such supplies had recognized the transaction and ratified it by ordering payment for charges therefor. Here the municipalities in question had authority to contract for water for public and private purposes, and had for years trafficked in water obtained by contracts, and distributed it to customers for pay. While a supply was being furnished to them without any express contract, a contest arose as to the right to the water furnished and the compensation therefor. It was claimed both by Jersey City and by the water companies. As a great public injury would follow the rejection of the water while the controversy was being settled, it was allowed to flow, and each municipality continued to receive and to collect pay therefor which it put into its municipal treasury. These corporate acts of themselves justify the inference of ratification, and, when coupled with the further act of recognizing the liability to pay and invoking the aid of the court by a bill of interpleader, a case of ratification is plainly made out, and the finding for plaintiffs below is not open to the objection presented on this subject.

These are the only questions requiring consideration; and, both being solved in favor of plaintiffs below, the judgments under review are affirmed.

DIXON, J. This case was tried without a jury and upon a finding of many facts and rulings upon several questions of law. The only exception appearing in the record is "to the foregoing finding and ruling the defendant prays exception, and it is allowed accordingly." So general an exception presents no question for review on error. Mills v. Mott, 59 N. J. Law, 15, 34 Atl. 947; Weger v. Delran, 61 N. J. Law, 224, 39 Atl. 730.

I therefore concur in affirming the judgment.

CURTICE v. DIXON.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire. Merri-mack. Nov. 7, 1905.)

JURY—RIGHT TO TRIAL BY JURY—EQUITABLE RELIEF.

A suit for the cancellation of a written contract by which it was claimed that defendant, through fraud and imposition, had obtained property from plaintiff's intestate, was within the exclusive jurisdiction of equity; and hence there was no absolute right to a trial by jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 31, Cent. Dig. Jury, §§ 47, 71.]

Transferred from Superior Court.

Suit by Grosvenor A. Curtice, as administrator, against Ida A. Dixon. A motion for the framing of issues for a trial by jury was denied, and the cause transferred to the Supreme Court on defendant's exception. Exception overruled.

Bill in equity, praying for a cancellation of a written contract by which it is alleged the defendant obtained a large amount of property through fraud and imposition practiced by her upon the plaintiff's intestate, who was of unsound mind by reason of age and infirmity. The bill also asks for an accounting. The defendant filed an answer denying the allegation of fraud and imposition, and moved that issues be framed for a trial by jury.

Streeter & Hollis and Matthews & Sawyer, for plaintiff. Martin & Howe and Sargent, Remick & Niles, for defendant.

WALKER, J. The defendant's motion raises the question whether, upon the cause of action alleged in the plaintiff's bill, she has a constitutional right to a trial by jury. It is admitted in the argument in support of the motion that if the subject-matter of the suit or the peculiar relief sought, as disclosed in the bill, is within the exclusive jurisdiction of equity, a jury trial cannot be had as a matter of substantive right; but it is urged that, if the jurisdiction in these respects is concurrent with that at law, issues of fact must be framed for trial by jury upon motion. But it does not appear to be necessary to decide this somewhat novel question, for there can be little doubt that the plaintiff has stated a case falling within the exclusive cognizance of equity.

Briefly stated, the allegations are that the defendant, by means of fraud and undue influence practiced upon the deceased, who was by reason of age mentally incapacitated from doing business, induced him to execute a written contract with her, by virtue of which she obtained from him a large sum of money, and a bankbook representing several thousand dollars. It is also alleged that by the same means she obtained from him a deed of certain real estate. Assuming the truth of these allegations, it would follow that the beneficial title to the property referred to remained in the deceased, and that the defendant held the same during his lifetime upon a constructive trust for his benefit, and since his decease for the use of his estate. Upon such a state of facts it is the peculiar province of equity to safeguard the rights of the defrauded party, upon the ground that no contract was in fact made, and that the possession of the property by the guilty party creates a trust by legal implication for the benefit of the unfortunate owner. "Equity watches with jealous care every attempt to deal with persons of unsound mind, and when, from the nature of the transaction, there is not evidence of entire good faith, or the undertaking is not seen to be just in itself, or for their benefit, it is set aside or made subservient to their just rights and interests."

* * * The same doctrine has been applied to persons of weak understanding, though not non compos strictly, yet unable to guard themselves against imposition, or to resist importunity or undue influence." Roberts v. Barker, 63 N. H. 332, 334. If, as is claimed, the defendant is holding property under and by virtue of the written contract, obtained by her by fraudulently taking advantage of the mental weakness of the deceased, equity may require the cancellation and surrender of the document and an accounting. The mere fact that an action at law for damages occasioned by the fraud might be maintained does not deprive equity of its otherwise exclusive jurisdiction. "Even when the controversy is concerning pecuniary claims and obligations, and the final relief is wholly pecuniary, the equitable remedies are administered by regarding the subject-matter as a specific fund, and by adjudging such fund to its single owner." 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 170. See, also, Id. §§ 138, 140, note 1; 1 Per. Tr. § 166. It is plain from the case presented in the bill that the defendant has no constitutional right to have issues framed for trial by a jury. State v. Saunders, 66 N. H. 39, 25 Atl. 583, 18 L. R. A. 646; Parker v. Simpson, 180 Mass. 334, 355, 62 N. E. 401. Whether some of the issues presented by the bill and answer are properly triable by a jury may not be open to serious doubt (State v. Saunders, supra), but the absolute right to such a trial, as insisted upon by the defendant, does not exist.

Exception overruled. All concurred.

LAMB v. KING.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire. Cheshire.
Nov. 7, 1905.)

SALES—CONDITIONAL SALES—FILING—REGISTRATION.

Under Pub. St. 1901, p. 62, c. 2, § 2, providing that in the construction of statutes words and phrases shall be construed according to the common and approved usage of language, pianos are "household goods," within the meaning of Pub. St. 1901, p. 448, c. 140, § 28, providing that no lien reserved on personal property sold conditionally, and passing into the hands of the purchaser, "except a lien upon household goods," shall be valid against attaching creditors or subsequent purchasers without notice, unless the seller takes and records a memorandum witnessing the lien, etc.

Exceptions from Superior Court.

Replevin by Joseph H. Lamb against William W. King. There was a verdict for defendant, and plaintiff excepted. Exception sustained.

Replevin for a piano. Trial before Peaslee, J., at the October term, 1904, of the superior court, and verdict for the defendant. The piano was sold conditionally by the plaintiff to one Brown by a contract made in this state and not recorded. The defendant justified under an attachment by creditors of the vendee. The plaintiff excepted to the verdict, upon the ground that the piano belonged to the class of property excepted from the statutory provision requiring a record of the memoranda of conditional sales.

Hosea W. Brigham, for plaintiff. Edalbert J. Temple, for defendant.

CHASE, J. By section 23, c. 140, p. 448, Pub. St. 1901, "no lien reserved on personal property sold conditionally and passing into the hands of the conditional purchaser, except a lien upon household goods created by a lease thereof, containing an option in favor of the lessee to purchase the same at a time specified, shall be valid against attaching creditors, or subsequent purchasers, without notice, unless the vendor of such property takes a written memorandum, signed by the purchaser, witnessing the lien, the sum due thereon, and containing an affidavit as provided in the following section, and causes such memorandum to be recorded in the town clerk's office of the town," etc.

The sole question discussed by counsel and considered by the court is whether a piano is "household goods," within the meaning of this statute; a question that seems to have been suggested, but not considered, in Batchelder v. Sanborn, 66 N. H. 192, 22 Atl. 535. McNally v. Bailey, 65 N. H. 208, 18 Atl. 745, was decided in June, 1889, before the exception of household goods from the operation of the statute went into effect, namely, August 16, 1889. Laws 1889, p. 86, c. 69. Pianos are movable effects or personal chattels—"goods"—and if in use in a family, they pertain to the house and family, and so continue to be within the signification of the word "goods" when its meaning is qualified by the adjective "household." In such case they are "household goods," "according to the common and approved usage of the language." Pub. St. 1901, p. 62, c. 2, § 2; Webst. Dict.; Alsop v. Jordan, 69 Tex. 300, 6 S. W. 831, 5 Am. St. Rep. 53. There are no words in the statute limiting the meaning of these words excepting those relating to the manner of creating the lien referred to, and they afford no aid in the present inquiry. There is no enumeration of articles in connection with the general terms, from which, as in some cases (Tanner v. Billings, 18 Wis. 175, 86 Am. Dec. 755, and Sumner v. Blakslee, 59 N. H. 242, 47 Am. Rep. 196), the intended meaning of the general terms will appear by an application of the rule of alieni generis. There is nothing whatever in the statute having a tendency to modify the ordinary signification of these words, excepting as above stated. The words have not acquired a "peculiar and appropriate meaning in law." They have been construed differently, according to the supposed intent of the user. In the construction of wills and contracts, "household furniture" (a phrase certainly no broader in meaning than "household goods") has been held to describe articles that are in the house for the common use of the household or for ornament, and that are not consumed in the using; such as china, plate, pictures, pianos, etc. Sumner v. Blakslee, 59 N. H. 242, 47 Am. Rep. 196; Bunn v. Winthrop, 1 Johns. Ch. 329; Richardson v. Hall, 124 Mass. 228; Chase v. Stockett, 72 Md. 235, 19 Atl. 761. See, also, Von Storch v. Winslow, 13 R. I. 23, 43 Am. Rep. 10. In the construction of statutes exempting property from attachment, there has been a tendency to give a narrower interpretation to the terms. In cases of this kind, where the question has arisen, the statutes construed contained material qualifications of the general phrase; as in Dunlap v. Edgerton, 80 Vt. 224, the exemption was of "such . . . articles of household furniture as may be necessary for upholding life," and in Kehl v. Dunn, 102 Mich. 581, 61 N. W. 71, 47 Am. St. Rep. 561, it was of "all household goods, furniture, and utensils not exceeding in value $250." See, also, Towns v. Pratt, 33 N. H. 345, 66 Am. Dec. 726.

No support is found in the history of the statute for a narrow interpretation of the phrase. An oral contract for the conditional sale of goods and chattles was formerly valid by the common law of the state. Weeks v. Pike, 60 N. H. 447. The danger of a person receiving undue credit from the appearance of ownership of personal property arising from possession, and the facility for the commission of fraud afforded by oral agreements respecting title, which are necessarily more or less secret, are supposed to have induced the passage of the act of 1885 (Laws 1885, p. 245, c. 30), the forerunner of the present statute. Churchill v. Demeritt, 71 N. H. 110, 111, 51 Atl. 254. At first the statute applied to all personal property sold conditionally and passing into the possession of the purchaser; but in 1889 a provision was introduced by which it was not to apply "to leases of household goods containing an option to purchase at a specified time." Laws 1889, p. 86, c. 69. This provision is incorporated into the present statute in the exception under consideration. By it the common law of the state was restored, so far as leases of household goods containing an option for purchase are concerned. Whatever may have been the reasons for the passage originally, it must be presumed that they were overcome or neutralized by reasons favoring the withdrawal of household goods from its operation. Attention has not been called to any circumstance in existence at the time of the passage of the act of 1889, and inducing its passage, which has a tendency to qualify the natural signification of its terms. A comparison of the terms of this statute with those of the statute exempting personal property from attachment and levy conclusively shows that the intention was to make the former statute broader than the latter. In the exemption statute certain articles of household goods are specified, such as beds, bedsteads, a cook stove, etc., and, in addition thereto, household furniture to the value of one hundred dollars is exempted. Pub. St. 1901, p. 701, c. 220, § 2. In the lien statute general words are used without any qualification or limitation. In fact, the comparison has a tendency to prove an intention to have the terms used in the latter statute understood in their broadest sense. If this had not been the intention, it seems highly probable that the limitations would have been fully and specifically stated, as they are in the exemption statute. Moreover, if there had been understood to be a relation between the two statutes, it would seem that contracts for the conditional sale of other chattels mentioned in the exemption statute—tools of a person's occupation, a hog, a cow, a yoke of oxen, etc.—would have been released from the operation of the lien statute.

No evidence has been pointed out by counsel or found by the court which shows, or tends to show, that the words "household goods" were used otherwise than in their broadest sense. Accordingly, it is held that the piano in question, if kept for use in the defendant's family, was an article of "household goods" within the meaning of the statute, and consequently was excepted from its operation. If the piano was not kept for such use, it would not be within the exception of the statute. The wording of the case and the interpretation given to it by counsel in their briefs seem to indicate that this question of fact was decided in favor of the plaintiff. If this is the correct interpretation of the case, the verdict should have been in his favor. The case being so understood, the order is:

Exception sustained; verdict set aside. All concurred.

WHITE et al. v. POOLE et al.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire. Grafton. Nov. 7, 1905.)

1. EQUITY—PLEADING—BILL—AMENDMENT.

A bill for the specific performance of an oral contract to convey land, which does not allege the contract with sufficient definiteness, may be amended so as to make it sufficiently definite to enable a court of equity to grant relief.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 19, Cent. Dig. Equity, §§ 552, 553; vol. 44, Cent. Dig. Specific Performance, § 375.]

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER—CONTRACTS TO CONVEY LAND—TIME OF PERFORMANCE.

Where in an agreement to convey land no time is fixed in which the conveyance is to be made, the grantor has a reasonable time in which to make it.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 48, Cent. Dig. Vendor and Purchaser, §§ 118-121.]

3. SAME—CONSIDERATION—SUFFICIENCY.

A promise to convey land in consideration of the grantee promising to remain in a certain city, and to abandon her purpose to go to a foreign country and to induce her husband to do likewise, is supported by sufficiently definite consideration; the grantee and her husband being required to remain in such city for a reasonable time having reference to the nature of the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 11, Cent. Dig. Contracts, §§ 223, 231; vol. 48, Cent. Dig. Vendor and Purchaser, § 14.]

4. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—PAROL CONTRACT—PART PERFORMANCE.

Where a person was induced by another's oral promise to convey land to him to enter into possession of the land, to expend large sums in the way of improvements thereon, and to continue in the occupation thereof, managing and controlling the same as his own, there was such performance as to withdraw the case from the operation of the statute of frauds, and authorize the specific performance of the promise.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 44, Cent. Dig. Specific Performance, §§ 128-134.]

Exceptions from Superior Court; Wallace, Chief Judge.

Writ of entry by one White and another, executors of William H. White, against Annie L. Poole and another, in which defendant Annie L. Poole filed a bill for the specific performance of an oral agreement to convey. A demurrer to the bill was overruled, subject to plaintiffs' exception. Exception overruled.

The bill alleges that the plaintiffs' testator, William H. White, promised the defendant that, if she would abandon her purpose of going to Cuba, remain in Hanover, and induce her husband to do the same, he would build and give to her a house in Hanover; that in consideration of this promise, and in reliance thereon, the defendant and her husband abandoned their purpose of going to Cuba, remained in Hanover, and continued there to the date of the filing of the bill; that White, in pursuance of the agreement, selected a lot satisfactory to her, paid for it, and took the deed in his own name, but in trust for the defendant, giving as a reason his desire to transfer the complete property to her when he had built a house thereon; that shortly afterward White erected upon the lot a house, which was completed in 1900, and upon its completion the defendant, in pursuance of the contract, moved into the house, and has ever since occupied it, and with the knowledge and assent of White has regarded and treated it as her property, and has caused to be expended thereon $500 in improvements and repairs; and that at the time of his death in 1903 White was arranging to convey the property to her.

Henry F. Hollis and Prescott F. Hall, for plaintiffs. Smith & Smith and Edward A. Lane, for defendants.

BINGHAM, J. The questions in this case arise on the plaintiffs' demurrer to a bill in equity filed as an answer to the writ of entry brought by the plaintiffs against the defendant to recover the possession of certain real estate in Hanover. The plaintiffs contend that the defendant is not entitled to the relief prayed for in the bill for the reason that the terms of the contract there set out are not sufficiently definite to enable a court of equity to decree specific performance, and that their demurrer should have been sustained. They say that, according to the allegations of the bill, the contract between the testator and the defendant was simply that he should build and give her a house in Hanover, without reference to any particular lot of land upon which the house was to be built. But we think the fair meaning of the bill is that the defendant made a parol contract with the testator, by which he was to convey to the defendant the land claimed in the writ of entry. If such contract is not alleged with sufficient definiteness, the defendant asks leave to amend the bill. Such amendment may be made, and will render unnecessary the consideration of this objection.

No time being fixed within which the testator was to give a deed of the property, he was entitled to a reasonable time in which to do so. Brown v. Prescott, 63 N. H. 61, 62; Kidder v. Flanders, 73 N. H. 345, 61 Atl. 675. The consideration to be given by the defendant seems definite enough. It was that she should abandon her present purpose of going to Cuba, and remain in Hanover, and that she should induce her husband to do the same. The time that they were to remain in Hanover would be a reasonable time, having reference to the nature of the contract.

It is alleged in the bill that the defendant, induced by the testator's promise, entered into the possession of the property, expended large sums in the way of improvements, and has continued in the occupation of the same to the present time, managing and controlling it as her own. These allegations are sufficient to withdraw the case from the operation of the statute of frauds. Tilton v. Tilton, 9 N. H. 385, 390; Seavey v. Drake, 62 N. H. 393; Brown v. Prescott, 63 N. H. 61; Stillings v. Stillings, 67 N. H. 584, 42 Atl. 271.

Exception overruled. All concurred.

STANLEY v. PAYNE.

(Supreme Court of Vermont. Rutland. Dec. 7, 1905.)

ASSAULT AND BATTERY—RE-TAKING POSSESSION OF PROPERTY—JUSTIFICATION.

Where defendant, on the expiration of his lease of a farm, obtained the landlord's permission to leave a certain box in the barn, and thereafter defendant visited the farm and told the then tenant that the box was his and that he intended to take it, it was not sufficient to place the tenant in the attitude of a wrongdoer and justify defendant in the use of force and violence to get possession of his box.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 4, Cent. Dig. Assault and Battery, §§ 13-15.]

Rowell, C. J., dissenting.

Exceptions from Rutland County Court; Munson, Judge.

Action by John D. Stanley against J. R. Payne. Judgment in favor of plaintiff, and defendant brings exceptions. Affirmed.

Argued before ROWELL, C. J., and TYLER, START, WATSON, HASELTON, and POWERS, JJ.

E. H. O'Brien, for plaintiff. Butler & Moloney, for defendant.

TYLER, J. Trespass for assault and battery. Pleas, general issue, self-defense, and defense of property. Replication, de injuria.

The defendant had been a tenant of a certain farm, and it appeared that prior to April, 1, 1902, when his term expired, he and one Pratt, the owner of the farm, agreed that a certain grain box that belonged to the defendant should remain in the barn during that spring, and that the defendant might remove it at any time after that season. The plaintiff, who succeeded the defendant as tenant, knew nothing of this agreement, nor of the defendant's ownership of the box, beside what the defendant told him just before the assault. In September, 1902, the defendant drove to the farm for his box, when an affray took place between him and the plaintiff, of which they were the only witnesses, and their testimony concerning it materially differed. The plaintiff testified that the defendant drove up and stopped in front of the barn doors and said there was a box in the barn that belonged to him, and that he was going in to get it; that the plaintiff told him not to go into the barn because the plaintiff did not know whether the box belonged to the defendant or to Pratt; that, when Pratt came up, the plaintiff would inquire, and, if the box belonged to the defendant, the plaintiff would draw it down to him and they would have no trouble; that the defendant said, with an oath, that he should go into the barn; that the plaintiff went into the barn and the defendant followed; that the plaintiff then told the defendant to leave the box where it was until Pratt came in, and, if it was the defendant's, he should have it; that the defendant took hold of the box and started to draw it towards the barn door, and at the same time the plaintiff seized hold of the opposite side of it and pulled it backwards; that the defendant pulled it along, and, as he pulled it, a little piece of it came off, which the defendant threw down and again took hold of the box; that the defendant pulled it along two-thirds of the way across the barn floor, when the plaintiff told the defendant that he was not going to pull it any further, but the defendant kept pulling it along, and the plaintiff said, "Now leave it alone," and then the defendant knocked him down and jumped upon him. The defendant testified that upon coming into the barn he told the plaintiff that the box was his, that he had a right to it and that he proposed to take it, whereupon the plaintiff pulled it back and broke a board off of it, and that the defendant continued to draw it toward the door; that the plaintiff then assaulted him, seizing him by the neck and shoulder, and that he resisted this assault, seizing the plaintiff and throwing him down upon the floor of the barn, and holding him there a short time, whereupon the plaintiff said he would cease fighting; and that the defendant then took the box and carried it home.

The defendant requested the court to charge as follows: "If the jury find that the box was the property of the defendant, and that it was left on the premises of Pratt for his accommodation, with the understanding and agreement that the defendant could go there and get it whenever he saw fit to do so, then he had the right to go into the barn and take it, and this would be so, notwithstanding any protest or notice on the part of the plaintiff not to do so." The court charged that neither the defendant's ownership of the box nor the plaintiff's occupancy of the barn was the controlling fact in the case; that a man who owned personal property, and was in possession of it, might justify an assault to maintain his possession, but, if the possession were in another person the owner could not justify an assault upon that person to enable the owner to obtain the possession. A more specific instruction was: "The box, being in the barn which was in the occupancy of the plaintiff, was in the plaintiff's possession to start with, and the defendant could not justify an assault to take it out of that possession, thus arising from the fact that it was in the barn which was in the plaintiff's occupancy. But if the defendant entered the barn without opposition or resistance on the part of the plaintiff, and, so being in the barn, obtained complete manual possession and control of the box without committing any assault upon the plaintiff, the box would then be in the possession of the defendant, although still within the plaintiff's barn, and the defendant could then justify an assault upon the plaintiff to keep possession of it, if the plaintiff then undertook to take it away from him." Further, that: "If the defendant has failed to make out his justification, then the plaintiff will be entitled to a verdict because of the fact, conceded by the defendant, that he laid hands upon the plaintiff. The real question is whether he was justified in doing this because of the previous assault of the plaintiff, or for the protection of the personal property in his possession."

The defendant contends that there was error in the court's omission to charge as requested, and in the charge as given. The decisions upon the question here presented are somewhat at variance. In the notes to Barnes v. Martin, 82 Am. Dec. 670, Mr. Freeman says: "Whether the owner of personal property or the one entitled to its possession has the right under any or all circumstances to retake it, if it is wrongfully taken or detained from him, is an interesting question and one of some practical importance; but, strange to say, it is one to which the law as yet gives no certain answer." It is apparent, however, that many of the decisions differ from each other only in applying the rules of law to the circumstances of given cases. Yale v. Seely et al., 15 Vt. 221, supports the defendant's contention. There the defendants went to the plaintiff's land with teams for the purpose of drawing away a quantity of poles lying upon the land. Both parties claimed to own the poles, but the decision went upon the ground that the defendants in fact owned them; and it was held that they had a legal right to enter upon the plaintiff's land to remove their property, and that, if the plaintiff attempted to hinder them in the enjoyment of the right, the defendants were justified in using as much force as was necessary to overcome the hinderance. Sterling v. Warden, 51 N. H. 217, 12 Am. Rep. 80, is like Yale v. Seely in its facts, and sustains the same doctrine.

The defendant also claims Richardson v. Anthony, 12 Vt. 273, as an authority. In that case the defendant's cattle were in the plaintiff's close without the fault of either party. The plaintiff did not claim to hold them as estrays, and, as the court said, he did not and could not have owned them; yet he forbade the defendant breaking the close to get them, and claimed to own them himself. Held, that the defendant was justified in breaking the close and in taking his property, but no force was used. Bennett, J. dissented, and Williams, C. J., remarked in the opinion that "the right of the owner of personal chattels to enter on the possession of another to reclaim property may depend entirely on the manner in which the possession was obtained." Whether the court would have justified the defendant in using all necessary force to overcome the plaintiff's resistance, if he had resisted, or held that the defendant should have resorted to an action at law, is a matter of conjecture. This question was before the court in Kirby v. Foster, 17 R. I. 437, 22 Atl. 1111, 14 L. R. A. 317, and Stiness, J., said: "Unquestionably, if one takes another's property from his possession without right and against his will, the owner or person in charge may protect his possession or retake the property by the use of necessary force. He is not bound to stand by and submit to wrongful dispossession or larceny when he can stop it, and he is not guilty of assault, in thus defending his right, by using force to prevent his property from being carried away. But this right of defense and recapture involves two things: First, possession by the owner; and, second, a purely wrongful taking or conversion without a claim of right. If one has intrusted his property to another who afterwards honestly, though erroneously, claims it as his own, the owner has no right to retake it by personal force. If he has, the actions of replevin and trover in many cases are of little use. The law does not permit parties to take the settlement of conflicting claims into their own hands. It gives the right of defense, but not of redress. The circumstances may be exasperating. The remedy at law may seem to be inadequate, but still the injured party cannot be arbiter of his own claim. Public order and the public peace are of greater consequence than a private right or an occasional hardship. Inadequacy of remedy is of frequent occurrence, but it cannot find its complement in personal violence."

The general rule is that a right of property merely, not joined with the possession, will not justify the owner in committing an assault and battery upon the person in possession for the purpose of regaining possession, although the possession is wrongfully withheld. Bliss v. Johnson, 73 N. Y. 529; Barnes v. Martin, 15 Wis. 240, 82 Am. Dec. 670. It was also held, in Churchill v. Hulbert, 110 Mass. 42, 14 Am. Rep. 578, that, though the defendant had an irrevocable license from the plaintiff to enter upon his land and remove certain personal property that belonged to the defendant, yet, if the plaintiff resisted the entry, under a claim that the defendant had already removed all the property that was his, he had no right to use personal violence to overpower the plaintiff's resistance and enforce his claim. In Hodgeden v. Hubbard, 18 Vt. 504, 46 Am. Dec. 167, the plaintiff bought a stove of the defendant through false and fraudulent representations as to his solvency and means of paying for it. Held, that he acquired no right, either of property or possession, in the stove, and that the owner was justified in pursuing him and retaking the property in the highway, and in using as much force as was necessary in overcoming the purchaser's resistance. In Johnson v. Perry, 56 Vt. 703, 48 Am. Rep. 826, where the plaintiff went into the defendant's millyard and, without right or license, loaded the defendant's slabs upon the plaintiff's sled, it was held that the defendant might use such force as was necessary to retake his property. Neither of these cases is authority for the defendant, for in each the taking was wrongful. In the first trial of Johnson v. Perry both parties claimed to own the wood, but the defendant admitted that the plaintiff had peaceably entered his, the defendant's premises, and got possession of it by loading it upon his sled. This court correctly held in that case (54 Vt. 459) that, if the slabs were the plaintiff's, he, having possession of them, "had the right to maintain that possession against the defendant and every one else." Therefore that decision is not in point for the defendant. In both opinions in Johnson v. Perry the court referred to Yale v. Seely and Richardson v. Anthony as authorities, which, we think, was inadvertence, for the rule in these cases was applied to different facts from those that appeared in Johnson v. Perry, and went beyond what was necessary for the decision of that case. Judge Redfield, in his opinion in Dustin v. Cowdry, 23 Vt. 631, evidently doubted the soundness of the doctrine laid down in the two early cases above cited.

In the present case the plaintiff had not wrongfully taken nor wrongfully withheld the defendant's property when the latter undertook to recover it. The case does not even show a demand for it by the defendant and a refusal by the plaintiff to deliver it, but a declaration by the defendant that the box was his and that he should take it, which was not sufficient to place the plaintiff in the attitude of a wrongdoer, and justify the defendant in the use of force and violence to get possession of the chattel. In the opinion of a majority of the court the rule stated in the Rhode Island case should be applied to the facts in the case at bar, rather than the rule in Yale v. Seely. The request to charge was properly denied, and the charge as given was without error. Yale v. Seely, so far as it conflicts with the views herein expressed, is no longer to be regarded as authority upon this subject.

Judgment affirmed.

ROWELL, C. J., dissents.

GERRY et al. v. AMERICAN EXP. CO.
(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. Dec. 1, 1905.)

1. CARRIERS—CONTRACT—LIMITED LIABILITY THEREUNDER.

A common carrier may limit his responsibility for property intrusted to him by a notice containing reasonable and suitable restrictions, if brought home to the owner of the goods delivered for transportation, and assented to clearly and unequivocally by him, if it also appears that the terms on which the carrier proposed to carry the goods were adopted as the contract between the parties, according to which the service of the carrier was to be rendered.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Carriers, §§ 675, 691.]

2. SAME—RECEIPTS FOR FREIGHT.

In the case at bar the defendant furnished the plaintiffs a book of blank receipts, in which the plaintiffs entered their shipments. At the top of each sheet of these receipts there was printed the following: "The property hereinafter described to be forwarded subject to the terms and conditions of the company's regular form of receipts printed on the inside cover of this book." Below this were entered the date, amount, and destination of each shipment, and receipted by the defendant's agent when the goods were taken by him. On the inside cover was a notice to shippers, not involved in this case, and at the bottom, in larger type, the following: "The liability of this company is limited to $50, at which sum the property is hereby valued, unless the just and true value is stated in this receipt." In the receipt for the shipment of the goods by the plaintiff in this suit no value of the goods was stated. The goods injured, however, were of a much greater value than $50, and the loss by reason of the injury was more than $50. The plaintiffs claimed that they did not read the terms and conditions in the shipping book given them by the defendant.

Held, that the receipt in this case incorporated into it the limitation of liability contained in the conditions printed in the books of receipts used by the plaintiffs. Upon that receipt, and under its conditions, the defendant received the goods, and upon it the plaintiffs delivered the goods. This constituted the contract between the parties, and, in the absence of fraud or misrepresentation, the plaintiffs are bound by its expressed terms. They cannot be permitted to say that, by their own inattention, they did not read the terms and conditions, and thereby impose upon the defendant a greater value than that expressed in the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Carriers, §§ 687-692.]

3. TRIAL—DIRECTING VERDICT.

Further held, that the ruling of the presiding justice in directing a verdict for the plaintiffs based upon the limited liability of the defendant was correct.

(Official.)

Exceptions from Supreme Judicial Court, Penobscot County.

Action by Freeland J. Gerry and others against the American Express Company. Verdict for plaintiffs for less than the amount claimed, and they except. Exceptions overruled.

Argued before WISWELL, C. J., and EMERY, STROUT, SAVAGE, and PEABODY, JJ.

Calvin W. Brown, for plaintiffs. C. F. Woodard, for defendant.

STROUT, J. Plaintiffs shipped by defendant company 61 cans of cream from Belfast to Boston. Before delivery it became frozen and was injured, and plaintiffs claim damages therefor. Defendant admits a limited liability only, and on the 18th day of October, 1904, tendered plaintiffs $55 in full for its liability, and brought the amount into court. Plaintiffs refused to accept it, and claims to recover the value of the cream, stated to be $457.50, less amount realized from the butter made therefrom, which left a net loss of $114.18, which plaintiffs seek to recover in this action.

Plaintiffs were presented by defendant with a book of blank receipts, in which plaintiffs entered their shipments. At the top of each sheet of these receipts there was printed, "The property hereinafter described to be forwarded subject to the terms and conditions of the company's regular form of receipt printed on inside cover of this book." Below this were entered the date, amount, and destination of each shipment, and receipted by defendant's agent when the goods were taken by him. Pasted on the inside cover of the book was a notice to shippers not involved here, and at the bottom, in larger type, the following: "The liability of this company is limited to $50, at which sum the property is hereby valued; unless the just and true value is stated in this receipt." In the receipt for the shipment of this cream no value was stated. Defense claims that plaintiffs are bound by this limitation. The presiding justice ordered a verdict for plaintiffs for $52.25, that being for $50 and interest thereon from the date of shipment to the date of the tender. To this ruling exception was taken. There is also the general motion for a new trial.

It is well settled that a common carrier may "limit his responsibility for property intrusted to him by a notice containing reasonable and suitable restrictions, if brought home to the owner of goods delivered for transportation, and assented to clearly and unequivocally by him," and if it appears "that the terms on which the carrier proposed to carry the goods were adopted as the contract between the parties, according to which the service of the carrier was to be rendered." Fillebrown v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co., 55 Me. 468, 92 Am. Dec. 606. The limitation in defendant's receipts in this case cannot be considered unreasonable. The rate for transportation and the care to be bestowed upon them depends very largely upon their value, and the carrier may well require the value to be stated, if he is to be held responsible to the extent of the common-law liability of common carriers. Plaintiffs had been shipping cream by the defendant, and having their receipts in the same book of receipts almost daily from January 24, 1902, and in all, or nearly all, the shipments the receipts were filled out by the plaintiffs or their agent, and signed by defendant's receiving agent. In no case did they give the value of the shipment to defendant. They say they did not read the terms and conditions in the shipping book, but it seems incredible that using that book almost daily for nearly two years, and filling in the blanks at every shipment, the eye could have failed to catch the distinct notice of limitation of liability. Lapse of memory is much more probable.

The receipt in this case in express terms incorporated into it the limitation of liability contained in the conditions printed in the book of receipts used by plaintiffs. Upon that receipt and under its conditions defendant received the goods, and upon it plaintiffs delivered them. That constituted the contract between the parties, and, in the absence of fraud or misrepresentation, which are not claimed, the plaintiffs are bound by its expressed terms. They cannot be permitted to say that, by their own inattention, they did not read the terms and conditions, and thereby impose upon defendant a greater liability than that expressed in the contract. Squire v. New York Cent. R. Co., 98 Mass. 239, 93 Am. Dec. 162.

The receipt did not state the rate for transportation. Consequently, the rate would be that agreed upon, if any; otherwise a reasonable rate.

But it is strongly urged that the rate per can for transportation had been specifically agreed upon by the parties, and therefore there was no occasion for giving the value. One of the plaintiffs rather vaguely says it was agreed, and the other plaintiff says the rate was asked for and given, and that was all. But this argument overlooks the consideration that upon the value of the goods largely depends the degree of care defendant would exercise to protect the property. If the value was large, and liability for loss great, defendant would naturally use much greater care to protect from loss than if the value was trifling.

It is the opinion of the court that the ruling was right, and the entry must be: Motion and exceptions overruled.

W. R. LYNN SHOE CO. v. AUBURN-LYNN SHOE CO.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. Nov. 16, 1905.)

1. TRADE-MARKS AND TRADE-NAMES — ELEMENTS.

The general common-law proposition upon which all the courts unite is that any words, letters, figures, marks or devices, or combinations of any of these, affixed to a commercial article and used primarily to indicate the origin or ownership of it, either by its own meaning or by association with the article, and not employed merely as descriptive of such article to designate its quality or ingredient only, or solely as a geographical name without any secondary signification, must be recognized as a valid trade-mark.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trade-Marks and Trade-Names, §§ 4-7, 18.]

2. SAME—UNFAIR COMPETITION.

All the courts agree that one man shall not be permitted, by imitating such distinctive name or mark already employed by another to designate a commercial article, to impose upon the public an article of his own manufacture as the genuine article of another, for the reason that it would be a fraud upon the manufacturer first appropriating such mark, and also a fraud upon the consumers, who have a right to be protected against such imposition.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trade-Marks and Trade-Names, §§ 65-72.]

3. SAME—GEOGRAPHICAL NAME.

But while it is undoubtedly the general rule that a geographical name, when used alone and affixed to a manufactured article for the purpose of designating the place of its manufacture or the address of the manufacturer, cannot be appropriated as a trade-mark, it has been held that a geographical name which has long been used to indicate a particular manufactured article may acquire a secondary meaning as the designation of a particular class of such articles, or the product of a particular manufacturer, and thus either become entitled to protection against infringement as a valid trade-mark or serve as the basis of a proceeding to prevent unfair competition.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trade-Marks and Trade-Names, § 18.]

4. SAME—PARTICULAR DEVICE.

The leading characteristic which distinguishes the trade-mark under consideration in the case at bar from the ordinary appropriation of a personal name or geographical term alone as a trade-mark is the fact that, in the plaintiff's trade-mark, the geographical and personal names were both combined in an original device bearing the words "Auburn-Lynn Shoes, Auburn, Maine."

5. SAME.

This arbitrary composite name of the plaintiff's product, with the location of the manufactory expressly added, constituted an impersonal trade-mark. It was a trade-mark which others could not use with equal right and equal truth for the same purpose. The plaintiff had acquired the exclusive right to the use of it, and the adoption by the defendant of the phrase "Auburn-Lynn Shoe Co." as a trade-mark and corporate name was an unauthorized simulation of the plaintiff's trade-mark, and constituted an infringement of the plaintiff's property right, without other proof of a fraudulent intent on the part of the defendant.

6. SAME—INFRINGEMENT.

In contemplation of law, two trade-marks are substantially the same if the resemblance between them is so close that it deceives a customer exercising ordinary caution in his dealing and induces him to purchase the goods of one manufacturer for those of another. A critical comparison of two trade-marks placed side by side might disclose differences in both words and devices; but, if the similarity is of such a character as to convey a false impression to the minds of ordinarily careful purchasers, respecting the identity of the manufactory or of the goods, it is sufficient to afford ground for redress.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trade-Marks and Trade-Names, § 64.]

7. SAME—UNFAIR COMPETITION—INTENT.

The defendant's aggressions upon the rights of the plaintiff prior to the change of its name to "Lynn & Lynn Co." constituted not only a violation of the general law covering unfair competition, but also a specific and positive infringement of the plaintiff's exclusive right to the use of a technical trade-mark and trade-name. The law of trade-marks, it is true, is but a special feature of the general law of unfair competition in trade, which rests upon the elementary principle that no person has the right to sell his goods for those of another; but there are important distinctions to be observed between them. Unfair competition, unlike the infringement of technical trade-marks, does not necessarily involve the violation of any exclusive right in the plaintiff to the use of the names or symbols employed by the defendant, but there may be unfair competition resulting from an unauthorized and improper use of such names and symbols, although the plaintiff has no property right in them as a trade-mark. Any conduct designed and having a natural tendency to deceive the public, and enable one man to dispose of his goods for those of another, may be unfair competition and be enjoined, although it is not expressly shown that any particular person was thereby actually deceived. Again, in cases of technical trade-mark, the fraudulent intent to deceive is presumed, while in cases of unfair competition, the plaintiff must prove this intent or show facts and circumstances from which it may be reasonably inferred.

Held, that the findings and conclusions of the justice of the first instance were justified by the facts reported. Therefore all of the provisions of the decree signed by the justice of the first instance are affirmed without modification, except the sixth paragraph in regard to the extent of the accounting to which the plaintiff is entitled.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trade-Marks and Trade-Names, §§ 78-88, 104½.]

8. SAME—DAMAGES—PROFITS.

The rule which now prevails in the equity courts, respecting the wrongdoer's accountability for the "profits and damages" resulting from his unlawful acts, requires the master, not only to take an account of all profits made by the defendant, but also to make an inquiry in regard to all damages sustained by the plaintiff on account of the defendant's wrongful acts; and, since it cannot be ascertained with any reasonable certainty how much of the profit is due to the trade-mark and how much to the intrinsic value of the commodity, the whole will be awarded to the plaintiff. It is well settled that the profits recoverable in equity for unfair competition are governed by the same rule as in cases of infringement of trade-marks.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trade-Marks, and Trade-Names, § 112.]

9. SAME—FORM OF RELIEF.

It is therefore further held that the plaintiff is entitled to an accounting, not only for the profits realized by the defendant company from sales of shoes upon which was impressed the trade-mark of the Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company, or any simulated trade-mark using the name "Auburn-Lynn," but also for the profits resulting from the wrongful acts committed by the defendant company in its unfair competition with the plaintiff between the time of its change of name to Lynn & Lynn Shoe Company and the date of the decree.

(Official.)

Exceptions from Supreme Judicial Court, Androscoggin County, in Equity.

Action by W. R. Lynn Shoe Company against the Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company. From a decree for plaintiff, defendant appeals, and plaintiff prosecutes exceptions. Appeal dismissed, and exceptions sustained.

Argued before WISWELL, C. J., and WHITEHOUSE, STROUT, PEABODY, and SPEAR, JJ.

Oakes, Pulsifer & Ludden and Enoch Foster, for plaintiff. George C. Wing, George C. Wing, Jr., and White & Carter, for defendant.

WHITEHOUSE, J. This cause in equity comes to the law court upon the appeal of the defendant corporation from a final decree enjoining it from an unlawful use of plaintiff's trade-mark and trade-name, and upon the plaintiff's exceptions to that portion of the decree respecting the extent of the liability of the defendant corporation to account for the profits of its business.

The material facts established by the finding of the court are as follows:

The plaintiff corporation has been engaged in business in Auburn, Me., since 1898, manufacturing ladies' boots and shoes under several styles, among which are "comfort" and "common sense." The corporation was named for W. R. Lynn, who was an experienced manufacturer of shoes, a stockholder in the company until about the first of 1903, and the superintendent of manufacture for several years. He continued his services with the corporation until June 5, 1903. In November, 1899, the corporation adopted the name "Auburn-Lynn Shoes" as the name of a part of its products, and that name was used as a general name for the entire product for two or three years prior to the bringing of this bill, and became the trade-mark of the plaintiff's manufactured product. In June, 1903, the plaintiff adopted a trade-mark in the form of the following device:

Auburn LYNN
AUBURN, MAINE.

A cut was made and the trade-mark printed in a booklet in the early part of 1903, and 5,000 copies of it were sent out for the use of the trade. The trade-mark stamp was applied to the plaintiff's shoes for the first time in June, 1903. The plaintiff also extensively used the term "Auburn-Lynn Shoes" upon its labels, postal cards, envelopes, bill heads, letter heads, orders, blanks, circulars, and slips, upon which the words "Auburn-Lynn Shoes, made by the W. R. Lynn Shoe Co., Auburn, Maine," were made very prominent. In the trade-mark and trade-name "Auburn-Lynn Shoes," the word "Auburn" signified the city of Auburn, the place of manufacture, and the word "Lynn" signified W. R. Lynn, the superintendent of manufacture in the plaintiff corporation. The defendants Lunn and Reed were salesmen for the plaintiff, each having assigned to him certain territory in the western states.

July 9, 1903, the defendants, Lunn, Lynn, and one Sweet, organized the defendant corporation under the name of "The Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company." Lynn was president, Lunn treasurer, and Lynn, Lunn, and Sweet directors. The Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company entered into business in Auburn near the place of business of the W. R. Lynn Shoe Company. The names "Auburn" and "Lynn" in the name of the corporation were intended to represent the name of the city of Auburn, Me., and the name "Lynn," the defendant W. R. Lynn, who was known as a manufacturer. The defendant company, soon after its organization, adopted the following trade-mark:

and used it upon the first goods sent out under date of September 4, 1903. The Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company made styles of goods similar to those manufactured by the W. R. Lynn Shoe Company, under the names of "common sense" and "old ladies" shoes, etc., but they were not identical, though many styles were not readily distinguishable. The Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company, in July and August, sent letters to the old customers of the plaintiff, calling attention to the fact that W. R. Lynn had ceased to be connected with the plaintiff company, and that a new corporation had been formed. Reference was made, however, to the "improved styles" to be manufactured by the Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company. Circulars, made after this bill was filed and served, were put in the first cartons shipped by the defendant company, and were also sent by mail to the former customers of the W. R. Lynn Shoe Company. They were headed with the trade-mark of the Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company, and contained no reference to the fact that Mr. Lynn had ceased to be connected with the W. R. Lynn Shoe Company, or that the Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company was not the same manufacturer as the plaintiff. But they contained the following sentence: "Our common sense shoes are noted for softness and excellent wearing qualities, and have brought comfort to thousands of women troubled with aching and tender feet." At the time this circular was first issued, the Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company had sold no goods.

As a result of these circumstances, the plaintiff in the fall of 1903 found unusual difficulty in selling in its old territory. Many of its old customers gave orders to the new company, and also much confusion arose in regard to the mail intended to be addressed to the plaintiff. Before the organization of the defendant company, letters intended for the plaintiff had been addressed to the W. R. Lynn Shoe Company and the Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company; but after the new company was organized, it claimed to receive and did receive and open all letters addressed to the Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company. When the Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company commenced business, it provided the old customers of the W. R. Lynn Shoe Company with envelopes addressed to the Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company, and apparently some of those envelopes were used by the customers of the plaintiff in sending orders and remittances. At least 32 letters, between August 4, 1903, and the time of hearing this bill in March, 1904, intended for the plaintiff, but addressed to the Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company, came into the hands of the defendant corporation. They contained orders, checks, and general correspondence, some of the defendant's printed, addressed envelopes, and some in writing. They were mostly from old customers, and from the letters the defendant company obtained information concerning the business of the plaintiff.

On the 15th day of September, 1903, after this bill was brought, the defendant corporation changed its name to the "Lunn & Lynn Shoe Company," but it continued to use the old stationery and copies of the printed trade-mark, substituting "Lunn &" for "Auburn" in red ink; the word "Auburn" being crossed, but not obliterated.

The defendant Reed was employed by the defendant company as salesman, and has covered practically the same territory as he did with the old company. It was the understanding that he should visit the old customers of the plaintiff, and he did so. The defendant Lunn acted as salesman for the defendant company from September until November, covering his old territory. After September 22, 1903, no goods were billed by the defendant company under the name of the Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company, but under the name of the Lunn & Lynn Shoe Company. After the change of name, one order only appears to have been taken by the defendant's salesman on the order blanks of the Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company.

The inference and legal conclusions deducible from the findings of fact are thus stated by the presiding judge before whom the testimony was taken:

"I rule that the term 'Auburn-Lynn Shoes,' adopted by the plaintiff and affixed by it to its goods, as a combination was a valid trade-mark and trade-name, though it was in part geographical. I hold that the plaintiff had acquired by use an exclusive right to the name 'Auburn-Lynn Shoes' as a trade-mark and trade-name.

"I hold that the conduct of the defendant company, in adopting the phrase 'Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company' as its trade-mark, and in conducting a shoe business under that corporate name, manufacturing goods similar in style and character to those manufactured by the plaintiff and so nearly so as not to be distinguishable by ordinary observers, advertising and selling those goods in the territory covered by Lunn and Reed when they were acting for the plaintiff company in the sale of Auburn-Lynn shoes, constituted unfair competition. I think it was well calculated to mislead customers, notwithstanding the correspondence of the defendant company and its officers to the old customers, in which they stated that a new corporation had been formed, and that Mr. Lynn had ceased to be connected with the plaintiff company. And although the trade customers of the plaintiff might even generally be informed of the situation, the purchasing public, so far as it appears, was not informed, and could not well be informed, and were liable to be deceived, and the plaintiff, at the same time, injured thereby. Those who had been in the habit of dealing in and purchasing the Auburn-Lynn shoes might well understand that the product of the Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company represented the plaintiff's manufacture. And, even after the change of name to Lunn & Lynn Shoe Company, the use of the old literature, so changed as only to indicate that the Lunn & Lynn Shoe Company was the successor of the Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company, did not help the matter. If customers could be led to believe that the Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company was the manufacturer of shoes which they had formerly bought as 'Auburn-Lynn Shoes,' they would not be undeceived by seeing literature in which 'Auburn' was changed to 'Lunn &' in such a way as to give the impression that the Lunn & Lynn Shoe Company was a successor of the 'Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company.'

I do not, however, find that the use of the words 'Lunn & Lynn Shoe Company' is an infringement upon the plaintiff's rights, except so far as it may, by the manner of use, directly or indirectly give any impression that it is the successor of the Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company, or had, or has ever had, anything to do with the manufacture of the 'Auburn-Lynn shoes.' I think the defendant company may lawfully make use of the composite name Lunn-Lynn, although Lunn was formerly the salesman, and Lynn the manufacturer, of the Auburn-Lynn shoes, and although Lynn is the person for whom the Auburn-Lynn shoes were named in part. The defendant company must not use its corporate name or conduct its business so as to convey to the trade the impression that its manufactured product is the Auburn-Lynn shoe product of the plaintiff, or that it is the successor of the plaintiff or of the Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company, and it must so conduct its business in this respect that persons of ordinary intelligence may not be deceived. I think the duty is upon it to take such measures as may be necessary to clearly avoid confusion.

"I think the defendant company, its officers, agents, and servants, should be enjoined from the use in any way of the trade-mark and trade-name 'Auburn-Lynn Shoes,' as applied to its product, and from the use of the name 'Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company' in the manufacture and sale of 'Comfort,' 'Common Sense,' 'Old Ladies,' and other similar shoes, or in business or correspondence connected therewith, and from the use of the name 'Lunn & Lynn Shoe Company' as the successor of the Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company, unless in each instance it states clearly that it is not the manufacturer of the Auburn-Lynn shoes."

Thereupon the presiding judge sustained the bill against the defendant corporation and entered the following decree:

"(1) That the plaintiff is entitled to the exclusive use of the name 'Auburn-Lynn Shoes' as a trade-mark and a trade-name.

"(2) That the defendant corporation, its officers, agents, and servants, be and are hereby perpetually enjoined from the use in any way of the trade-mark or trade-name 'Auburn-Lynn Shoes' as applied to its product.

"(3) That the defendant company, its officers, agents, and servants, be and are hereby perpetually enjoined from the use of the name 'Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company' in the manufacture and sale of 'Comfort,' 'Common Sense,' 'Old Ladies,' and other similar shoes, and from the use of said name 'Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company' in its business and its correspondence connected therewith.

"(4) That the said defendant company, its officers, agents, and servants, be and are hereby perpetually enjoined from the use of the name 'Lunn & Lynn Shoe Company' as the successor of the 'Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company,' unless in each instance it states clearly that it is not the manufacturer of the 'Auburn-Lynn Shoes.'

"(5) That the defendant company, its officers, agents, and servants, be and are hereby perpetually enjoined from the use of its corporate name or the conduct of its business so as to convey to the trade the impression that its manufactured product is the Auburn-Lynn shoe product of the plaintiff, or that it is the successor of the plaintiff, or of the Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company, and from so conducting its business in this respect that persons of ordinary intelligence would be deceived thereby.

"(6) That it be referred to John A. Morrill, Esq., of Auburn, a master in chancery, to take an account of all the profits of the business of the defendant corporation growing out of sales of shoes upon which was impressed the trade-mark of the Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company, or any simulated trade-mark using the name 'Auburn-Lynn,' from the 9th day of July, A. D. 1903, to the date of this decree, and ascertain and report the amount of such profits, together with all damages sustained by the plaintiff during said period by the wrongful use of the plaintiff's trade-mark and trade-name, and by the unfair competition of the defendant corporation during said period."

The bill was dismissed without costs as to the defendants Lynn and Reed.

It is the opinion of the court that these deductions and conclusions were clearly warranted by the findings of fact, and that the defendant's appeal must be dismissed.

It is contended in behalf of the defendant company that, as the word "Auburn" in the plaintiff's trade-name indicated the place of manufacture, and the word "Lynn" signified the name of the manufacturer, the phrase "Auburn-Lynn Shoes" could not become the subject of an exclusive property right of the plaintiff, and was therefore incapable of being a valid trade-mark. But this contention cannot be sustained.

It may be difficult to reconcile the conclusions reached by different courts upon the facts reported in the multitude of decisions relating to this subject, and impracticable to give an exact statement of what a trade-mark may consist under all circumstances, but an analysis of the leading cases shows that they are all in substantial accord upon the equitable principles and fundamental propositions respecting the nature and protection of trade-marks. "It is equitable," says Judge Putnam, in Le Page Co. v. Russia Cement Co., 51 Fed. 941, 2 C. C. A. 555, 17 L. R. A. 354, "that a manufacturer who has given reputation to any article should have the privilege of realizing the fruits of his labors, by transmitting his business and establishment, with the reputation which has attached to them, on his decease to his legatees or executors, or during his lifetime to purchasers; and it is also in accordance with the principles of law and justice to the community that any trade-mark, including a surname, may be sold with the business or the establishment to which it is incident; because, while it may be that individual efforts give them their value at the outside, yet afterwards this is ordinarily made permanent as a part of the entire organization, or as appurtenant to the locality in which the business is established, and thence forward depends less on the individual efforts of the originator than on the combined result of all which he created." The general common-law proposition, upon which all the courts unite, is that any words, letters, figures, marks, or devices, or combination of any of these, affixed to a commercial article and used primarily to indicate the origin or ownership of it, either by its own meaning or by association with the article, and not employed merely as descriptive of such article to designate its quality or ingredient only, or solely as a geographical name without any secondary signification, must be recognized as a valid trade-mark. All the courts agree that one man shall not be permitted, by imitating such distinctive name or mark already employed by another to designate a commercial article, to impose upon the public an article of his own manufacture as the genuine article of another, for the obvious reason that it would in the first place be a fraud upon the manufacturer first appropriating such mark, and, secondly, a fraud upon the consumers, who have a right to be protected against such imposition. In Symonds et al. v. Jones, 82 Me. 302, 19 Atl. 820, 8 L. R. A. 570, 17 Am. St. Rep. 485, the court say: "The public come to associate their names, labels, and marks with the products of some particular origin or ownership, or of some particular factory, farm, etc. It is clear that such names thus become convenient for the consumer and valuable to the producer, and that both the consumer and the producer should be protected against their use by other parties upon other similar products. They become valuable according to the familiarity of the public with them, and the excellence of the product designated by them. The law justly recognizes such names, labels, and marks as important attributes or appurtenances of a business, and as proper to be transferred with any sale or transfer of the business and its plant." See, also, Canal Co. v. Clark, 13 Wall. 311, 20 L. Ed. 581; Brown Chem. Co. v. Meyer, 139 U. S. 540, 11 Sup. Ct. 625, 35 L. Ed. 247; Columbia Mill Co. v. Alcorn, 150 U. S. 460, 14 Sup. Ct. 151, 37 L. Ed. 1114; Elgin Nat. Watch Co. v. Illinois Watch Co., 179 U. S. 665, 21 Sup. Ct. 270, 45 L. Ed. 365. In the last-named case, Chief Justice Fuller says in the opinion:

"The term has been in use from a very early date, and, generally speaking, means a distinctive mark of authenticity, through which the * * * commodities of particular merchants may be distinguished from those of others. It may consist in any symbol or in any form of words, but, as its office is to point out distinctively the origin or ownership of the articles to which it is affixed, it follows that no sign or form of words can be appropriated as a valid trade-mark, which from the nature of the fact conveyed by its primary meaning others may employ with equal truth and with equal right for the same purpose.

"And the general rule is thoroughly established that words that do not in and of themselves indicate anything in the nature of origin, manufacture, or ownership, but are merely descriptive of the place where an article is manufactured or produced, cannot be monopolized as a trade-mark."

But while it is undoubtedly the general rule that a geographical name, when used alone and affixed to a manufactured article for the purpose of designating the place of its manufacture, or the address of the manufacturer, cannot be appropriated as a trade-mark, it has been held in numerous well-considered cases that a geographical name which has long been used to indicate a particular manufactured article may acquire a secondary meaning as the designation of a particular class of such articles, or the product of a particular manufacturer, and thus either become entitled to protection against infringement as a valid trade-mark, or serve as a basis of a proceeding to prevent unfair competition. In American Waltham Watch Co. v. U. S. Watch Co., 173 Mass. 85, 53 N. E. 141, 43 L. R. A. 826, 73 Am. St. Rep. 263, it was held that, while the name "Waltham" on watches was originally used in a geographical sense, by long use in connection with the plaintiff's watches, it had acquired a secondary meaning as a designation of the watches which the public had become accustomed to associate with the name. In Montgomery v. Thompson [1891] App. Cases, 217, it was decided by the House of Lords that the term "Stone Ale," which had been applied to a particular quality of beer manufactured by the defendants at the town of Stone, was entitled to the protection of the court, and the plaintiff was enjoined from selling any ale not manufactured by the defendants under the name of "Stone Ale." In Wotherspoon v. Currie, L. R. 5 H. L. 508, it was held that the word "Glenfield," as applied to starch, had acquired a secondary meaning and indicated to the public the starch made by the appellants. It was therefore decided that the word "Glenfield" as a denomination of starch had become the property of the appellants. See, also, Reddaway v. Banham, App. Cas. (1896) 199; Carlsbad v. Kutnow, 71 Fed. 167, 18 C. C. A. 24; Viano v. Baccigalupo, 183 Mass. 160, 67 N. E. 641; Metcalfe v. Brand, 86 Ky. 331, 5 S. W. 773, 9 Am. St. Rep. 282; Paul on Trade-Marks, § 59, and cases cited.

It is also conceded to be a general rule that a personal name alone cannot be appropriated as a technical trade-mark, although it may receive protection from the courts when it is so used by another as to render him answerable to the charge of unfair competition. Every person has a right to the honest use of his own name in his business, but he will not be permitted by imitative and unfair devices to mislead the public in regard to the identity of the firm or corporation, or the goods manufactured by it. But a trade-mark that is originally personal, indicating that the article to which it is affixed is manufactured by a particular person, often comes by usage to indicate merely that the article was manufactured in the establishment with which he was formerly connected.

But it has been seen that there is a leading characteristic which distinguishes the trade-mark under consideration in the case at bar from the ordinary appropriation of a personal name or geographical term alone as a trade-mark. In the plaintiff's trade-mark, the geographical and personal names were both combined in an original device bearing the words "Auburn-Lynn Shoes, Auburn, Maine."

This arbitrary composite name of the plaintiff's product, with the location of the manufactory expressly added, undoubtedly constituted an impersonal trade-mark. It will be found to respond to all of the recognized tests of a valid trade-mark. It did not describe the stock and different materials which entered into the manufacture of the shoes to which it was affixed. It did not necessarily signify that the shoes were the product of Lynn's personal skill, but, by a long use of the trade-mark in connection with the shoes, it had come to indicate that they were the product of the manufactory with which he was connected, and thus, through the reputation which they had acquired in the market, to operate as an assurance that they possessed certain general qualities and merits. It did not describe the shoes, but it indicated their origin and ownership. It was a trade-mark which others could not use with equal right and equal truth for the same purpose. The plaintiff had acquired the exclusive right to the use of it, and the adoption of the defendant of the phrase "Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company," as a trade-mark and corporate name, was an unauthorized simulation of the plaintiff's trade-mark, and constituted an infringement of the plaintiff's property right, without other proof of a fraudulent intent on the part of the defendant. Elgin Nat. Watch Co. v. Illinois Watch Co., 179 U. S. 674, 21 Sup. Ct. 270, 45 L. Ed. 365; Paul on Trade-Marks, §§ 183-185. The prompt abandonment of the defendant's trade-mark with the change of its corporate name to "Lynn & Lynn Shoe Company," after the commencement of this bill, was a practical admission of this infringement. It is not indispensable that the words and devices of the two trade-marks should be in fact identical in order to constitute an infringement. In contemplation of law, two trade-marks are substantially the same, if the resemblance between them is so close that it deceives a customer exercising ordinary caution in his dealing and induces him to purchase the goods of one manufacturer for those of another. McLean v. Fleming, 90 U. S. 256, 24 L. Ed. 828; Amoskeag Mfg. Co. v. Trainer, 101 U. S. 63, 25 L. Ed. 993. A critical comparison of two trade-marks placed side by side might disclose differences in both words and devices, but, if the similarity is of such a character as to convey a false impression to the minds of ordinarily careful purchasers respecting the identity of the manufactory or of the goods, it is sufficient to afford ground for redress.

Again, it has been seen that the defendant corporation unnecessarily and without authority adopted the words of the plaintiff's trade-mark comprising the name of Lynn, for its corporate name. In William Rogers Mfg. Co. v. R. W. Rogers Co. (C. C.) 66 Fed. 56, the court say: "Although the case of a personal name as a trade-mark will not be protected against its use in good faith by a defendant who has the same name, the reason of the rule ceases, and the rule no longer applies, when the defendant, as in case of a corporation, selects its own name, especially where it appears that such name is selected with an intention to mislead." In Holmes B. & H. v. Holmes B. & A. Mfg. Co., 37 Conn. 278, 9 Am. Rep. 324, it was held that, where a corporation has, with their consent, embodied the names of its principal stockholders in the corporate name, the right to use the name so adopted will continue during the existence of the corporation, and that the use of these names by a rival company subsequently formed and embracing such stockholders, in such a manner as to mislead customers into the belief that the two companies were the same, was in violation of the plaintiff's right and should be enjoined. See, also, Royal v. Royal (C. C. A.) 122 Fed. 337; Bissell v. Bissell (C. C.) 121 Fed. 355.

In the light of both principle and authority, it thus appears that the defendant's aggressions upon the rights of the plaintiff, prior to the change of its name to "Lunn & Lynn Shoe Company," constituted not only a violation of the general law covering unfair competition, but a specific and positive infringement of the plaintiff's exclusive right to the use of a technical trade-mark and trade-name. The law of trade-marks, it is true, is but a special feature of the general law of unfair competition in trade, which rests upon the elementary principle that no person has the right to sell his goods for those of another. But, as already indicated, there are important distinctions to be observed between them. In the first place, unfair competition, unlike the infringement of technical trade-marks, does not necessarily involve the violation of any exclusive right in the plaintiff to the use of the names or symbols employed by the defendant. There may be unfair competition resulting from an unauthorized and improper use of such names and symbols, although the plaintiff has no property right in them as a trade-mark. Any conduct designed and having a natural tendency to deceive the public and enable one man to dispose of his goods for those of another may be unfair competition and be enjoined, although it is not expressly shown that any particular person was thereby actually deceived. McLean v. Fleming, 96 U. S. 245, 24 L. Ed. 828; Samuels v. Spitzer, 177 Mass. 226, 58 N. E. 693.

Again, it is frequently stated that in cases of technical trade-mark the fraudulent intent to deceive is presumed, while, in cases of unfair competition, the plaintiff must prove this intent or show facts and circumstances from which it may be reasonably inferred. But upon this question of intent there is a great diversity of opinion, or of expression, in different courts, and it has been held in some cases that there is no practical distinction in this respect between cases of trade-mark infringement and unfair competition, since the reasons often given for not requiring proof of fraudulent intent in cases of technical trade-mark are equally applicable to cases of unfair competition. Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law, vol. 28, 419, and cases cited. The rule adopted in the United States Supreme Court is thus stated by Chief Justice Fuller, in Elgin Nat. Watch Co. v. Illinois Watch Co., 179 U. S. 674, 21 Sup. Ct. 274, 45 L. Ed. 365: "If the plaintiff has the absolute right to the use of a particular word or words as a trade-mark, then, if an infringement is shown, the wrongful or fraudulent intent is presumed, and, although allowed to be rebutted in exemption of damages, the further violation of the right of property will nevertheless be restrained. But where an alleged trade-mark is not in itself a good trade-mark, yet the use of the word has come to denote the particular manufacturer or vendor, relief against unfair competition or perfidious dealing will be awarded by requiring the use of the word by another to be confined to its primary sense by such limitations as will prevent misapprehension on the question of origin. In the latter class of cases such circumstances must be made out as will show wrongful intent in fact, or justify that inference from the inevitable consequences of the act complained of. Lawrence Manufacturing Company v. Tennessee Manufacturing Co., 138 U. S. 537, 549, 11 Sup. Ct. 396, 34 L. Ed. 997; Coats v. Merrick Thread Co., 149 U. S. 562, 13 Sup. Ct. 966, 37 L. Ed. 847; Singer Man. Co. v. June Man. Co., 163 U. S. 169, 16 Sup. Ct. 1002, 41 L. Ed. 118."

It has accordingly been held that a court of equity will enjoin the infringement of a technical trade-mark, which has been occasioned by accident or mistake, without proof of actual fraud on the part of the defendant; but it will not enjoin the imitations of labels, bill heads, and commercial names of a rival trader, unless it satisfactorily appears that such imitations are fraudulently designed and have a tendency to occasion damage. McLean v. Fleming, 96 U. S. 245, 24 L. Ed. 828.

In the case at bar, after the plaintiff's bill was commenced, the defendant corporation changed its name to "Lunn & Lynn Shoe Company," but continued to use the old stationery and copies of the printed trade-mark substituting "Lunn" for "Auburn" in red ink; the word Auburn being erased but not obliterated. It has been seen that the presiding judge found and held that the "conduct of the defendant company, in adopting the phrase

'Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company' as its trade-mark, and in conducting a shoe business under that corporate name, manufacturing goods similar in style and character to those manufactured by the plaintiff, and so nearly so as not to be distinguishable by ordinary observers, advertising and selling those goods in the territory covered by Lunn and Reed, when they were acting for the plaintiff company in the sale of Auburn-Lynn shoes, constituted unfair competition. * * * Those who had been in the habit of dealing in and purchasing the Auburn-Lynn shoes might well understand that the product of the Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company represented the plaintiff's manufacture. And even after the change of name to the 'Lunn & Lynn Shoe Company' the use of the old literature, so changed as only to indicate that the Lunn & Lynn Shoe Company, was the successor of the Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company, did not help the matter. If customers could be led to believe that the Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company was the manufacturer of shoes which they had formerly bought as Auburn-Lynn shoes they would not be undeceived by seeing literature in which 'Auburn' was changed to 'Lunn &' in such a way as to give the impression that the Lunn & Lynn Shoe Company was a successor of the Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company."

It has been seen that, in the light of the decisions, the unauthorized simulation of the plaintiff's trade-mark and trade-name by the defendant corporation constituted an infringement of the plaintiff's exclusive right to the use of a technical trade-mark, without other proof of a fraudulent intent on the part of the defendant; but the decision of the presiding judge that such conduct on the part of the defendant corporation, prior to the change of its name to Lunn & Lynn Shoe Company, constituted unfair competition, involved a finding that there was in fact a fraudulent intent on its part to convey to the trade an impression that its shoes were the Auburn-Lynn shoes, product of the plaintiff. This finding was not required to authorize the injunction against the use of the plaintiff's trade-mark by the defendant corporation, but it was nevertheless relevant and material upon the question of damages; since the presumption of wrongful intent in cases of technical trade-mark may be rebutted upon the question of liability for profits and damages. Elgin Nat. Watch Co. v. Illinois Watch Co., 179 U. S. 674, 21 Sup. Ct. 270, 45 L. Ed. 865.

But the presiding judge further found that, even after the change of the name to Lunn & Lynn Shoe Company, the use of the old advertising literature, with changes only indicating that the Lunn & Lynn Shoe Company was the successor of the Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company, "did not help the matter," for the reason that customers would continue to receive the false impression that the shoes placed on the market by the Lunn & Lynn Shoe Company were the Auburn-Lynn shoes of the plaintiff. This was in effect a finding that the conduct of the Lunn & Lynn Company in using the old literature, unaccompanied by any explicit statement that this company was not the manufacturer of Auburn-Lynn shoes, still constituted unfair competition.

These findings and conclusions of the presiding judge were justified by the facts reported. The entire history of the conduct of the shoe business by the defendant corporation, after the retirement of W. R. Lynn from the plaintiff company, discloses a manifest intention and persistent effort on the part of the management to beguile the old customers of the plaintiff company into purchasing the defendant's shoes, under the impression that they were the Auburn-Lynn product manufactured by the plaintiff, and thereby to appropriate the value of the reputation which the latter had acquired. It shows a determination to continue such efforts until compelled by the courts to forbear. Its change of name to Lunn & Lynn Shoe Company, considered in the light of its subsequent conduct in the use of the old trade literature, indicated an ingenious attempt to disguise the true nature of its methods and conduct, rather than a genuine purpose to desist from the pursuit of its course of unfair competition. All of the provisions of the decree signed by the presiding judge are therefore affirmed without modification, except the sixth paragraph, in regard to the extent of the accounting to which the plaintiff is entitled. This question is raised by the plaintiff's exceptions.

It has been seen by the sixth paragraph of the decree the cause was referred to a master to take an account of all the profits of the business of the defendant corporation, "growing out of sales of shoes, upon which was impressed the trade-mark of the Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company, or any simulated trade-mark using the name 'Auburn-Lynn,' from" the time of the organization of the defendant corporation to the date of the decree, with all damages sustained by the plaintiff during that period by the wrongful use of the plaintiff's trade-mark and trade-name, and by the unfair competition of the defendant corporation during that period.

The words in quotation marks were introduced by the presiding judge in the decree filed by the plaintiff's attorney, and to this limitation upon his right to an accounting for the profits of the defendant's business the plaintiff took exceptions.

The rule which now prevails in the equity courts, respecting the wrongdoer's accountability for the "profits and damages" resulting from his unlawful acts, requires the master, not only to take an account of all the profits made by the defendant, but also to make an inquiry in regard to all damages sustained by the plaintiff on account of the defendant's wrongful acts; and, since it cannot be ascertained with any reasonable certainty how much of the profit is due to the trade-mark and how much to the intrinsic value of the commodity, the whole will be awarded to the plaintiff. It is equally well settled that the profits recoverable in equity for unfair competition are governed by the same rule as in cases of infringement of trade-marks, and are not limited to such as accrue from sales in which it is shown that the customer is actually deceived, but include all made on the goods sold in the simulated dress or package, and in violation of the rights of the original proprietor. Fairbank Co. v. Windsor (C. C.) 118 Fed. 96; Benkert v. Feder (C. C.) 34 Fed. 534; Williams v. Mitchell, 106 Fed. 168, 45 C. C. A. 265; Sawyer v. Kellogg (C. C.) 9 Fed. 601; Saxlehner v. Elsner & Mendelson Co., 179 U. S. 19, 21 Sup. Ct. 7, 45 L. Ed. 60; Singer Mfg. Co. v. June Mfg. Co., 163 U. S. 169, 16 Sup. Ct. 1002, 41 L. Ed. 118; Graham v. Plate, 40 Cal. 593, 6 Am. Rep. 639; Avery v. Melkle, 85 Ky. 435, 8 S. W. 609, 7 Am. St. Rep. 604; McLean v. Fleming, 96 U. S. 437, 24 L. Ed. 828.

In Singer Mfg. Co. v. June Mfg. Co., supra, it was held that, on the expiration of the plaintiff's patent, the right to make the patented article and to use the generic name "Singer" passed to the public, but that the defendant was guilty of unfair competition in failing to indicate that the machines made by him were not the product of the Singer Manufacturing Company, and the defendant corporation was accordingly directed to "account" for any profits which may have been realized by it, because of the wrongful acts committed by it while engaged in such unfair competition, although there had been no infringement of a technical trade-mark.

In the case at bar it appears that between August 4, 1903, and the time of the hearing of the bill in March, 1904, 32 letters, intended for the plaintiff but addressed to the Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company, came into the hands of the defendant corporation. They contained orders, checks, and general correspondence, some in the defendant's printed addressed envelopes and some in writing. They were mostly from old customers, and from these letters the defendant company obtained information concerning the plaintiff's business. It expressly appears that, after the defendant's change of name, one order was taken by the defendant's salesman on the order blanks of the Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company.

It is accordingly the opinion of the court that the plaintiff is entitled to an accounting, not only for the profits realized by the defendant company from sales of shoes upon which was impressed the trade-mark of the Auburn-Lynn Shoe Company, or any simulated trade-mark using the name "Auburn-Lynn," but also for the profits resulting from the wrongful acts committed by the defendant company in its unfair competition with the plaintiff, between the time of its change of name to Lunn & Lynn Shoe Company and the date of the decree.

Defendant's appeal dismissed.

Plaintiff's exceptions sustained.

Cause remanded for a modification of the decree in accordance with this opinion.

WRIGHT v. HOLMES.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. Nov. 22, 1905.)

1. ADMINISTRATORS — ACTIONS TO RECOVER ASSETS—FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE.

An administrator is the proper party to sue for the goods which once belonged to his intestate, but which were disposed of by him by a fraudulent and void transfer or gift.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 22, Cent. Dig. Executors and Administrators, §§ 890, 1782.]

2. DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION — CONVEYANCES BY WIFE—FRAUD AS TO HUSBAND.

In this state, prior to June 1, 1903, when chapter 160, p. 124, of the Public Laws of that year took effect, a married woman might make such disposition, by gift, voluntary conveyance, or otherwise, of her personal property during her lifetime as she wished, even though her husband was thereby deprived of the distributive share therein which would otherwise fall to him upon her death, and even if such disposition was made with intent to prevent his receiving such a distributive share.

3. SAME—GIFTS CAUSA MORTIS.

Whether this rule will apply as to gifts causa mortis, since chapter 160, p. 124, of the Public Laws of 1903, permitting a widower to waive the provisions of his wife's will and take his distributive share in her personal estate as if she had died intestate, is not decided.

(Official.)

Report from Supreme Judicial Court, Oxford County.

Trover by James S. Wright, as administrator of the estate of Emma M. Swift, deceased, against Laura I. Holmes, to recover damages for the conversion of deposits in three savings banks and one national bank, amounting to $5,767.25, transferred by plaintiff's intestate to the defendant on the 9th day of May, 1903. Emma M. Swift, the deceased, died July 19, 1903, leaving a husband, Chandler Swift, to whom she was married August 5, 1902. Facts agreed upon and case reported to the law court, with the stipulation that the law court "should pass such judgment as the law and the facts warrant." Judgment for defendant.

Argued before EMERY, STROUT, SAVAGE, POWERS, PEABODY, and SPEAR, JJ.

James S. Wright and Alton C. Wheeler, for plaintiff. Robert F. Dunton, for defendant.

SAVAGE, J. The plaintiff's decedent, a widow possessed of about $10,000 and living at Belfast, married Chandler Swift of Paris, August 5, 1902, and in the same month came to his home to live with him. In the December following, being then ill and probably apprehensive of a fatal result, Mrs. Swift made a will by which she gave her husband $500, and the income of $2,000 more. Later she went to the hospital for treatment. After remaining there for 17 days, she returned to her husband's home, and stayed there until April 5, 1903, at which time she went back to Belfast, her former home. She continued to live in Belfast until she died of tuberculosis of the lungs, July 17, 1903. On May 9, 1903, she assigned to the defendant deposits in various savings banks amounting to $5,767.25, and transferred to her her homestead, furniture, and certain other goods and chattels of small value. At the same time she gave away to others practically all of her remaining property, but she gave nothing to her husband. The will above referred to she then destroyed. Subsequently she caused the savings bank books representing the deposits assigned to the defendant to be surrendered to the banks. The deposit accounts were transferred to the defendant, and new books were issued in her name. These books were sent by the banks to Mrs. Swift, who delivered them to the defendant. So far as forms are concerned, these transactions constituted a valid transfer of the deposits to the defendant. The agreed case states that the transfers were "made in contemplation of death," and that Mrs. Swift died of the incurable disease from which she was suffering at the time the transfer was made. The parties are not agreed as to whether the transfer was a gift or a contract; and if a gift, whether it was absolute and irrevocable, although made in expectation of death, and so a gift inter vivos (Dresser v. Dresser, 46 Me. 48); or whether it was ambulatory and revocable, at her will, or in the case of her recovery, and so a gift causa mortis (Bickford v. Mattocks, 95 Me. 547, 50 Atl. 894; Chase v. Redding, 13 Gray, 418). As the ground upon which the case will be decided is applicable to both classes of gifts, it will not be necessary to scrutinize the gift closely to ascertain to which class it belongs.

The plaintiff, as administrator, brings this action of trover for the savings bank deposits, which were given to the defendant. And as the case makes no mention of debts, we assume that it is brought for the benefit of the husband, as statutory distributee. And as such a case, it has been argued by the learned counsel for the plaintiff.

The defendant presents various objections to the maintenance of the suit, and first, that the plaintiff is not the proper party. It is claimed that if the gift was fraudulent as to the husband, and hence void, as the plaintiff urges, the husband only was injured, and that he only can obtain relief in some appropriate form of action. But we incline to think otherwise. The title to an intestate's personal estate does not pass to his distributees, except through proper probate administration. Distribution, or a right to distribution, presupposes administration. The distributee's share is his proportionate part of whatever fund is left after the debts and expenses of administration have been paid. The distributee is not entitled to a share of the specific rights and credits, and goods and chattels which came into the administrator's hands, but only to a share of the fund produced by administering them; that is, by reducing them to money. This conclusion seems to be sustained by Dole v. Lincoln, 31 Me. 422, where the court used this language: "The notes claimed in this suit were formerly the property of the intestate, and they must still be regarded as belonging to his estate, unless he made a legal disposition of them during life." The reasoning of the court in McLean v. Weeks, 65 Me. 411, also seems to support the right of the administrator in this respect. See Abbott v. Tenney, 18 N. H. 109; Emery v. Clough, 63 N. H. 552, 4 Atl. 769, 56 Am. Rep. 543.

The defendant further objects that trover will not lie in this case. The declaration in the case counts on the conversion of certain "large sums of money then on deposit" in certain savings banks. It may well be held that trover will not lie for "money deposited" in a savings bank. A depositor is not the owner of any specific money in the bank. He is simply the owner of a right and credit against the bank.

But we will not pursue these technical objections further. The case comes up on report, and we think it is wiser to decide the vital questions at issue between the parties, rather than to send the case off on a question of pleadings.

Upon the merits, the defendant contends that the transactions which we have stated between Mrs. Swift and the defendant are not to be viewed merely as a voluntary gift, but that they are to be supported rather as a contract based upon valuable consideration. The case states that the defendant "verbally agreed to take care of Mrs. Swift as long as she should live, pay her funeral expenses, do some cemetery work on her lot, and provide for the perpetual care of the same," but it does not state that the transfers to the defendant were made in consideration of her agreement to do these things, nor is there sufficient evidence to warrant a finding to that effect. We think the transfers must be treated as a gift.

We are accordingly led to inquire whether a married woman can give away her personal estate, when the obvious effect, and therefore the presumed intent, in part at least, is to deprive her husband of that share in her property which he would otherwise be entitled to after her death, as distributee. It cannot be doubted that under the "married women's statute of this state, a married woman may own, manage, sell, dispose of, and give away her personal property as freely and absolutely as a married man may do. She may do so without her husband's assent to the same extent a married man may do so without his wife's assent. Rev. St. c. 63, § 1; Allen v. Hooper, 50 Me. 375; Hanson v. Millett, 55 Me. 189; Haggett v. Hurley, 81 Me. 552, 40 Atl. 561, 41 L. R. A. 362. It is obvious that the provision which first appeared in Rev. St. c. 63, § 1, is the general revision of 1903, that "such conveyance without the joinder or assent of the husband shall not bar his right and interest by descent in the estate so conveyed" is to be limited to conveyances of real estate. The phrase "right and interest by descent" was adopted in Pub. Laws 1895, p. 175, c. 157, to express the right which a surviving husband or wife should have in the real estate of a deceased wife or husband, in the place of a dower or curtesy. Rev. St. c. 77. It had no reference to the interest in the personal estate which comes through distribution. The same meaning is evidently intended to be given to the same phrase in Rev. St. c. 63, § 1. Besides, the revision of 1903 was not adopted until several months after the gift was made, and Mrs. Swift had died.

But the plaintiff contends that it is contrary alike to the dictates of justice and to the policy of the law to permit a husband or wife to make a voluntary gift of substantially all of his or her personal property, with the intent and necessary effect of depriving the surviving wife or husband of a distributive share. He claims that this gift was a donatio causa mortis, that it is to be likened to a will, and that it cannot be permitted to do what a will would be ineffectual to do. He argues that if Mrs. Swift had given the defendant this property by will, the husband nevertheless might have waived the will and received a distributive share, and he cites upon this point, Jones v. Brown, 84 N. H. 439; Baker v. Smith, 66 N. H. 422, 23 Atl. 82; Hatcher v. Buford, (Ark.) 29 S. W. 641, 27 L. R. A. 507; Headly v. Kirby, 18 Pa. 326; Schouler on Wills, § 63; 8 Redfield on Wills, 324. The doctrine of these authorities is stated in Baker v. Smith, supra, after citing the New Hampshire statute of wills, as follows: "What she cannot do in this respect by will she cannot do by another form of testamentary disposition [donatio causa mortis] which is of the nature of a legacy, and becomes a valid gift only upon the decease of the donor." Redfield doubts whether such a gift should stand "where the statute expressly provides that a widow may waive the provisions of the will and come in for her share of the personal estate under the statute by way of distribution."

Unfortunately, however, for this line of argument, in this state, prior to June 1, 1903, when chapter 160, p. 124, of the Laws of 1903 took effect, there was no provision of statute which gave a distributive share of the personal estate to a widower who had waived his wife's will. Stewart v. Skolfield, 99 Me. 65, 58 Atl. 58. Widows, but not widowers, were permitted to waive provisions of wills, and claim distributive shares, or to claim such shares, when left unprovided for in wills. The statute of 1903 was not in effect when this gift was made. What would have been the result, if that statute had been in effect, we have no occasion to consider. Prior to that statute, a married woman could, by will, place her entire personal estate beyond the reach of her husband. Stewart v. Skolfield, supra. Could she do so by a gift?

The cases in which this question has arisen, as might be expected, have usually been those where a widow has sought to have gifts made by her husband declared invalid. And those in which the question has been answered in the negative have generally been decided upon one or more of the four grounds following:

(1) That the gift, being causa mortis, was ambulatory and testamentary in character, and that it was against the policy of the law to permit a donor to override the law, and defeat his wife's claim upon his personal estate, by gift, when he could not do it by will. This ground we have already examined, and found it not applicable to this case.

(2) That the gift was colorable; a gift in form, but not in fact. Substantially all authority is to the effect that where the transfer is a mere device or contrivance by which the husband, retaining to himself the use and benefit of the property during his life, and not parting with the absolute dominion over it, seeks at his death to deprive his widow of her distributive share, it is to be regarded as fraudulent as to the wife, and void. Brown v. Crafts, 98 Me. 40, 56 Atl. 213; Thayer v. Thayer, 14 Vt. 107, 39 Am. Dec. 211; Walker v. Walker, 66 N. H. 390, 31 Atl. 14, 27 L. R. A. 799, 49 Am. St. Rep. 616; Hayes v. Henry, 1 Md. Ch. 337; Dunnock v. Dunnock, 3 Md. Ch. 140; Tucker v. Tucker, 29 Mo. 350; Brown v. Bronson, 35 Mich. 415; Smith v. Smith (Colo.) 46 Pac. 128, 34 L. R. A. 49, 55 Am. St. Rep. 142.

(3) That the husband is under a legal obligation to support and maintain his wife during his life, and therefore that it is his duty to provide for her as long as he lives. Thayer v. Thayer, 14 Vt. 107, 39 Am. Dec. 211. The force of this argument is lost, however, when, as in this case, the donor is the wife, and not the husband.

(4) That the gift was in fraud of the wife's right to a separate maintenance, or to alimony. Draper v. Draper, 68 Ill. 17; Tyler v. Tyler, 126 Ill. 525, 21 N. E. 616, 9 Am. St. Rep. 642; Feigley v. Feigley, 7 Md. 587, 61 Am. Dec. 375; Bouslough v. Bouslough, 68 Pa. 495; Green v. Adams, 59 Vt. 602, 10 Atl. 742, 59 Am. Rep. 761. This principle, however, does not apply until the parties have separated and have assumed extra-marital relations towards each other. In such cases the wife may be regarded as a quasi creditor, and is to be distinguished from a widow seeking a distributive share. Small v. Small, 56 Kan. 1, 42 Pac. 323, 80 L. R. A. 243, 54 Am. St. Rep. 581.

Some courts have gone to the extent of declaring that a wife, because she is a wife, has a tangible and valuable interest in her husband's estate, springing from the marriage itself, which the law recognizes and protects (Nichols v. Nichols, 61 Vt. 426, 18 Atl. 153), and that a voluntary gift by the husband to a third party may be a fraud upon that interest, and upon her claim to a distributive share (Thayer v. Thayer, 14 Vt. 107, 39 Am. Dec. 211; Walker v. Walker, 66 N. H. 390, 31 Atl. 14, 27 L. R. A. 799, 49 Am. St. Rep. 616; Manikee's Adm'r v. Beard, 85 Ky. 20, 2 S. W. 545; Stone v. Stone, 18 Mo. 389; Murray v. Murray, 90 Ky. 1, 13 S. W. 244, 8 L. R. A. 95).

But the almost overwhelming weight of authority is to the contrary. And we think that by that weight of authority the rule is established that the law places no restriction or limitation on the power of the husband to make such disposition by gift, voluntary conveyance or otherwise, of his personal property during his lifetime, as he may wish, even though his wife is thereby deprived of the distributive share therein, which would otherwise fall to her upon his death. He may by gift dispose of his personal property absolutely, without the concurrence and against the will of his wife, exonerated from all claim by her, provided the transaction is not merely colorable, and is unattended by facts indicative of some other fraud upon her than that arising from his absolute transfer, to prevent her having an interest therein after his death. To hold that a wife has a vested interest in her husband's personal estate that he is unable to divest in his lifetime, would be disastrous to trade and commerce. Padfield v. Padfield, 78 Ill. 16; Hays v. Henry, 1 Md. Ch. 337. He may even beggar himself and his family when he dies, and then only, do the rights of the wife attach to the personal estate. She then becomes entitled to her distributive share. Lines v. Lines, 142 Pa. 149, 21 Atl. 809, and note to same case, 24 Am. St. Rep. 490. It was tersely declared in Small v. Small, 56 Kan. 1, 42 Pac. 323, 80 L. R. A. 243, 54 Am. St. Rep. 581, that if the disposition by the husband be bona fide, and no right is reserved to him, though made to defeat the right of the wife, it will be good against her. Hays v. Henry, supra; Cameron v. Cameron, 10 Smedes & M. (Miss.) 394, 48 Am. Dec. 759. In Holmes v. Holmes, 3 Paige, 363, it is said that the owner of personal property as against everybody but creditors, may make such disposition thereof as he pleases, either by will or otherwise. He cannot, therefore, commit a fraud upon his wife or children by disposing of it, before his death, in any manner he may think proper, by gift inter vivos or causa mortis, or by will. Neither the wife nor the children have any interest in the property, except as far as the husband or father may be liable for their support during his life. It is therefore impossible that he should defraud either by any disposition he may make of his property to take effect after his death. Stewart v. Stewart, 5 Conn. 317; Williams v. Williams (C. C.) 40 Fed. 521. The power of the husband over his personal property by gift inter vivos is absolute. A man's wife and children have no legal right to any part of his goods, and no fraud can be predicated of any act of his to deprive them of the succession. Pringle v. Pringle, 59 Pa. 281; Dunnoch v. Dunnoch, 3 Md. Ch. 140; Tucker v. Tucker, 29 Mo. 350; Cranston v. Cranston, 4 Mich. 230, 66 Am. Dec. 534; Marshall v. Berry, 13 Allen, 43. In the last case the court said: "In the absence of any provision of statute inconsistent with the right of the wife to dispose of her personal property in this manner [by gift causa mortis] we must hold that she has the power." "These gifts," say the court, in Chase v. Redding, 13 Gray, 418, "if confirmed and held good, do not impair the rights of the widow. Her right is to the property of which the husband died seised or possessed. These gifts have their full effect in the lifetime of the donor, and the property is not in his possession at the time of his decease, and does not come under the administration of the executor." A deed of real estate, reserving the life estate in the grantor, made principally for the purpose of depriving the wife of her statutory share in the grantor's estate, but also given in consideration of care bestowed and to be bestowed upon the grantor as long as he lives, was held valid as against the grantor's widow in Leonard v. Leonard, 181 Mass. 458, 63 N. E. 1068, 92 Am. St. Rep. 426. "The intent to defeat a claim which otherwise a wife might have is not enough to defeat the deed." The alienation or gift by a husband is held to be valid, even though his intent and purpose in making it was to deprive her of dower, provided there be no fraudulent participation on the part of the grantee or donee in such intent or purpose. Rabbitt v. Gaither, 67 Md. 95, 8 Atl. 744. Mr. Thomson in his work on Gifts and Advancements says in section 488: "A husband may make a gift of his personal property, and thereby deprive his wife and children of all interest therein. She and they have no interest in such property until his death, and therefore he may wholly disregard her and them, and make a gift of his property, either inter vivos, or mortis causa." To the same effect are Richards v. Richards, 11 Humph. (Tenn.) 429; Smith v. Hines, 10 Fla. 258; Hatcher v. Buford, 60 Ark. 169, 29 S. W. 641, 27 L. R. A. 507; Lightfoot's Executors

v. Colgin, 5 Munf. (Va.) 42; Ford v. Ford, 4 Ala. 142; Ellmaker v. Ellmaker, 4 Watts, 89; Poe v. Brownrigg, 55 Tex. 133; Samson v. Samson, 67 Iowa, 253, 25 N. W. 233; and Dickerson's Appeal, 115 Pa. 199, 8 Atl. 64, 2 Am. St. Rep. 547. These rules which have for the most part been applied in cases where gifts by the husband have been in question, must, we think, apply with at least equal force in this state to gifts by a married woman.

Applying these rules to which we agree, to the facts in this case, there is no room left for controversy but that the gift from Mrs. Swift to the defendant must be held valid as against her husband. The plaintiff has presented no other basis for his claim.

Judgment for the defendant.

BRADY v. MESSLER et al.

(Supreme Court of Rhode Island. Nov. 13, 1905.)

1. MONEY HAD AND RECEIVED—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In assumpsit for money had and received under an agreement to invest it, the evidence considered and held not to sustain a judgment against one of the defendants.

2. ACTION—CRIMINAL ACT—CONDITIONS PRECEDENT—PRIOR CRIMINAL PROSECUTION.

Under Gen. Laws 1896, c. 279, § 16, declaring every agent or person to whom any money or property is intrusted for any specific purpose who shall embezzle or fraudulently convert it to his own use guilty of larceny, and chapter 233, § 16, authorizing recovery of damages for injury occasioned by crime after complaint has been made to some proper magistrate for such crime and process issued thereon, no civil action can be maintained against a defendant for the larceny of a check intrusted to him as a messenger, for the specific purpose of transmitting it to a third person, before complaint is made to a magistrate and process issued thereon.

Action by John F. Brady against Matie C. Messler and others. Heard on petition of defendants for a new trial. Granted.

Argued before DOUGLAS, C. J., and DU-BOIS, BLODGETT, and PARKHURST, JJ.

Burbank & Brown, for plaintiff. John W. Hogan and Philip S. Knauer, for defendants.

PARKHURST, J. This is an action of assumpsit for money had and received and on the other common counts, brought by John A. Brady against Matie C. Messler and George Cooper, for the recovery of certain money. The plaintiff testified that he had an agreement with Mrs. Messler to invest some money for him in something in which she was investing and from which she was making considerable money; that she could not tell him what it was, since it was a family matter; that on the 26th day of October, 1899, George Cooper came to his office, and the plaintiff, supposing that Cooper represented Mrs. Messler, gave Cooper a check for $1,000, payable to Cooper, which sum Cooper was to take to Mrs. Messler for investment by her under said alleged agreement; that Cooper invested the money in stocks on margin and lost it. Mrs. Messler denied any such agreement, and further denied that she had any connection with this transaction, or any knowledge of this transaction whatsoever until long after the money had been invested and lost, and testified that it was first brought to her attention that Brady made any claim against her through a letter written by the plaintiff to the A. C. Messler Company, of which she was a clerk, in the fall of 1902. Cooper testified that Brady had an agreement with him to invest in a stock which he would not disclose to Brady, and that Brady understood that he was going into a speculation; that it was "out and out gamble," and that he took all chances of loss; that Cooper invested Brady's money on margin, as agreed; that the stock declined, and that he lost the money, losing at the same time considerable money of his own in trying to protect his margins. A verdict was returned for the plaintiff against both defendants for the full amount paid by the plaintiff to Cooper, with interest.

As to the defendant Matie C. Messler, the court, after full examination of the record, fails to find any evidence that she ever received the proceeds of said check, or any part thereof. The plaintiff himself does not know that she received it, but, on the contrary, introduces in evidence the admission of the defendant George Cooper, made at a former trial, that he received the check, cashed it, and used the money in speculation in stocks, and lost it all. The plaintiff seeks to hold Mrs. Messler liable by reason of some ratification or admission claimed to have been made by her at a later date, but the court does not find evidence of any such ratification or admission. The verdict of the jury, so far as it related to Mrs. Messler, had no evidence to support it.

As to the defendant George Cooper, if the plaintiff's testimony is true, to the effect that he had no agreement whatever with Cooper, that Cooper was simply a messenger intrusted with the proceeds of the $1,000 check for the specific purpose of transmitting the same to Mrs. Messler, and that Cooper lost all the money in stock speculation, then Cooper was guilty of larceny, under Gen. Laws 1896, c. 279, § 16, which reads as follows: "Every officer, agent, clerk or servant or person to whom any money or other property shall be intrusted for any specific purpose, who shall embezzle or fraudulently convert to his own use or shall take or secrete, with intent to embezzle and fraudulently convert to his own use, any money or other property which shall have come into his possession or shall be under his care or charge, by virtue of such employment or for such specific purpose, shall be deemed guilty of larceny, and may be tried, sentenced and punished as for any other larceny." If this be true, then no civil action could have been commenced against defendant Cooper at the date of the writ in this case (June 11, 1903), because no complaint had been made to any magistrate, and no process issued thereon against Cooper, under the provisions of Gen. Laws 1896, c. 233, § 16, then in force.

"Sec. 16. Whenever any person shall suffer any injury to his person, reputation, or estate, by reason of the commission of any crime or offence, he may recover his damages for such injury, either in an action of trespass, or in an action of the case, against the offender; but no such action, except as provided in the preceding two sections, shall be commenced for such injury until after complaint has been made to some proper magistrate for such crime or offence, and process issued thereon against the offender, excepting only those cases in which such actions may now be maintained at common law; and whenever any person shall be convicted of larceny, he shall be liable to the owner of the money or articles taken, for twice the value thereof, unless the same be restored, and for the value thereof in case of restoration." See Baker v. Slater Mill & Power Co., 14 R. I. 531; Arnold v. Gaylord, 16 R. I. 573, 18 Atl. 177; Struthers v. Peckham, 22 R. I. 8, 45 Atl. 742.

If, on the other hand, the story told by the defendant Cooper is true, to the effect that he acted as he did upon a full and complete understanding with the plaintiff that the money was to be used in speculation, and that "it was out and out gamble;" that the money was used in buying stock on margin, as agreed; that the stock declined, and the money was all lost—then defendant Cooper was not liable, because he had done just as he agreed. Without attempting to decide whether the plaintiff or the defendant Cooper has told the truth (and it is manifest that either one or the other of them has committed perjury, because their stories are entirely inconsistent, and relate to matters about which they could not make an honest mistake), it is evident that in either event the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in this suit against the defendant Cooper.

As the foregoing is decisive of the whole case, it is not necessary to pass upon the defendants' exceptions or other grounds urged upon their petition for a new trial.

Defendants' petition for new trial is granted, and the case is remitted to the superior court, with direction to enter judgment for defendants for costs.

VERRONE v. RHODE ISLAND SUBURBAN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Rhode Island. Nov. 10, 1905.)

1. CARRIERS—INJURY TO PASSENGER—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

It is not negligence per se for a passenger on a street car to stand on the running board, and hold the post or handle affixed thereto, where the car is so filled that there is no room inside.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Carriers, § 1379.]

2. SAME—OBLIGATION OF COMPANY.

A street railway company, accepting a passenger obliged to stand on the running board of the car because he cannot be accommodated inside the car, must do all that human vigilance reasonably can to prevent injury to him.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Carriers, § 1101.]

3. SAME—NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Where, in an action for the death of a street car passenger occasioned by his being thrown from the car, the evidence showed that decedent was obliged to stand on the running board of the car because of its crowded condition, and that he held onto the post with both hands, and that previous to the accident the car swayed violently, the question of the negligence of the company in operating the car was for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Carriers, § 1318.]

4. SAME—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

A passenger on a street car, who stands on the running board of the car, assumes only the risk of the ordinary motion of the car.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Carriers, § 1379.]

5. EVIDENCE—OPINIONS—COMPETENCY OF WITNESS.

A witness who does not know the ordinary rate of speed of a street car on a particular route is not competent to testify that a car on a particular occasion on that route was run at an extraordinary rate of speed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 20, Cent. Dig. Evidence, §§ 2202, 2270.]

Action by Quirino Verrone, administrator, against the Rhode Island Suburban Railway Company. There was a nonsuit, and plaintiff petitions for a new trial. Granted.

Argued before DOUGLAS, C. J., and DU-BOIS, JOHNSON, and PARKHURST, JJ.

James A. Williams, David S. Baker, Thomas F. I. McDonnell, and Lewis A. Waterman, for plaintiff. Henry W. Hayes, Frank T. Easton, Lefferts S. Hoffman, and Alonzo R. Williams, for defendant.

DOUGLAS, C. J. The plaintiff's intestate was a passenger on Labor Day, 1902, upon an open trolley car operated by the defendant. When he got upon the car at Crescent Park, the seats were filled, and passengers were standing between the seats, and he was able only to secure a position upon the running board. According to all the testimony, he grasped the post or the handle affixed to it with both hands as long as he continued on the car. As the car approached the hill north of Barrington station, while it was proceeding along a straight and approximately level track, he fell off, and was found a short time after lying dead in the road. There is no dispute that he was killed by the fall from the car. Several witnesses testified that just previous to the accident the car swayed violently, and was jerked sideways with considerable force. One witness testified, without objection, that the car was going at an extraordinary rate of speed at the time of the accident. The question was asked of other witnesses how the motion compared with the usual motion of the car, and the defendant's objection to this question was sustained, and the plaintiff duly excepted. At the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence, a nonsuit was granted. The plaintiff asks for a new trial on the grounds that it was error to exclude the testimony offered and to grant the nonsuit.

1. We think the nonsuit was improperly granted. The plaintiff's intestate occupied this position on the running board because there was no vacant seat in the car, nor standing room between the seats. This was not negligence per se. If the railroad company accepts passengers whom it cannot accommodate inside its car, it must do all that human care and vigilance reasonably can to prevent accident happening to them. Brunchow v. R. I. Co., 26 R. I. 211, 58 Atl. 657. The court below seems to have based its decision upon the opinion in Elliot v. Newport St. Ry. Co., 18 R. I. 707, 28 Atl. 333, 81 Atl. 694, 23 L. R. A. 208, where it is said: "A passenger who rides on the foot-board of a car necessarily takes on himself the duty of looking out for and protecting himself against the usual and obvious perils of riding there, such, for instance, as injury from passing vehicles or by being thrown off by the swaying or jolting of the car; assuming, of course, proper management of the car and proper construction and condition of the road." The court interpreted this language as holding that a person riding upon the running board of an electric car assumed the risk of being thrown off by a jolt, whether of usual or extraordinary violence. But the words we have italicized modify the general statement, and introduce a new issue into the case. No doubt it is reasonable to impose upon a passenger the assumption of such risks as ordinarily attend the position he takes, but he has a right to suppose that the car will be run with due care, and this requires greater precaution when passengers are occupying the running board than when all are safely seated. A shock sufficient to throw from the car a strong man holding on with both his hands might well be taken by the jury as evidence that the car was not properly managed. We think, therefore, that the plaintiff had made out a prima facie case, and should have been allowed to go to the jury.

2. It is evident from what we have said that it was a substantial issue in this case whether the car was proceeding as usual when the accident occurred, or was propelled at an extraordinary rate of speed, which would be likely to cause more violent and dangerous jolting and swaying than common. The passenger, when he took his place on the running board, assumed the risk of ordinary motion, not of extraordinary violence. Testimony, therefore, upon this subject would be admissible if offered by competent witnesses. The plaintiff in this case failed to qualify the witnesses whom he called on that question by first showing that they had traveled on this route, and knew the ordinary rate of speed at the place in question. For this reason, the exceptions to the exclusion of their testimony must be overruled.

The defendant cites Moskowitz v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co. (Sup.) 85 N. Y. Supp. 960. It was held in that case that where plaintiff elected to ride on the step of a crowded street car, and was thrown off by the oscillation or "greyhound motion" of the car as it was running at the usual rate of speed maintained on that portion of its route, and there was no evidence of any unusual or abnormal motion, due to any unusual condition of the car, rails, roadbed, or management, plaintiff assumed the risk of an injury so occasioned. The opinion of the majority of the court proceeds to distinguish other cases, where the accident was caused by unusual or abnormal motion of the car, from the one under consideration; and, while approving the cases reviewed, bases the decision in this case upon the fact that no unusual or abnormal motion was "proved, or attempted to be proved," by the plaintiff. In this respect the case differed from the case at bar.

The petition for a new trial is granted, and the cause will be remanded to the superior court for further proceedings.

DARY v. PROVIDENCE POLICE ASS'N. (Supreme Court of Rhode Island. Nov. 6, 1905.)

1. BENEFICIAL ASSOCIATIONS—SICK BENEFITS—WAIVER.

Plaintiff's intestate, an active member of a police association, on September 8, 1903, rendered a bill for sick benefits to July 31, 1903, which was returned for correction. The claim was withheld until April, 1904, awaiting the determination of a pending case involving the status of a pensioner, when it was returned corrected, with a new claim for benefits from August 1, to October 31, 1903, and was paid. Intestate continued sick, and died on September 26, 1904, and plaintiff, as administrator, sued for benefits from November 1, 1903, to intestate's death. Held that, the association having become acquainted with intestate's method of making his bills, and having the opportunity to ascertain his physical condition, the claim for the benefits was not waived by intestate's neglect to present them.

2. SAME—BY-LAWS—PROSPECTIVE OPERATION.

Providence Police Association By-Laws 1904, art. 11, § 2, providing that all applications for benefits by members on the pension list must be made within a week from the commencement of the sickness for which the benefit is claimed, is prospective in its operation, and does not govern claims for benefits for sickness originating prior to its adoption.

3. SAME—INTEREST ON CLAIMS.

A beneficial association is not chargeable with interest on claims for sick benefits prior to the date demand was made therefor.

Action by Frank A. Dary, administrator of the estate of George H. Dary, deceased, against the Providence Police Association. Heard on agreed statement of the facts. Judgment for plaintiff.

Argued before DOUGLAS, C. J., and DUBOIS, BLODGETT, JOHNSON, and PARKHURST, JJ.

Cooke & Angell, for plaintiff. Willard B. Tanner, for defendant.

DUBOIS, J. This is an action of assumpsit brought by the administrator of the estate of George H. Dary, deceased, against the defendant corporation, of which the decedent was a member up to the time of his death, to recover the sum of $446 for sick benefits due to the plaintiff's intestate at the rate of $2 per day from November 1, 1903, to May 5, 1904, and at the rate of 50 cents per day from May 6, 1904, to September 26, 1904. The plea of the defendant is the general issue, accompanied by an affidavit of valid defense, upon the ground that the plaintiff's intestate waived his claim to the sick benefits for which this suit is brought.

The case was submitted to the court upon the following agreed statement of facts: "The plaintiff's intestate was at the time of his death, and for more than two years prior thereto had been, an active member of the Providence Police Association, and was also on the list of the active police force, drawing forty-five per centum of the regular pay of a lieutenant of police, being on the pension list. Under certain conditions, the members of said Providence Police Association are entitled to sick benefits, according to the by-laws of said association, including the by-laws in force prior to May 5, 1904, and those in force subsequently thereto to the time of the death of the plaintiff's intestate, which are hereby made a part of said statement. On the 28th day of June, A. D. 1903, the plaintiff's intestate became sick. September 8, 1903, he rendered a bill to said association for benefits from June 28, 1903. This bill was for a dollar a day, and the association claimed it was incorrect, and asked him to amend it. A case was pending in court to determine the status of one on pension list under rules of association. Said association met monthly for the payment of bills and sick benefits. He rendered a bill from June 28, 1903, for sick benefits to October 31, 1903, less seven days omitted pursuant to the by-laws, which said bill was paid. A copy of said bill, marked 'Exhibit A,' is hereto annexed and made a part hereof. Said bill amounted to balance due him of $249.50, and was paid by said association, after which time the said plaintiff's intestate rendered no bill to said association for sick benefits, or made any claim for the same during his lifetime. He died on the 26th day of September, A. D. 1904. Said plaintiff's intestate had diabetes from June, 1903, and from the time when he first claimed sick benefits to his death. He had also two cerebral hemorrhages, the last one being the immediate cause of his death. The plaintiff in this case has testimony to prove, and the defendant has no testimony to contradict the same, that the plaintiff was sick enough to entitle him to sick benefits after said 31st day of October, A. D. 1903, and that it was known to Doctor Clifford H. Griffin, his attending physician, who was also the police surgeon of the city of Providence, R. I., during the entire time of said sickness, but it is admitted that these facts were unknown to the said defendant. Said plaintiff's intestate was under the care of Dr. Griffin from June, 1903, until the time of his death on September 26, 1904, as appears from a copy of the certificate of Dr. Griffin, the original whereof is in the possession of the said association, which said copy, marked 'Exhibit B,' is annexed hereto and made a part hereof. The plaintiff in this case has testimony to prove, and the defendant has no testimony to contradict the same, that from June 28, 1903, to October 31, 1903, and from the latter date until about a week before his death, the plaintiff's intestate was not confined to his house, but was during his entire sickness from June, 1903, to the time of his death, prevented on account of his sickness from doing any kind of remunerative work, and was during all that period under the professional care of Dr. Clifford H. Griffin; but it is admitted that the fact of said physician's care since October 31, 1903, was unknown to said association. The fact, if so, that the plaintiff's intestate was sick enough to entitle him to sick benefits after said 31st day of October, 1903, was unknown to the defendant, and the defendant took no steps to ascertain if this was so because of its said ignorance, although it is admitted that the plaintiff has testimony to prove that said plaintiff's intestate was sick enough to entitle him to said benefits from said last-named time until his death, and that the defendant has no evidence to the contrary. He was not mentally or physically unable to have claimed sick benefits during the period after said 31st day of October, A. D. 1903, except for a short time before his death, and his said sickness was not caused by any immoral or improper conduct. By the provisions of section 2 of said article 11, in operation until May 5, 1904, benefits were payable as follows: 'First. To active members of the police force, one dollar per day while receiving full pay from the city, and two dollars per day when full pay ceases.' On May 5, 1904, said section 2 of said article was amended so that benefits were payable as follows: 'First. To active members of the police association, fifty cents per day while receiving pay from the city, whether from the police pension fund or otherwise, and two dollars per day when such pay ceased.' By the last paragraph of 'second clause' of article 11 of said by-laws in operation until amended May 5, 1904, it is provided that all applications for benefits under said article by honorary members must be made to the secretary in writing within two weeks from the commencement of the sickness or disability for which the benefits are claimed, and no such requirement by active members existed under the by-laws until the amendment thereof, adopted May 5, 1904, when it was provided for the first time by clause 3 of said section 2 of article 11 of said by-laws that all applications for benefits under said article by honorary or superannuated members, or members on the pension list, must be made to the secretary in writing within one week from the commencement of the sickness or disability for which the benefits are claimed. The claim made in this case is for sick benefits from October 31, 1903, to September 26, 1904, inclusive. The Police Manual and the by-laws of the Providence Police Association are introduced as a part of the evidence to be submitted to the court."

"November 11, 1904.

"This is to certify that George H. Dary was under my professional care from June, 1903, till the time of his death. He suffered from diabetes mellitus, and from that time till his death had two cerebral hemorrhages; the last one being the immediate cause of death. At no time during that period was he able to do any remunerative work. Respectfully yours, Clifford H. Griffin."

1. Most of the facts have been definitely agreed to by the parties, but as to several it is agreed that the plaintiff has testimony to prove them, and that the defendant has no testimony in contradiction thereof. This amounts to an agreement that the plaintiff can prove them, and is equivalent to an admission of their existence as facts. "Certum est quod certum reddi potest." Under this agreed statement of facts, the plaintiff is entitled to judgment unless his intestate waived his claim for sick benefits. Waiver has been defined to be the intentional relinquishment of a known right, with both knowledge of its existence and an intention to relinquish it. Bouv. Law Dict. The defendant's claim is that there has been both an implied and an express waiver by the plaintiff's intestate, acting by way of estoppel of the plaintiff's claim: "First. The estoppel claimed is that the neglect of the plaintiff's intestate during his lifetime to make any claim for sick benefits for such a long time was not only evidence of the intention of the plaintiff's intestate not to claim such benefits, but that such neglect tended to the injury of the defendant, by causing it to omit to take the necessary precautions which it would otherwise have taken to investigate the extent of the sickness claimed by said plaintiff's intestate, and was the kind of claim of which the defendant would not ordinarily have any knowledge without notice from the claimant. Second. The fact that several months after the sickness for which the intestate did make a claim he put in his bill, but omitted to make any claim for the continuance of said sickness to the date of the bill, was an additional waiver of the claim beyond the time stated in the bill, and was actually misleading to the defendant as to the continuance of said sickness, and this estopped plaintiff's intestate from making any further claim for the continuance of said sickness; no notice being given to said defendant." Waiver is not, in the proper sense, a species of estoppel, unless the conduct of one party has induced the other to take such a position that he will be injured if the first be permitted to repudiate his acts. 16 Cyc. 805, and note. "The kind of waiver capable of being described as an estoppel should have the marks of an estoppel, by causing the innocent party to forego some right, or otherwise to change his position." Bigelow, Estoppel (5th Ed.) p. 660, note 1. It does not appear that the defendant was induced to take any injurious position by the alleged waivers, and the only right that the defendant claims it was deprived of was the right to investigate the extent of the sickness claimed by the decedent. If the deceased had never made claim for sick benefits, there would be great force in this position, but the facts agreed upon disclose the following state of affairs: September 8, 1903, the plaintiff's intestate rendered a bill to said association for sick benefits from June 28th to July 31st of that year, which bill was not paid, but was returned to him for correction; that no further claim was made until April 11, 1904, which, without explanation, would seem a long time for the sick claimant to wait, but it seems to be accounted for by the statement that a case was pending in court to determine the status of one on the pension list, as the plaintiff's intestate was, under the rules of the association.

The case referred to is evidently that of Nickerson v. Providence Police Association, 26 R. I. 40, 57 Atl. 1057, which was decided March 16, 1904. Within a month after the determination of that case, George H. Dary presented his bill, dated April 11, 1904, which included the former bill corrected and a new claim for 92 days' sick benefits from August 1 to October 31, 1903, and this bill was paid by the defendant. If the doctrine of estoppel by waiver claimed by the defendant is sound, then by the first bill rendered September 8th for sickness from June 28th to July 31st, the claimant waived his claim for any sickness suffered by him in the 39 days which had elapsed between July 31st and September 8th, and when he rendered his later bill, which covered the time so waived, the defendant should have declined to pay the same upon that ground, which it did not do, but paid him the amount of the original bill, doubled by the decision of the court, and for 92 days more of continuous sickness in addition thereto. The defendant thus became acquainted with the claimant's method of making his bills, and also had the opportunity, which it is fair to presume it exercised, to make the proper and necessary examination of the decedent to ascertain his physical condition. If it did make such examination, it ascertained that he was suffering from diabetes mellitus, which is generally fatal; and, if it did not, then it did not take advantage of its opportunities, and cannot now be heard to complain. If the defendant made the investigation that it should have made when its attention was called to the matter by the bill introduced after the termination of the lawsuit, which defined the rights of pensioners to be much greater than the defendant had anticipated, then it discovered that the claimant was suffering from a progressive and fatal illness of a kind and character that would entitle him to sick benefits for the remainder of his life, under the by-laws of the association. In such circumstances, it was unnecessary for him to notify the defendant from time to time of the continued existence of his incurable disease, except for the purpose of laying a foundation for claims for interest. The defendant, however, maintains that article 11, § 2, cl. 3, of the by-laws, adopted May 5, 1904, supra, governs all claims for sick benefits which have accrued thereafter, irrespective of the time of the origin of the sickness upon which they depend, and insists that the fact that the illness of the plaintiff's intestate after that date was in continuation of a sickness which began before the adoption of the by-law did not exempt him from the obligation to give the notice therein required. We cannot assent to this proposition. There is nothing in the terms of the by-law indicative of an intention to make it retrospective in its operation. It clearly relates only to sickness or disability commencing thereafter. Even if the defendant association had the power to adopt by-laws which might operate retrospectively (a point not involved in the determination of this case), it did not attempt to exercise it in the by-law in question. There is no evidence that the decedent intended to relinquish his right to the sick benefits for which this suit was brought, and we do not think that an irresistible inference to that effect arises from the manner in which he made out his bills. The burden of proving waiver rests upon the defendant, and in our opinion has not been maintained. The plaintiff claims that he is entitled to interest upon the amount of sick benefits due each month, from time to time, when the defendant met for the payment of bills and sick benefits.

2. Interest is allowable, though not stipulated for, as an invariable legal incident of the principal debt from the day of default, whenever the debtor knows precisely what he is to pay and when he is to pay it. Spencer v. Pierce, 5 R. I. 71; Durfee v. O'Brien, 16 R. I. 213, 14 Atl. 857. But a beneficial association ought not to be treated as a delinquent debtor before demand made upon it, followed by its refusal or neglect. While demand was unnecessary in the circumstances of the case for the purpose of keeping the claim alive, it was necessary for the purpose of creating the relation of debtor and creditor. There being no proof of demand earlier than the date of the writ, interest will be computed from that date.

Case remitted to the superior court, with direction to enter judgment for the plaintiff for $446 and interest, as aforesaid, and costs.

LE MOYNE et al. v. WASHINGTON COUNTY et al.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Nov. 4, 1905.)

1. HIGHWAYS—CONSTRUCTION—APPROVAL BY COURT—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

An order of the court of quarter sessions, based on the finding of the grand jury approving the construction of a county road under Act July 26, 1895 (P. L. 336), can be attacked only on the ground of intentional fraud, practiced on the grand jury and the court by the county commissioners, or by some one in their behalf, and cannot be collaterally attacked on the ground that the estimate of the cost and expenses of the proposed improvement was grossly inadequate, or by a mistake made by witnesses examined before the grand jury in testifying to probable cost of the improvement.

2. SAME—CONFORMITY WITH PLANS.

Under Act June 26, 1895 (P. L. 336), providing for the construction of county roads and the approval of such construction by the court of quarter sessions, it is the duty of the county commissioners to construct the road in accordance with the survey and plans filed in court, but it is not necessary that such plans give the details of the proposed improvement.

3. SAME—DISCRETION OF COMMISSIONERS.

The county commissioners are vested with a discretion in determining whether to accept bids for a fixed sum to complete the road or for a schedule of prices for piecework.

4. SAME—COST OF ROAD—DISCRETION OF COMMISSIONERS.

Act June 26, 1895 (P. L. 336), providing for the construction of county roads, limits the levy that can be made in any one year, and the amount of bonds that may be issued for the construction of the road, but leaves to the discretion of the county commissioners the character of the road to be built and the cost per mile for building it, provided such commissioners act in good faith and do not pay excessive or unreasonable prices for the work done.

5. COUNTIES—MEETINGS OF COMMISSIONERS—FORMAL REQUISITES—VALIDITY OF CONTRACTS.

While county commissioners should keep written minutes of the meetings at which they award road contracts, and such minutes should show when the matter was considered and how each commissioner voted, yet a bid or proposal for the construction of a road may be accepted by a full board after discussion and deliberation, although the agreement to accept it is not arrived at through parliamentary forms; and it is not essential to the legality of the acceptance of the bid that a motion should be formally made and seconded and voted upon.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Washington County.

Bill for injunction by Julius Le Moyne and another against Washington County and others. From a decree in favor of defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

From the record it appeared that on July 17, 1903, the court of quarter sessions made an order approving the construction of a road as a county road, under the act of June 26, 1895 (P. L. 336), from Claysville to Burnsville, a distance of about three miles. This order was based upon the action of the grand jury in approving the construction of the road. The contract for the construction was awarded by the commissioners to Zelt & Bros. After the road was completed the complainants filed a bill in equity, in which they prayed as follows: (1) For an injunction from further carrying out said contract, or any part thereof; (2) that the county commissioners and county treasurer be restrained from issuing or paying any orders on said contract; (3, 4) that the contract be declared illegal and void; (5) that the commissioners be required to answer and to produce on hearing all bids received and the contract executed; (6) for other appropriate relief.

The court found, inter alia, as follows:

"(1) The written estimate of the engineer, John McAdam, of the cost and expenses of the contemplated improvement of this three-mile section of the road laid before the grand jury was $2,739.86 per mile, or $8,219.58 for the three miles of road. The actual cost under the Zelt contract is about $12,600 per mile, or $37,911.66 for the 3 miles and 60 feet. McAdam's estimate was evidently erroneous, not apparently so on its face, but on account of mismeasurements or mistake in calculation made by the person making the written estimate.

"(12) On June 11, 1904, the county commissioners and N. C. Hunter, a contractor, who was a successful bidder for one of the other seven sections of road, the improvement of which the grand jury approved, agreed on a case stated for the opinion of the court to determine whether his contract (and incidentally all the others that had been entered into by the commissioners under like circumstances) was illegal for the reason that the improvement would cost greatly in excess of the estimate submitted to the grand jury. In an opinion and decree of this court on its law side, filed on June 22, 1904, to No. 61, August term, 1904, it was adjudged that the cost of roads constructed under the act of 1895 might legally exceed the estimate submitted to the grand jury, if no fraud was practiced upon the grand jury and the engineer was honestly mistaken in his estimate. Of this opinion and decree the plaintiffs had constructive notice, and no money was paid Zelt & Bros. until after the decree was filed.

"(13) The evidence in this case is not sufficient to show, and it does not show, that the county commissioners, J. F. McClay, S. F. Scott, and J. B. Gibson, either jointly or individually or in collusion with any other person, were guilty of any corrupt practices or actual fraud, or of consciously doing any wrong, either in the letting of the contract for the improvement of the road in question or in the carrying out and performance of that contract.

"(14) The evidence in this case does not show, and none was offered to show, that the sum of $37,911.66 is an excessive and unreasonable price for the construction of the 3 miles and 60 feet of road constructed as the defendants, Zelt & Bros., were required to construct it, nor does it show that $4.40 per cubic yard for putting down six inches broken stone foundation and three inches of ballast in place, when the stone had to be quarried in and near Washington, and transported the long distance to reach the place where they were used, was an excessive and unreasonable price therefor.

"Summary of Adjudication.

"For the convenience of those interested we give a summary of our decision. We hold:

"(1) That the decree of July 17, 1903, of the court of quarter sessions made the section of road in question 'a county road.'

"(2) That all proceedings which led up to that decree were regular in form.

"(3) That neither the validity of the finding of the grand jury on which the decree is founded, nor the decree itself, could be questioned in this proceeding, except on the ground that intentional fraud was practiced upon the grand jury and court by the county commissioners, who are defendants in this case, or by some one in their behalf, and there is no such allegation in the plaintiffs' bill.

"(4) The decree based on the finding of the grand jury, like a judgment based on the verdict of a petit jury, cannot at this late day be collaterally attacked on the ground that the estimate of the cost and expenses of the proposed improvement of this section of road was grossly inaccurate, or that some witness examined before the grand jury was mistaken in what he said or submitted to them as to the probable cost of said road improvement.

"(5) The section of road in question being decreed 'a county road,' the county commissioners had power, and it was their duty, to improve it, as indicated on the survey and plans filed in court and submitted to the grand jury, and it was not legally necessary that the plans give the details of the proposed improvement.

"(6) It was a matter in the discretion of the county commissioners whether bids be taken for a fixed sum, to complete the improvement or for a schedule of prices for the work to be done by the piece.

"(7) It was a matter in their discretion to determine to what bidder they would award the contract, and if they, after inquiry, believed that the lowest bidder was not responsible, they could reject him.

"(8) There is no evidence in this case that the county commissioners corruptly or fraudulently rejected the lowest bidder or abused the discretion vested in them.

"(9) County commissioners ought to keep written minutes of their meetings at which they award contracts to improve county roads, which would show when the matter was considered and how each commissioner voted, and they are censurable for not doing so; but a bid or a proposal can be legally accepted by a full board after discussion and deliberation by an agreement not arrived at through parliamentary forms. A motion formally made and seconded and voted upon is not necessary to the legality of the agreement of all the members of the board that the bid of a particular bidder shall be accepted.

"(10) That the bid of Zelt & Bros. was legally accepted by the full board after discussion and deliberation, and the written contract executed in pursuance thereof by affixing the seal of the county and the signatures of a majority of the commissioners thereto, is binding on the county.

"(11) The evidence shows that the commissioners went about the improvement of the roads that were decreed 'county roads,' not having in view any limit upon the cost of the improvement, but on the theory that the improvement must be made at whatever expense to the county they would cost at prevailing prices for work and material; but it does not show that they were guilty of any corruption or actual fraud in the matter, or had any intention of illegally spending the county's money.

"(12) The act of 1895, commonly known as the 'Finn Law,' puts a limit on the levy that can be made in any one year, and on the amount of bonds that may be issued, but it does not indicate the character of road that shall be built, or limit the cost per mile for building it. That is left largely to the discretion of the county commissioners, subject, of course, to the limitation that is upon all public officers who are quasi trustees, that they act in good faith and do not pay excessive and unreasonable prices for the kind of work they have done. This makes it possible to have 'high-priced road' commissioners and 'low-priced road' commissioners; and whether $3,000 per mile or $13,000 per mile roads shall be built is not a question of law, to be settled by a court of equity in an injunction proceeding, but a political question or a question of public policy, to be settled by the taxpaying voters at the polls, when they elect county commissioners.

"(13) The evidence shows that Zelt & Bros. had completed the work under their contract before this bill was filed, and there is no evidence that they had any knowledge of any irregularity of action or misconduct on the part of the county commissioners, or that the prices they charged in the aggregate for the work they did is excessive and unreasonable; and the plaintiffs' remedy is, not to enjoin the payment of their claim by the county, but to pursue the county commissioners on the law side of the court, if they have done any wrong in the premises that makes them liable for mispending the county's money.

"(14) The plaintiffs delayed filing their bill until after the rights of innocent parties had intervened, and by their laches have lost their right to the remedy of injunction, if they ever had it."

The court dismissed the bill.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

Boyd Crumrine, James P. Eagleson, E. E. Crumrine, and N. R. Criss, for appellants. T. F. Birch, for appellees McClay and Scott. Norman E. Clark, W. S. Parker, and Winfield McIlvaine, for appellees Zelt & Bros.

PER CURIAM. The decree is affirmed, on the summary of adjudication by the learned court below.

KREAMER v. VONEIDA et al.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Oct. 30, 1905.)

1. TAXATION—EJECTMENT—PROOF OF POSSESSION—NECESSITY.

Act March 29, 1824 (P. L. 168), provides that any person wishing to bring ejectment for unseated land which has been sold for taxes may serve the writ on the purchaser, and if the purchaser cannot be found in the proper county then the court may grant a rule on defendant to appear and plead, which rule shall be published, etc., and if no person appears the court may give judgment by default, but if the purchaser appears the cause shall be tried as though there was an actual occupation of the land. Held that, where plaintiff does not comply with the statute and defendant is not served with process or given notice to appear, but enters a voluntary appearance, the statute is without application, and plaintiff is entitled to judgment only on proof of title in himself and of possession of the lands by defendant.

2. EJECTMENT — RETURN OF PROCESS — PRESUMPTIONS.

A sheriff's return to a writ of ejectment which showed that the land was unoccupied, and that defendant did not reside in the county and had no agent therein, and that notice of suit was given defendant in another county, and a record showing appearance for defendant, but failing to show publication of a rule on defendant to appear and plead, in accordance with Act April 14, 1851 (P. L. 612), and Act April 13, 1858 (P. L. 256), raised no presumption that defendant was in possession of the land described in the writ.

3. ABANDONMENT—EFFECT.

A perfect title passing by the commonwealth's patent is not affected by the doctrine of abandonment, unless, in consequence of such abandonment, adverse possession is taken by another and held for the limitation period.

Appeal from Superior Court.

Action by J. L. Kreamer against William Voneida and others. From a judgment of the Superior Court, reversing a judgment for plaintiff, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before DEAN, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, and ELKIN, JJ.

A. O. Furst and J. C. Meyer, for appellant. John Blanchard, Edmund Blanchard, and Andrew A. Leiser, for appellees.

BROWN, J. The plaintiff below claimed title to the land in controversy—108 acres and 158 perches situated in Haines township, Center county—under a patent from the commonwealth to Henry Hess, issued December 12, 1821. On August 12, 1796, a patent was issued to Aaron Levy on a warrant granted to Joseph Henry July 24, 1792, for 400 acres and 52 perches, and it was admitted on the trial that the land called for in the Hess patent was embraced within the lines of the Levy patent. One of the defenses set up was this outstanding title granted by the commonwealth more than 25 years before the patent was issued to Hess. With nothing more, this was, as was properly held by the superior court, a complete defense, for the plaintiff could recover only on the strength of his own title. Kreamer v. Voneida, 24 Pa. Super. Ct. 347. Another defense was that the plaintiff had not proved possession of the land by Voneida, the real defendant. The writ had not been served on him; the return of the sheriff being as follows: "As to William Voneida, he not being found in the county of Center, and that the lands described in the within writ are located in said county of Center and are unoccupied, and that the said William Voneida does not reside in the county in which said lands are located and has no known agent or person having the charge or superintendency of said lands resident within the county of Center, and notice of said suit was given personally to William Voneida at Laurelton, Union county, Pa., as directed by the act of April 13, 1858, and a copy was given him of within writ." These two defenses, resting on undisputed facts, were made the subject of two points asking that a verdict be directed for the defendants. The points were reserved and a verdict directed for the plaintiff. Subsequently judgment was entered on the verdict. The question of the plaintiff's right to recover, in the absence of any proof of the possession of the land by Voneida, was not considered by the court in the opinion directing judgment to be entered on the verdict, and, as to the other defenses, the trial judge was of opinion that the Levy title was derelict and abandoned, and that the defendants could not therefore set it up against the Hess title. On appeal to the superior court the judgment below was reversed and a new trial awarded. From this judgment the appeal of the plaintiff below is before us.

From the sheriff's return it affirmatively appears that Voneida was not an occupant of the land, and was not in the county at the time the writ was served. It was served on him in Union county, the return being that it had been served as directed by the act of April 13, 1858 (P. L. 256); but, as the directions of the act of April 14, 1851 (P. L. 612), to which the act of 1858 is but a supplement, had not been complied with, the service was ineffectual to bring the defendant within the jurisdiction of the court. This seems to be admitted by the appellant. On this appeal, however, the position is taken, and apparently for the first time, that as the defendant voluntarily appeared the plaintiff was not required to prove that he was in possession of the land, and the fourth section of the act of March 29, 1824 (P. L. 168) is cited in support of this. That section provides: "That any person wishing to bring an ejectment for land on which no person resides and which lands have been sold for taxes, may bring his action and serve the writ on the person who purchased the said lands; and if such person cannot be found in the proper county, then the court, after the return day of the writ, may, on motion of the plaintiff or his attorney, grant a rule on the defendant, describing the premises, to appear and plead, which rule shall be published for sixty days successively, before the return day thereof, in a weekly or daily newspaper of the proper county; and if no person appears, then the court, on proof of the publication, shall, on motion in open court, at the stated term, give judgment by default; but when the purchaser appears, or some person claiming under him, the court shall cause the person or his legal representative so claiming under the purchaser to be made defendant, and the cause shall be proceeded in and tried on respective titles of the parties as fully as if there was an actual occupation of the land." As the directions of the act of 1824 had not been complied with by the plaintiff, he is not in a position to ask for its application. The case as presented is one of a voluntary appearance by a defendant in an action of ejectment, without service of the writ upon him or notice given as directed by any statute to appear and plead to the action. The appearance having been voluntary, he waived service of the writ, and would be bound by a judgment against him, to which, however, the plaintiff would be entitled only by proof of title in himself and possession by the defendant of the lands in controversy. The act of 1807 relieves the plaintiff from the burden of proving possession by the defendant, if there was a return of service by the sheriff; but, when there is no service and the defendant voluntarily appears, possession by him must be established by the plaintiff as a condition of his right to recover. McIntire v. Wing et al., 113 Pa. 67, 4 Atl. 197. That case is conclusive that the plaintiff ought not to have been allowed to recover. There, as here, there was no service by the sheriff, but the defendants voluntarily appeared, and, in affirming the judgment of nonsuit entered because the plaintiff failed to show that the defendants were in possession of the land, we said: "There is no error in the refusal of the court to take off the compulsory nonsuit. The evidence wholly failed to show that the defendants were in possession of the land in question. They were not served with the writ by the sheriff. The presumption of possession created by the statute, when the sheriff makes return under oath that he has duly served the writ on the defendants, does not exist. While an appearance and plea by counsel may lead to a verdict and judgment against the defendants, yet on the trial it is necessary to prove that they were in possession of the premises. Failing in this, the nonsuit was properly entered. This view makes it unnecessary to consider the other questions."

The trial judge was of opinion that the Levy title could not prevail against the Hess patent, because the failure of Levy, or of any one under him, to assert his title for over 100 years, was such "dereliction" as would now estop any one claiming under him to set up the title as a valid and subsisting one. On this appeal the learned counsel for appellant zealously urges that the Levy title "has become derelict and is non-subsisting," and Riland v. Eckert, 23 Pa. 215, is cited and pressed upon our attention as conclusive of the contention that it cannot prevail against the Hess title. In that case the land belonging to the estate of Judge James Wilson, deceased, had been sold on a judgment obtained against his administrators, without notice to his heirs, and in an ejectment brought against the persons in possession they undertook to defend on the outstanding title, which they alleged was still in the heirs, as the sale by the sheriff had been on a judgment against the administrators alone, which did not divest their title. All that was decided in that case was that the defendants had no right to take the place of the heirs and avail themselves of an irregularity which the heirs might have chosen to waive. The plaintiffs, who purchased the land at the sheriff's sale, took a title which was not void as to any except the heirs and the devisees of the deceased, and, if they did not question the sale, strangers could not. As to the heirs, who alone could have raised the question of the regularity of the sale, the title may have become abandoned or derelict, but as to them Woodward, J., says: "When a party shall present himself claiming under the heirs of Judge Wilson, it will be soon enough to consider the effect of the long delay and inaction which have attended their title, and to decide whether they are concluded or not, but until that happens the inquiry will be impertinent and superfluous." A different situation is presented here, and what is said in Riland v. Eckert has no application. A prior valid outstanding title from the commonwealth to another confronts the plaintiff, which has not been divested by any act of the original grantee, nor by any proceeding against him, his personal representatives, or any one claiming under him. Such a perfect title passing by the commonwealth's patent is in no danger from the doctrine of abandonment, unless, in consequence of abandonment, adverse possession is taken by another and held for the period of the statute of limitations. This abundantly appears in Hoffman v. Bell, 61 Pa. 444, Bear Valley Coal Co. v. Dewart, 95 Pa. 72, Putnam v. Tyler, 117 Pa. 570, 12 Atl. 43, and the other cases cited in the opinion of the superior court.

The evidence of adverse possession by the plaintiff was insufficient to establish title under the statute, and the superior court so held; but, instead of remitting the record with direction that judgment be entered for the defendant non obstante veredicto, a new trial has been ordered. As there is no appeal by the defendants from this order, we cannot interfere with it, though urged by them to do so, and the judgment of the superior court is therefore affirmed. On another trial the plaintiff may be able to present such a case as will entitle him to recover.

Judgment affirmed.

STRICKER et al. v. McDONNELL.
(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Oct. 30, 1905.)

1. MORTGAGES—SATISFACTION—DISCHARGE OF DEBT.

A mortgage is a separate obligation for the debt which it secures, and is only collateral security for the same; and suit, judgment, and satisfaction on it is not a discharge of the obligation of the mortgage bond, unless the debt is satisfied.

2. SAME—SATISFACTION OF DEBT.

Defendant gave a mortgage to secure a part of the price for land, which, after reciting the bond, provided that for the better securing the payment thereof, "and in discharge of the obligation above recited," have granted, etc. Held, that a sale under the mortgage was not a satisfaction of the bond.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Cambria County.

Action by Clara V. Stricker and Oscar J. Stricker, executors of Julius Stricker, against J. J. McDonnell. From a judgment making absolute a rule for judgment for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

In October, 1892, J. J. McDonnell gave a bond and mortgage to secure payment of balance of purchase money due Dr. Julius Stricker. McDonnell defaulted in payment of amount covered by the bond and mortgage, a sci. fa. was issued upon the mortgage, a judgment entered thereon, execution issued, and the property sold for $25. Subsequently judgment was confessed upon the bond. The plaintiff having died, his executors were substituted, and caused a sci. fa. to issue for the purpose of reviving and continuing the lien of said judgment. To this action an affidavit of defense was filed, in which it was alleged that the bond was canceled and the debt discharged by the sale had through proceedings upon the mortgage. The terms of the mortgage are stated in the opinion of the Supreme Court. The court made absolute rule for judgment for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

Thomas J. Itell, for appellant. Frederick A. Sobernheimer, for appellees.

PER CURIAM. A bond and mortgage are separate obligations, though for the payment of the same debt. The mortgage, though in fact usually the more important item in the transaction, is in form and legal effect only collateral security for the bond; and suit, judgment, and satisfaction upon it is not a discharge of the obligation of the bond, unless the debt itself is satisfied. Ayres v. Watson, 57 Pa. 380.

The mortgage in the present case, which was for part of the purchase money of the same land conveyed by plaintiff's testator to defendant, after reciting the bond continued: "Now this indenture witnesseth that the said party of the first part, as well for and in consideration of the premises as of the aforesaid debt, * * * and for the better securing the payment thereof unto the said party of the second part, executors, administrators, and assigns in discharge of the said obligation above recited, * * * hath granted," etc. The appellant claims that the effect of the words "in discharge of the said obligation above recited"—i. e., the bond—is that a sale under the mortgage is a satisfaction of the bond. But there is nothing in the language to sustain such a departure from the presumed purpose in giving the double obligation, nor is any such intention of the parties set forth in the affidavit of defense, which rests the satisfaction on the claim as a conclusion of law that the sale under the mortgage "operates as a legal and just extinguishment and payment of the said indebtedness." But this is not the legal and usual operation of such a sale, nor, as already said, is the language such as to imply an intention of the parties to that effect. On the contrary, the words as already quoted are "in consideration of the premises [the recital of the debt and the bond] as of the aforesaid debt * * * and for the better securing the payment thereof." It is the payment of the debt which is to discharge the other obligation, to wit, the bond, to which the mortgage is legally only a collateral security. Though the wording is a little different, the purpose is the same that is expressed in the more common form.

Judgment affirmed.

McCULLOUGH v. FORD NATURAL GAS CO.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Oct. 30, 1905.)

1. CORPORATIONS — REPRESENTATION BY AGENTS — AUTHORITY OF AGENT — DISPOSITION OF ASSETS.

Where plaintiff company placed its supervising manager in charge of its gas well, he could not turn over to himself, as president of a competing company, without right or authority, the property confided to his care by plaintiff, without notice, and then claim that the company of which he was president held an adverse title.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 12, Cent. Dig. Corporations, § 1863.]

2. ACTION—CONTRACT OR TORT.

Where the manager of a natural gas company wrongfully turned into the line of a competing gas company, of which he was president, natural gas, the company of which he was manager could maintain assumpsit against the latter company for the gas.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Armstrong County.

Action by R. A. McCullough, receiver of the Manufacturers' Natural Gas Company, against the Ford Natural Gas Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The following is the opinion of Thomas, P. J., in the court below on the rule for a new trial:

"While a number of reasons, mostly with reference to the answers of points, are assigned for the granting of a new trial, but two were urged therefor upon argument. It was urged there, as upon the trial, that the plaintiff must first establish his title to the well from which the gas was produced by an action in ejectment before bringing this action for compensation for the gas taken; and, secondly, that the plaintiff had mistaken his form of action, as assumpsit would not lie. There is no doubt but that, if defendant were in adverse possession under a claim of title, that question must first be determined by an action of ejectment before an action for the gas taken would lie, and such is the trend of all of the authorities cited by defendant upon this subject. The trouble with this case is that the facts do not meet the very necessary element of being in adverse possession.

"The fact is that the plaintiff company placed its supervising manager in charge of the property, and it never had any notice of any adverse claim of title until this suit was brought. The said manager happened to be the president of the defendant company, if, indeed, he was not the company itself. Now, the said manager could not turn over to himself, as president, without right or authority, the property of plaintiff without any notice, and then claim that the company of which he is president holds or claims to have an adverse title. John Wick, Jr., was the manager of the company that owned this well. If he, as president of the defendant company, undertook to acquire title or possession, or both, of the well, and did so without any authority of law, he got for the defendant no title, and the defendant company had ample notice thereof and was bound thereby. The defendant took no title and was bound to know that fact, and cannot set up such claim of title for the purpose of putting plaintiff to his possessory action. No such title is so acquired as to require an action of ejectment to try it. As well might a gas company enter a stranger's property and take gas therefrom, having first taken a lease from one of its own officers who assumed to act as attorney in fact for the real owner, but had no such authority conferred upon him, and then, when sued for the value of the gas taken, attempt to raise the question of adverse title. The knowledge of John Wick, Jr., was the knowledge of the defendant company, and, this being true, they were bound to know, as the testimony shows, that it had no claim of title which it could possibly interpose to prevent recovery and require a determination of by a possessory action. From their own showing as to claim of title there is nothing to be tried by ejectment.

"As to the second question raised, it will be readily admitted that assumpsit will not lie to try title to the product of real estate where defendant is in possession under a claim of title. That was not the question involved, and we trust defendants would more readily appreciate their position if they once came to see that they were not in adverse possession, but what actual possession they had was by the act or permission of plaintiff's manager and for the purpose of conveying the gas from the said well to its own line. It is true that the same man was defendant's president, and that seems to have been confusing enough to lead defendants to believe that the action taken by that individual was the action of the defendant company, without regard to the relation he bore to the plaintiff's company. John Wick, Jr., was plaintiff's manager, and when he, as such and without any notice to the plaintiff that he was acting in any other capacity, turned the gas into the defendant's line, his conduct was not other as relates to the defendant, of which he was president, than if he had been an entire stranger to defendant, and only acting in the capacity of an officer of plaintiff. Indeed, the defendant is in a worse position, if possible, for it was bound by all the knowledge of the rights of plaintiff within the knowledge of its president, which knowledge was undoubtedly more extensive than defendant would ordinarily have been able to acquire with reference to a company whose members were all strangers.

"We really have the fact of plaintiff's manager turning its gas over to defendant, who receives and consumes the same, and in such case is liable to answer for the value thereof in assumpsit as on an implied or constructive contract. But, had defendant taken and consumed the gas without permission of plaintiff's officer, the plaintiff might waive the tort and sue in assumpsit. We find here the relation existing to be that of the plaintiff owning the well of the defendant using the gas, and in possession to no other extent than was necessary for the purpose of taking and using the gas. This is a state of facts from which the jury should imply a promise to pay. In the case of Hertzog v. Hertzog, 29 Pa. 465, the court says, after defining constructive, implied, and express contracts: 'The law ordinarily presumes or implies a contract whenever this is necessary to account for other relations found to have existed between the parties. * * * Every induction, inference, implication, or presumption in reasoning of any kind, is a logical conclusion derived from, and demanded by, certain data or ascertained circumstances. If such circumstances demand the conclusion of a contract to account for them, a contract is proved; if not, not.'

"The facts in this case were ample to support a contract by presumption or implication, without the proof of an express contract. The very transaction of defendant with plaintiff's manager in acquiring the gas was itself a promise, and would support an action of assumpsit. As was said in the case of Adams v. Columbian Steamboat Company, 3 Whart. 75: 'The transaction includes the promise to pay, if the article is obtained. I do not say it is inferred. Though nothing is said, the transaction is itself a promise, as distinctly understood as if uttered; but if it was an inference, still it was for the jury and not for the court.' Had the act of defendant been one purely of trover and conversion, it being shown that plaintiff converted the gas, plaintiff might have waived the tort and sued in assumpsit, the same as where there is a contract express or implied. 2 Ency. Pl. & Pr. p. 1022; Boyer v. Bullard et al., 102 Pa. 555; Bethlehem Bor- ough v. Perseverance Fire Company, 81 Pa. 445; Pryor v. Morgan, 170 Pa. 568, 83 Atl. 98.

"We are persuaded that both of these questions must be decided against the contention of defendant, and, as no other was raised upon argument, the rule is discharged and a new trial is refused."

Judgment was entered on the verdict. Plaintiff appealed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

M. F. Leason and C. E. Harrington, for appellant. H. A. Heilman and R. A. McCullough, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. This judgment is affirmed, on the opinion of the court below refusing a new trial.

SONTGEN v. KITTANNING & F. C. ST. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Oct. 30, 1905.)

STREET RAILROADS — INJURY TO CHILD ON TRACK.

Where a child five years old was playing behind a pile of earth about five feet from a street railway track, and suddenly ran out on the track when the car was not more than four feet away, a nonsuit in an action against the railway company was properly granted.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 44, Cent. Dig. Street Railroads, § 202.]

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Armstrong County.

Action by Paul Henry Sontgen against the Kittanning & Ford City Street Railway Company. From an order refusing to take off nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

R. A. McCullough, H. A. Heilman, and J. D. Daugherty, for appellant. Ross Reynolds, James H. McCain, and W. J. Christy, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. The evidence failed to show any negligence on the part of the defendant. The only witness called who saw the accident testified that the child was playing behind a pile of earth about five or six feet from the track, and suddenly ran out on the track when the car was not more than four feet away. The case belongs to the class of Chilton v. Central Traction Co., 152 Pa. 425, 25 Atl. 606; Funk v. Electric Traction Co., 175 Pa. 559, 34 Atl. 861; Kline v. Electric Traction Co., 181 Pa. 276, 37 Atl. 522; Callary v. Easton Transit Co., 185 Pa. 176, 39 Atl. 813; and Miller v. Union Traction Co., 198 Pa. 639, 48 Atl. 864. As this is decisive of the whole case, the other questions do not require notice.

Judgment affirmed.

BIDDISON et al. v. AARON.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Nov. 16, 1905.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES — SURFACE WATERS—DRAINAGE—EASEMENTS.

A purchaser of a lot acquires no easement of drainage over other lands of his grantor used by the grantor to drain the lot conveyed, where such use of the premises by the grantor was neither visible and apparent, nor necessary to the enjoyment of the lot conveyed, which could be drained within its own lines.

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS — SALES OF LAND—VACATION—GROUNDS.

An administrator's sale of a lot and building situated thereon will be set aside at the instance of the purchaser, where it did not include a tract of land and one-story building situated to the rear of the premises conveyed, which were used as a part of such premises, and which the purchaser, who had known the property for years, and had known that the one-story building was used as a part of the building conveyed, had reason to believe was included in the sale, and which was essential to the reasonable enjoyment of the premises for the purpose contemplated by the purchaser.

3. SAME.

The fact that the purchaser did not ask for information as to the one-story building was immaterial, where the administrators would have been unable to give such information.

Appeal from Orphans' Court, Baltimore County; Melchor Hoshall and Wm. Byerly, Judges.

Exceptions by George Aaron, purchaser, to the ratification of a sale made to him by John S. Biddison and another, as administrators of Frederick W. Koenig, deceased. From an order setting aside the sale, the administrators appeal. Affirmed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and FOWLER, BRISCOE, BOYD, PAGE, PEARCE, SCHMUCKER, and JONES, JJ.

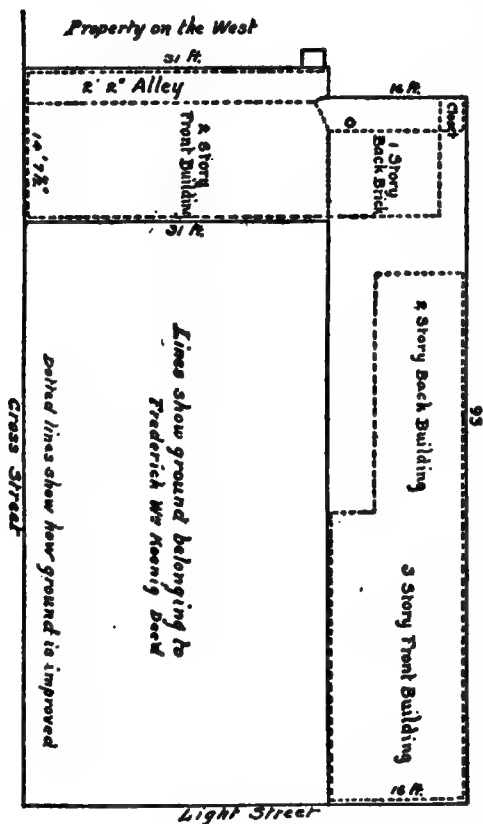

Edward L. Ward, for appellants. Charles Herzog, for appellee.

PEARCE, J. This is an appeal from an order of the orphans' court of Baltimore county refusing to ratify and setting aside the sale of a certain parcel of leasehold property in Baltimore City, made under the order of said court by John S. Biddison and John G. Rogers, administrators of Frederick William Koenig, deceased.

Exceptions were filed to the ratification of said sale, by the appellee as purchaser of the parcel designated as No. 48, East Cross street. The first ground of exception was that, while the advertisement read at the sale stated that the property in question was subject to a right of way and a right of drainage over an alley to be kept open on the western side of said lot for the benefit of said lot and the adjoining property on the west, the purchaser had discovered since the sale that the property was also subject to a right of drainage through said alley in favor of other property on the east, of which no notice was given at the sale and of which the purchaser had no knowledge, and that this drainage from the property on the east brought such quantities of water as to overflow the cellar upon the lot sold and render the property unfit for the business of the appellee. The second ground of exception was that, if the sale as reported is ratified, the purchaser will not acquire what he believed and had reason to believe he was buying, because, in the language of the exception, "the visible property and improvements, as used and occupied, consist of a two-story brick store and dwelling, and a one-story back building, with an area about three feet wide along the said back building leading to the privy closet used in connection with the buildings to which the same is attached and appurtenant, and of which the same is a part; that the lot of ground reported as sold to this exceptant does not include the said back building, nor the areaway and privy closet, without which the building reported to be sold to this exceptant is altogether useless for ordinary purposes of habitation."

The facts of the case and the contention of the appellee will be made plain by reference to the following plat:

As to the first exception, there is not a particle of evidence in the record of any grant of the alleged easement or right of drainage by Koenig, as the owner of the Cross street lot, as well as of the Light street lot, or by any other former owner, in favor of the Light street property on the east. It does appear that there is a drain pipe under the one-story back building in the rear of the Cross street lot, the mouth of which discharges into the areaway alongside of this back building, leading into the alley on the west side of the Cross street lot, and which is indicated on the plat by the small circle near the south end of the areaway; but there is absolutely nothing to show what property it was designated to drain, or actually does drain. Even if it did appear that it actually drained the Light street property of Koenig, there is nothing in the record to sustain the alleged easement as arising by an implied grant. In Ellason v. Grove, 85 Md. 225, 38 Atl. 845, it was said: "As long as one person owned both properties, it could not properly be said that an easement existed in favor of one of them, as the owner could not have an easement in his own land. But, whilst that is true, it is also well settled that if, during the unity of ownership, the owner of two properties uses one for the benefit of the other in such manner as would have given rise to the presumption that an easement existed if the tenements had been held by different persons, then, upon a conveyance of the property so used, an easement will be granted to the purchaser, provided the use has been such that the easement resulting from it would be of the class known as continuous and apparent, and would be necessary for the reasonable enjoyment of the property conveyed." And in Burns v. Gallagher, 62 Md. 471, it is said: "Such necessity cannot be deemed to exist, if a similar way or easement may be secured by reasonable trouble or expense, and especially not if the necessary way or easement can be provided through the grantor's own property." Here the existence of the alleged easement, or of the user of the two properties which might have given rise to the presumption of such easement, was unknown to the administrators of Koenig, whose duty it was to exercise reasonable care to acquaint themselves with, and to inform purchasers of, the situation and condition of the several properties they were selling. It was unknown to the purchaser of the Cross street property, who had known the property for over 20 years, and had been on the premises more than once during that period. No one testifies to its existence, and it cannot therefore be deemed visible and apparent as required by the authorities. There is no evidence that the Light street property cannot be drained to Light street within its own lines; and if it can be so drained, the easement over the Cross street lot cannot be deemed necessary to the enjoyment of the Light street property. For aught that appears, therefore, either upon the theory of actual or implied grant, the alleged easement is without pretense of authority, and this exception cannot be sustained.

Coming to the second exception, it is perfectly plain from all the testimony in the case that the exceptant cannot acquire under this sale the property he believed he was buying. The advertisement which he heard read at the sale describes this lot as fronting on Cross street 14 feet $7\frac{1}{2}$ inches, with a depth of 31 feet, and improved by a two-story brick dwelling with store front, without any mention of a back building, and the plat shows that the one-story back building and the privy closet are not within the lines of that lot, but are within the lines of the Light street lot, sold the same day to Obrecht, which fronts on Light street 16 feet with a depth of 93 feet. It appears from the testimony that before the back building was put up, the closet in the rear of this lot was used in common by the occupants of this lot and of the adjoining lot on the west, and that after Koenig bought the Cross street lot he put up the back building on the Light street lot sold to Obrecht at this sale, joining it to the rear wall of the two-story building on the Cross street lot, and connecting it therewith by a door in the rear wall of the two-story building, and that ever since its erection, for over 20 years, it had been used as a kitchen to the Cross street building, and as a means of access for the occupants of that building to the closet in the areaway. The advertisement of the Light street lot is not in the record, but the testimony shows that the dimensions advertised were 16x93 feet, and the improvements were described as a three-story brick dwelling and store front with a two-story back building. Neither advertisement made any reference to the one-story back building within the lines of the Light street lot, and in the rear of the Cross street lot. Neither of the administrators knew when the property was advertised, nor at the time of the sale, of the existence of this one-story back building. Mr. Biddison testified that he did not know at the time of the advertisement and sale that there was a one-story building on the Light street lot, and that he did not know there was such a building in the rear of the Cross street lot. Mr. Rogers testified that at the time of the sale he did not know anything about this one-story back building, nor of the character of improvements on any of the lots, and that the preparation of the advertisements was left entirely to Mr. Ward, by whom they were sent to the administrators. Mr. Biddison also said that these titles were "mixed up," and that they thought it best to advertise by metes and bounds, so there would be no mistake, and that if they had known this one-story building was on the Light street lot he thinks they would not have so advertised it, and if they had known of its existence and that it had been used for 20 years as a kitchen in connection with the Cross street house, he does not think they would have mentioned it, in selling that lot, because of the fact that those titles were mixed up, and that they thought they did all they could when they described the property by metes and bounds, so that bidders could determine what improvements were included within these respective metes and bounds. The Light street lot was sold first to Frederick Obrecht, as 16x93 feet, imposed by a three-story brick dwelling with store front, and a two-story back building. He testified that when he bought this property he did not think the one-story back building was in the 93 feet of ground, and that he did not think he was getting it in that purchase. The Cross street lot was offered next, and Obrecht bid \$1,500 for that, but testified that he then thought if he became the purchaser he would get the one-story building on the rear, and that if he had not already purchased the Light street lot he would not have bid at all upon the Cross street lot. The exceptant testified that he knew the property for years; that the front and back building had always been used as one property, and when he became the purchaser he thought he was getting the whole as used. His brother, who bid for him, testified that he thought he was bidding for the whole, and that if he had known the kitchen, the closet, and the yard were not going with it, he would not have bid at all for the exceptant.

This recital of the undisputed evidence makes it plain that this exceptant cannot secure under this sale what he thought he was buying, and what we think he had reason to believe he was buying. It is equally clear that what he cannot thus secure constitutes a very material part of the value of the whole, and is essential to its reasonable enjoyment for the purpose contemplated in the purchase, and we are forced to the conclusion that purchaser should not be required to take the property. It was argued in support of this sale that as the advertisement only mentioned a two-story brick building, and as the dimensions of the lot advertised did not embrace the one-story building, and as the administrators required the auctioneer to ask if bidders desired any information, that the exceptant should have asked for information as to this building, and that his predicament is to be imputed alone to his failure to do so, and therefore he should not now be relieved at the expense of those entitled to the proceeds of sale. But this argument cannot avail in this case, since the administrators, by their own statement, would have been unable to give information upon this point if it had been sought. This sufficiency appears from the testimony already referred to, but it is emphasized by Mr. Biddison in his cross-examination, who, when asked what he would have said if Mr. Aaron out of abundant precaution had asked if this back building went with the Cross street lot, replied, "I would have told him whatever the description covered goes with it," and that if asked by Obrecht whether that back building went with the Light street lot, replied, "I could not say, because I do not know." The principle which should be applied is stated in Ellicott v. White, 43 Md. 151, where it was said: "Any one examining the property and seeing the buildings standing upon a lot which abutted upon three streets and was completely inclosed by fences as one entire lot, would naturally and reasonably suppose that it constituted but one parcel, and that the whole was to pass with the buildings, unless informed to the contrary by the owner, whose duty we think it was so to inform the purchaser, or unless information to the contrary was derived from some other source." And in Keating v. Price, 58 Md. 534, this court cites the rule laid down by Chancellor Kent as follows: "The good sense and equity of the law on this subject is that if the defect of title, whether of land or chattels, be so great as to render the thing sold unfit for the use intended, and not within the inducement to the purchase, the purchaser ought not to be held to the contract." If the courts will not permit one individual, in contravention of this rule, to force a purchase upon another, they should be careful not to allow agents conducting sales for the court, to do so.

For the reason stated, the order of the orphans' court of Baltimore county will be affirmed.

Order affirmed, with costs to the appellee above and below.

BERNHEIMER BROS. v. BECKER.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Nov. 23, 1905.)

1. TRIAL—EXCEPTIONS—WAIVER.

The benefit of an exception to the court's refusal to take the case from the jury at the close of plaintiff's testimony is lost to defendant by proceeding with the case and failing to again raise the question by asking for the same instruction at the close of the whole testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trial, § 983.]

2. FALSE IMPRISONMENT—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

Any deprivation of the liberty of another without his consent, whether by violence, threats, or otherwise, constitutes an imprisonment, within the meaning of the law.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 23, Cent. Dig. False Imprisonment, §§ 1-4.]

3. SAME—ACTS OF AGENT—LIABILITY OF PRINCIPAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for arrest and false imprisonment, an instruction requiring the jury to find, as a prerequisite to plaintiff's recovery, her arrest by an employé in defendants' store, and her detention and search by him in the presence and by the direction of one of defendant partners, as the agent and servant of the defendants, and within the scope of his authority, and in charge of the department of the store from which she was charged with stealing certain goods, but failing to mention the other partner, or requiring a concurrence in or ratification by him of the acts complained of, or instructing as to what state of facts would justify the conclusion that such employé acted within the scope of his authority as agent of defendants in his conduct towards plaintiff, was error.

4. SAME—IMPLIED AUTHORITY OF AGENT.

An agent or employé about an ordinary business has no implied authority to arrest and search customers, suspected of stealing, in the store of his principal, so as to make the principal liable for false imprisonment.

5. SAME—IMPLIED POWER OF PARTNER.

A partner in an ordinary mercantile business has no implied power to bind his copartner by his acts in arresting and searching one suspected of stealing goods in the partnership store, so as to make the copartner liable with him for false imprisonment.

6. SAME—MEASURE OF DAMAGES—PUNITIVE DAMAGES—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for the arrest and false imprisonment of plaintiff, charged with stealing goods while in defendants' store, an instruction authorizing the awarding of such damages as would not only compensate plaintiff for the wrong and indignity sustained by her in consequence of defendants' wrongful acts, but also exemplary or punitive damages, following an instruction that any deprivation of the liberty of another without his consent constituted an imprisonment within the meaning of the law, was erroneous, in not requiring a finding, as a condition of awarding punitive damages, that the alleged wrongs to plaintiff were inflicted maliciously or wantonly, or with circumstances of contumely and indignity.

7. SAME—RATIFICATION BY COPARTNER—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Where, in an action for the false arrest and imprisonment of plaintiff, charged with stealing goods from the store of defendant partners, it appeared that plaintiff was detained and searched by direction of one of the partners, evidence that after the release of plaintiff her husband complained to the other partner of the treatment accorded to the plaintiff, and that such other partner, after making inquiry as to the facts, ordered plaintiff's husband out of the store, was insufficient to prove a concurrence in or ratification by him of the alleged wrongful acts of his copartner and the employé acting under the latter's direction.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas: George M. Sharp, Judge.

Action by Lena Becker against Bernheimer Bros. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BRISCOE, BOYD, PAGE, PEARCE, SCHMUCKER, JONES, and BURKE, JJ.

Randolph Barton, Jr., for appellants. Richard A. Miller, Jr., and John C. Kumpf, for appellee.

SCHMUCKER, J. The appellee, Lena Becker, sued the appellants, individually and as copartners, in the court of common pleas of Baltimore City for damages for an assault and battery and a false arrest and imprisonment. The two causes of action were alleged in separate counts in the narr. The appellants, as defendants below, pleaded non cul. The trial of the case resulted in a judgment for the plaintiff, from which they appealed.

Two exceptions appear in the record. The first was taken to the court's refusal to withdraw the case from the jury at the close of the plaintiff's testimony, but the defendants lost the benefit of that exception by going on with their case and failing to again raise the question by asking for the same instruction at the close of the whole testimony. Barabass v. Kabat, 91 Md. 53, 46 Atl. 337; B. & O. R. R. v. State, Use of Logsdon, 101 Md. —, 61 Atl. 189. The second exception brings up for review the rulings of the lower court on the prayers offered at the close of the case, and the special exceptions taken to some of them.

In order to properly pass upon the questions presented by this exception, it will be necessary to advert to the more important facts appearing in the evidence. It appears from the records that the appellants, Ferdinand and Herman Bernheimer, as copartners, conduct a department store in Baltimore City, and Leo Seligman is the manager of their shoe department. There is also evidence in the record tending to prove the following facts: On March 14, 1904, the appellee, having gone to the Bernheimer store to purchase shoes for her infant child, selected a pair from a lot of shoes exposed for sale upon a counter, and then started, with the pair she had selected in her hand, to go to a near-by counter to select another pair from the shoes thereon exposed for sale. As she was leaving the first counter, Seligman walked up, caught her by the arm, and compelled her, against her protest and attempted resistance, to go with him to the elevator and upstairs, and into a room into which Herman Bernheimer, one of the defendants, entered at the same time. Seligman said something, which the plaintiff did not hear, to Bernheimer, who replied to him: "You search her." Seligman thereupon, without her permission or assistance, took off her gossamer, opened her coat and took it off, and opened her skirt. Nothing having been found on her, Bernheimer said: "She is all right. Leave her go." She put on her clothing and went home and told her husband of the occurrences, and showed him bruises on her arm, which she said were made by Seligman's rough handling of her. Her husband went to Bernheimer Bros.' store, where he saw Mr. Ferdinand Bernheimer, and complained of what had happened to his wife. Mr. Bernheimer went upstairs and found out what he wanted, and came down again and ordered the husband off the premises, and gave him no satisfaction. There was, on the contrary, evidence directly contradicting the plaintiff's account of the treatment she received at the store, and tending to prove that she had taken the pair of shoes from the counter, put them under her cape, and started to walk away, not toward the other shoe counter, but toward the elevator. Seligman's attention having been called to her actions by an employé of the store, who had seen them, he followed her, and, when she got near the door, she turned and dropped the shoes. Seligman picked them up, whereupon she said to him: "I never did anything like that before, I hope my husband won't find it out"—and voluntarily went with him to the office on the second floor, where she paid for the shoes and he wrapped them up for her, and she carried them away. Seligman and Herman Bernheimer both positively testified that neither they nor any one else had searched or even taken hold of her at any time at the store. At the close of the case the plaintiff offered eight prayers, of which the court granted Nos. 1, 2, and 3a, and refused the others. The defendants offered nine prayers, of which the court granted the fifth and refused the others. The plaintiff specifically excepted to two of the defendants' rejected prayers, and the defendants specially excepted to four of the plaintiff's rejected prayers, and also to her prayers 2 and 3a, which were granted, and their exceptions were overruled.

It is unnecessary for us to notice the special exceptions of the respective parties to prayers which were subsequently overruled. There was no error in granting the plaintiff's first prayer, which merely declared that any deprivation of the liberty of another without his consent, whether by violence, threats, or otherwise, constitutes an imprisonment, within the meaning of the law.

The plaintiff's second prayer, which was also granted, does not correctly state the law of the case in that it directs the jury that, if they find the facts therein stated, the plaintiff is entitled to recover generally, without limiting her right to a recovery against Herman Bernheimer. The facts which the prayer requires the jury to find are her arrest by Seligman, and her detention and search by him in the presence and by the direction of Herman Bernheimer, and, also, that Seligman, in the transactions mentioned, was "acting as the agent and servant of the defendants, and within the scope of his authority, and in charge of said shoe department" of their store. Ferdinand Bernheimer is not mentioned in the prayer, nor is any supposed concurrence in or ratification by him of the acts complained of mentioned or relied upon therein. The jury are not instructed as to what state of facts would, if found by them from the evidence, justify the conclusion that Seligman acted within the scope of his authority as agent of the defendants in his conduct toward the plaintiff. Even if we assume that the prayer was intended to designate, as authority for such a conclusion by the jury, the finding by them of the fact that Seligman was at the time in charge of the shoe department, or that some of the alleged acts were committed in the presence of Herman Bernheimer, one of the partners of the defendant firm, the instruction would still be erroneous.

The prayer mentions no facts tending to prove that the defendant firm conferred express authority on Seligman to arrest and search customers who came to the store, when he suspected them of stealing. This court has repeatedly decided that an agent or employé about an ordinary business has no such an implied authority. Carter v. Howe Machine Co., 51 Md. 298, 34 Am. Rep. 811; Tolchester Imp. Co. v. Steinmeier, 72 Md. 816, 20 Atl. 188, 8 L. R. A. 846. In Central R. Co. v. Brewer, 78 Md. 407, 28 Atl. 615, 27 L. R. A. 63, this court, in holding that an employé had no implied authority to do any acts not relating to his own particular duties, said: "In Mali v. Lord, 39 N. Y. 381, 100 Am. Dec. 448, the question was whether a merchant, by employing a clerk to sell goods for him in his absence, or a superintendent to take the general charge and management of his business at a particular store, thereby confers authority upon such clerk or superintendent to arrest, detain, and search any one suspected of having stolen and secreted about his person any of the goods kept in such store. The court says: 'In examining this question it must be assumed that by the employment the master confers upon the servant the right to do all necessary and proper acts for the protection and preservation of his property to protect it against thieves and marauders, and that the servant owes the duty to so protect it to his employer. But this does not include the power in question. * * * The master would not, if present, be justified in arresting, detaining, and searching a person upon suspicion, however strong, of having stolen his goods and secreted them upon his person.'" The master could, of course, confer no greater power upon the servant than he himself possessed. Brewer's Case has been cited and relied on by us in the more recent cases of Barabasz v. Kabat, 86 Md. 36, 37 Atl. 720, Turnpike Road v. Green, 86 Md. 167, 37 Atl. 642, and Carter v. Worcester Co., 94 Md. 625, 51 Atl. 830.

If the court below intended, by granting the plaintiff's second prayer, to authorize the jury to find a verdict against Ferdinand Bernheimer because his copartner, Herman Bernheimer, was present at and abetted the detention and search of the plaintiff, if they found the fact of such presence and abetting, that, also, was error; for a partner in an ordinary mercantile business has no implied power to bind his copartner in such transactions as those which form the basis of the present suit. In Kirk & Son v. Carrett, 84 Md. 409, 35 Atl. 1089, a case closely resembling the present one we distinctly held, upon a review of the authorities, that "one of several partners cannot drag the firm or his copartner into a trespass by giving authority for the doing of an unlawful act in the name of the firm of which he is a member, for one partner has no power to bind the partnership to the commission of a wrongful act without the previous consent or subsequent concurrence of all of the partners."

The plaintiff's prayer 3a, which was granted, instructs the jury that, if they "find for the plaintiff, then they may award such damages as will not only compensate the plaintiff for the wrong and indignity she has sustained in consequence of the defendants' wrongful acts, but they may also award exemplary or punitive damages as a punishment to the defendant for such acts." That instruction, following the preceding two prayers of the plaintiff, was too broad, because it did not require the jury to find, as a condition of awarding punitive damages, that the alleged wrongs to the plaintiff had been inflicted maliciously or wantonly, or with circumstances of contumely and indignity. Sloan v. Edwards, 61 Md. 100. The court, by the plaintiff's first prayer, had instructed the jury that any deprivation of the liberty of another without his consent constituted an imprisonment, within the meaning of the law, and therefore the instruction to them as to the measure of damages should have plainly stated the further facts to be found by them as a proper ground for the award of punitive damages, in the event of their finding a verdict for the plaintiff.

We think, also, that the defendants' prayer 2½, which was refused, should have been granted. It instructed the jury that there was no legally sufficient evidence to entitle the plaintiff to recover as against the firm of Bernheimer Bros. or Ferdinand Bernheimer. The only testimony in the record directly connecting Ferdinand in any manner with the alleged wrongful acts of his brother, Herman, or Seligman, is that of the plaintiff's husband. He testifies that when he, being naturally mad and excited, complained to Ferdinand Bernheimer of the treatment which Mrs. Becker had received at the store, he (Bernheimer) "went upstairs, came down again, and ordered him [Becker] out of the store." This testimony, if true, undoubtedly convicts Bernheimer of rudeness of manner, but it does not of itself tend to prove a concurrence in or ratification by him of the alleged wrongful acts of Seligman and Herman Bernheimer.

Without discussing in detail the defendants' other rejected prayers, it is sufficient to say that we find no reversible error in their rejection. For the erroneous action of the court below in granting the plaintiff's prayers 2 and 3a and rejecting the defendants' prayer 2½, the judgment must be reversed, and a new trial awarded.

Judgment reversed, with costs, and a new trial awarded.

SAUTTER v. SUPREME CONCLAVE IMPROVED ORDER OF HEPTASOPHS.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Jan. 12, 1906.)

INSURANCE—MUTUAL BENEFIT INSURANCE—RIGHTS OF INSURED—CHANGE OF BY-LAWS.

A stipulation of a benefit certificate requiring insured to comply with the laws, rules, and regulations then governing, or that might thereafter be enacted for the government of, the association, does not authorize the association to limit its original contract with insured by a subsequently enacted by-law providing that no benefits shall be paid in case insured shall commit suicide, and an attempted limitation to that effect is nugatory.

Action by Margaret Sautter against the Supreme Conclave of the Improved Order of Heptasophs. On demurrer to plea. Judgment for plaintiff.

Argued November term, 1904, before GUMMERE, C. J., and GARRISON, GARRETSON, and REED, JJ.

Joseph A. Beecher, for demurrant. W. Holt Appgar, for defendant.

GUMMERE, C. J. This is an action upon a benefit certificate, issued by the defendant association to August Sautter, a member of its Newark City Conclave, on the 10th day of January, 1899, in and by which it promised to pay out of its benefit funds to his wife, the plaintiff in this action, the sum of $1,000, upon satisfactory proof of his death, and the surrender of the certificate, provided he should be in good standing in the order at the time of his death. The plea demurred to sets up, as a defense to that action: That Sautter, in his application for the issuance to him of the benefit certificate now sued upon, expressly agreed to conform in all respects to the laws, rules, and usages of the order then in force, or which might be thereafter adopted by it. That the benefit certificate was issued to Sautter upon the following condition set forth therein, and accepted by him, namely, that he should comply in the future with the laws, rules, and regulations then governing the said conclave and fund, or that might thereafter be enacted by the defendant for the government of such conclave and fund. That the defendant, at its regular session held June 9, 1903, adopted the following rule: "No benefit shall be paid to the beneficiary, or beneficiaries, of any member committing suicide (sane or insane)." That Sautter, on or about the 27th day of March, 1904, committed suicide, while sane or insane, by deliberately taking carbolic acid with the purpose and intent of taking his own life. That by reason of the above stipulation in the application for insurance, and in the benefit certificate itself, the rule adopted by the defendant June 9, 1903, was binding upon Sautter, and violated the insurance.

The plea demurred to sets forth no facts which constitute a bar to this action. It does not aver any violation by the insured of any law, rule, or regulation of the association, enacted by it for its government, or for the government of its funds; but, by way of argument, asserts that he, by entering into the stipulation which it recites, agreed that the association might, at will, so change the contract of insurance as to relieve it, to a material extent, from the liability created thereby. We think such a construction of the stipulation is not warranted by its language. To say that it confers upon the association the power to so alter the contract of insurance by an after-adopted by-law as to destroy the right of the beneficiary to be paid the amount called for by the certificate in case the insured shall die by his own hand, is equivalent to saying that it authorized the association to limit its liability to such extent as it chose, for instance, by providing that no benefit shall be paid in case the death of the insured result from an accident occurring through his own negligence, or from a disease which is epidemic in its character, or from any other cause or causes which it may designate. An agreement, by a person applying for membership in one of these fraternal organizations, and for insurance therein, that he will comply with such rules and regulations as the association may thereafter enact for its own government, or the government of its death fund, cannot be construed into a stipulation conferring any such power as has been suggested, without disregarding the plain meaning of the words of the agreement. In the case of O'Neill v. Supreme Council American Legion of Honor, 70 N. J. Law, 420, 57 Atl. 468, this court declared that such a stipulation on the part of a member was to be construed as referring only to reasonable by-laws and regulations adopted in furtherance of the contract; not to such as would overthrow it, or materially alter its terms; and the authorities cited in the opinion amply support the declaration. So construed, the stipulation of the insured in the present case conferred upon the defendant association no authority to alter the benefit certificate issued to Sautter, by inserting in it a provision that no benefit should be paid upon it in case the insured should commit suicide; and its attempt to make such alteration was nugatory.

The plaintiff is entitled to judgment on the demurrer.

YOUNG et al. v. PENNSYLVANIA R. CO.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Dec. 29, 1905.)

1. EASEMENT—CREATION BY DEED.

When one maps his land, delineates streets thereon, and conveys lots by reference thereto, the question whether he reserves a private easement of way in the soil of a street depends upon the language of the deed by which he conveys the same, read in the light of the circumstances attending its execution.

2. SAME—SUFFICIENCY.

At the time of the conveyance by the plaintiffs to the defendant an ejectment suit was pending to oust the defendant from a portion of the land conveyed and from the southerly half of the avenue on which it abutted, upon which the plaintiff claimed the defendant had encroached by laying tracks thereon. The conveyance was made in settlement of the suit for a valuable consideration paid by the defendant. The map upon which the avenue was delineated had been filed nearly 50 years, and numerous conveyances had been made with reference thereto.

Held, that a reference in the deed to the avenue as a boundary, was not sufficient to reserve a private easement of way, in the soil of the avenue.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Bill by Mason Young and others against Pennsylvania Railroad Company. Verdict for plaintiffs. Rule to show cause made absolute.

The plaintiffs own lots in the town of Harrison, on Seventh street, Middlesex street, Somerset street, Hunterdon street, and Burlington street, as those streets are delineated on maps of a large tract of land, which were made in 1836 and thereafter by the predecessors in title of the plaintiffs and the then owners of the land. Conveyances were made by reference to these maps, but the streets have not been actually opened or worked—New Jersey Railroad avenue, at least, is not proved to have been used either as a public street or a private way—and no steps have been taken by the municipal authorities to accept the dedication of the streets, except so far as ordinances vacating portions of the streets may indicate an acceptance. In 1839 a strip of land 66 feet in width, and extending across the entire width of the tract from east to west, was conveyed in fee simple by plaintiffs' predecessors in title to the New Jersey Railroad & Transportation Company, afterward the United New Jersey Railroad & Canal Company, of which the defendant is lessee. This strip of land crossed all the streets in question in this suit, except New Jersey Railroad avenue, and followed the line of that avenue and within its bounds. The deed conveyed the land, together with the ways and appurtenances. In 1901 an agreement for the elevation of the railroad tracks was made between the town of Harrison and the defendant company. For the obstruction of the streets caused by the execution of this work, this action was brought. Different counts in the declaration present the question of the obstruction as of public streets, and as of private ways. The trial judge held that the deed of 1839, by conveying an absolute fee without reservation, did away with the effect of any dedication of the land conveyed, and that the plaintiff's action failed as far as it depended on private ways in the cross-streets; that the action could not be sustained by reason of any public right in those streets, because there was no evidence that the dedication had been accepted by the public. There was evidence of a later dedication of a crossing at Sixth street by the railroad company itself; and the judge submitted to the jury the question whether a public right of crossing had been acquired at this point, and, if so, whether it had been obstructed. The railroad had been actually laid upon the strip deeded to the company in 1839, and followed the line of New Jersey Railroad avenue. The northerly half of the avenue was vacated by the municipal authorities by ordinance in 1891, and the portion of the southeasterly side of the railroad right of way by ordinance in 1895. The trial judge held that a private right of way in that street was created by the acts of the landowners in filing maps and making conveyances by reference thereto, and he left it to the jury to find whether that way was obstructed. The doubt in this respect arose from the difficulty of locating the street upon the ground. A question had arisen prior to 1885 between the plaintiffs and the railroad company, which led to a suit in ejectment in that year for certain land on the southerly side of the avenue and for the south half of the avenue itself at the point in question. The controversy was settled, and on August 12, 1885, the plaintiffs conveyed to the United New Jersey Railroad & Canal Company, the defendant's lessor, four tracts of land south of the avenue for $7,000. Three of these tracts abutted on the avenue. The jury found that both Sixth street and New Jersey Railroad avenue had been obstructed, and rendered a verdict for the plaintiffs.

Argued June term, 1904, before the CHIEF JUSTICE and GARRISON and SWAYZE, JJ.

Edward A. & William T. Day, for plaintiffs. Vredenburg, Wall & Vanwinkle, for defendant.

SWAYZE, J. (after stating the facts). We agree with the learned trial judge that the effect of the deed of 1839 was to cut off any right the plaintiffs might otherwise have had to cross the land thereby conveyed. We assume that the railroad company had dedicated a crossing at Sixth street; that that street, as well as New Jersey Railroad avenue, have been obstructed by the defendant; and that the plaintiffs' rights in the latter have not been barred by adverse possession. These facts must have been found by the jury to justify their verdict, and we do not think it necessary to review the evidence. The only questions we have found it necessary to determine are (1) whether the plaintiffs have shown any right to maintain an action by reason of the obstruction of the crossing at Sixth street; (2) whether the plaintiffs have a private right of way in New Jersey Railroad avenue.

1. The first question is settled adversely to the plaintiffs. H. B. Anthony Shoe Co. v. West Jersey R. R. Co., 57 N. J. Eq. 607, 42 Atl. 279. It was there held that the injury sustained by the owner of land immediately abutting upon a public highway from an obstruction of the street, was not different in character from that which every other citizen sustains. A fortiori, the injury sustained by those who are not abutting owners, as in the present case, is not different in character from that of the public and cannot be redressed by a private action for damages.

2. We think there was error in holding that the plaintiffs had a private right of way in New Jersey Railroad avenue. The fee simple of the land prior to the deed of 1885 had been in the plaintiffs and their predecessors in title, and an easement of way in favor of their other land would have no legal existence during the continuance of the unity of seisin of both tracts. Fetters v. Humphreys, 19 N. J. Eq. 471, 476. The reasons which have led the courts to hold that the grantees of lots shown on a map are entitled to an easement in the streets delineated thereon as distinguished from the public right arising from the dedication, are not applicable to the owners of the fee. The right of the grantees rests either upon an implied covenant or upon the principle of estoppel. Clark v. Elizabeth, 40 N. J. Law, 172, 175. But neither the theory of an implied covenant nor the principle of estoppel is applicable where the owner of the dominant and servient tenements is the same person. Until the severance of the title in 1885, the easement could have no existence. The deed of 1885 conveyed lots bounded on the street, and by legal presumption embraced the street to its center. Salter v. Jonas, 39 N. J. Law, 469, 23 Am. Rep. 229.

Although an easement would not arise either by implied covenant, or by estoppel it might be created by the express words of the deed, or perhaps implied from the situation of the property and the circumstances attending the conveyance. An easement of way is not an apparent and continuous easement and does not pass upon the severance of the tenement unless it is a way of necessity, or the operative words of the conveyance are sufficient to grant it de novo. Fetters v. Humphreys, 19 N. J. Eq. 471. The exception of a way of necessity has no application to the present case. At the time of the conveyance to the railroad company in 1885, the plaintiffs had access to their property by several other streets, which were not vacated until 1888, and then seemingly with the consent of the plaintiffs and upon a sale of a portion of their land to a steel company for a purpose which rendered such vacation necessary. No use seems to have been made by them at any time of New Jersey Railroad avenue. The other exception mentioned in Fetters v. Humphreys is the case where the words of the conveyance are sufficient to grant the easement de novo.

Although the opinion refers only to cases of grant, the same rule is applicable to a reservation. In Booraem v. North Hudson County Railroad Company, 40 N. J. Eq. 557, 5 Atl. 106, the way was held to have been reserved in favor of the grantor and in White v. Tidewater Oil Company, 50 N. J. Eq. 1, 25 Atl. 199, it was necessary to the decision to hold that the complainant not only acquired a right in the portion of the street conveyed to him, but also reserved a right in the portion conveyed by him. The solution of this question depends upon the language of the deed. In the Booraem Case there were express words in the deed which operated as a dedication of the street in favor of the grantor. The land was conveyed subject to the easement of Ogden avenue, and these words were added: "It being understood that Ogden avenue is extended for the same width across said premises and dedicated as a public highway. In White v. Tide Water Oil Co. the question arose upon demurrer to a bill which charged that the purpose of the conveyances was to square the boundary lines of the properties of the respective parties to them with the street, in order that the lands might be utilized in connection with the street as an approach to them, and that the lands owned by the complainants had no outlets, except through the street. The Chancellor said that the complainants' right must come by grant or reservation expressed in the deeds, or necessarily implied from their terms and language, when read in the light of the situation of the lands affected by them and the parties to them at the time when they were made. The circumstances of that case and the charges of the bill which were admitted by the demurrer led to the inference that the parties intended to reserve rights of passage in the land described as a street. The other cases to which we were referred by counsel are cases in which the grantees claimed rights by reason of the dedication, and are not applicable to the present case, where the claim is of a reservation by the grantor.

The deed of 1885 is to be read in view of the situation of the lands and the parties at the time it was made. Cooper v. Louanstein, 37 N. J. Eq. 284, 301. An ejectment suit was pending, the object of which was to oust the railroad company from the possession of a portion of the land conveyed and the southerly half of the avenue on which it abutted. The plaintiffs claimed that the railroad company had encroached upon the avenue and upon the abutting lands of the plaintiffs by laying tracks thereon. In settlement of this suit, the railroad company paid $7,000 and took a conveyance of the land in question and something more. The very object of the conveyance seems to have been to relieve the railroad company from liability to action by reason of its occupation of the avenue. Under such circumstances it requires clear language in the deed to lead to a construction which would reserve a right of way to the grantors in favor of lots on other streets to which there were at the time other and more direct means of access. The only language relied upon is the reference to New Jersey Railroad avenue as a boundary. This reference, however, indicates that the parties regarded it as a public street, rather than as a private way. The map had been filed nearly 50 years before, numerous conveyances had been made with reference thereto, and, although there is no proof of acceptance of the dedication by the public authorities, the plaintiffs may well have regarded the avenue as a public street. Within a few years thereafter it was so treated by the municipal authorities, who vacated a portion in 1891 and the rest in 1895. We think the reference in the deed merely recognizes New Jersey Railroad avenue as an existing public street, and was not meant to work a reservation of a private right on the part of the plaintiffs. The public right ended with the vacation of the street in 1895.

The rule to show cause must be made absolute.

MYERS v. FRIDENBERG et al.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Dec. 19, 1905.)

1. GAMING — ILLEGAL STOCK TRANSACTION — RELIEF IN EQUITY—LIMITATIONS.

The bill demurred to seeks a decree requiring defendants to transfer to complainants certain shares of stock, which he had transferred and delivered to them in a transaction, claimed to be unlawful under the provisions of the "Act to prevent gaming." 2 Gen. St. p. 1606.

The bill was not filed until after the lapse of six months from the time of the delivery of the shares to the defendants. Held, that the bill cannot be maintained for any relief under the provisions of section 5 of that act.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 24, Cent. Dig. Gaming, §§ 91, 92.]

2. EQUITY—ADEQUATE REMEDY AT LAW.

It is claimed that the bill can be maintained for relief under the provisions of section 2 of that act (2 Gen. St. p. 1606), and that there is no limitation to actions upon that section. Without considering, or deciding, upon this claim, held, that the bill discloses that complainant has a complete remedy at law, and shows no ground for equitable relief.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Bill by Charles R. Myers against Samuel M. Fridenberg and others. Demurrer to bill. Sustained.

Joseph H. Gaskill, for demurrant. Clarence L. Cole, for defendants.

MAGIE, Ch. The prayer of the bill is that the defendants be enjoined from selling or disposing of certain shares of stock, or from collecting any dividends thereon, and that they may be decreed to transfer and assign the said shares to the complainant. The bill states that the complainant engaged with the defendants in a stock speculation upon margins, with no intent to accept stocks bought or deliver stocks sold, but only to gain or close by the rise and fall of the market, which transactions, it is claimed, are unlawful, under the provisions of the first section of the "Act to prevent gaming" approved March 27, 1874. 2 Gen. St. p. 1606; Flagg v. Baldwin, 38 N. J. Eq. 219, 48 Am. Rep. 308; Van Pelt v. Schauble, 68 N. J. Law, 638, 54 Atl. 437. The bill further states that in October, November and December, 1902, upon defendants making demand upon complainant for additional payments to secure his account, complainant delivered to defendants the shares of stock in question, as security and "to make good his marginal account" with the defendants, and that they have had said shares of stock transferred to their names on the books of the respective companies, and have procured certificates thereof in their own names, and that afterward and about February, 1905, defendants gave notice to complainant that unless he paid them a balance claimed to appear by the account, viz., $19,936.71, with interest, they would sell the said stocks which they had thus acquired.

It was admitted in the argument of the demurrer to the bill that any right which the complainant has, or may assert, in this proceeding, is founded upon the act to prevent gaming above cited. If the right claimed by the complainant arises under the fifth section of that act, the bill discloses that the complainant's right has been lost by the lapse of six calendar months after the delivery of the stock; the bringing of such a suit within that period of time being a condition expressed in the proviso to that section. Where it clearly appears on the face of the bill that the complainant's right of action is barred by the statute of limitations, advantage of the statute may be taken by demurrer. Partridge v. Wells, 30 N. J. Eq. 176; Wells v. Partridge, 31 N. J. Eq. 362; Bird's Adm'r v. Inslee's Ex'rs, 23 N. J. Eq. 363; Gutch v. Fosdick, 48 N. J. Eq. 353, 22 Atl. 590, 27 Am. St. Rep. 473. A like rule must apply upon this demurrer. The bill discloses on its face that complainant has no right of action upon the fifth section of the gaming act.

But an action is also given by the second section of the gaming act, and there is no expressed limitation of the time within which such action may be brought. It is contended that the proviso to section 5, limiting actions, is equally applicable to the action provided for by section 2. I deem it unnecessary to determine whether this contention can prevail. For assuming that this bill is founded upon a cause of action such as is given by section 2, and that the lapse of time has not barred the complaint, I think that the bill exhibits complainant's claim as one for which he has a complete remedy at law. The shares of stock which he seeks to obtain have been converted by the defendants. If the transaction in which the shares were delivered to the defendants was a gambling transaction, made unlawful by stat-was, an action of trover and conversion will give the complainant ample redress. Van Pelt v. Schauble, ubi supra. There is nothing disclosed in the statements of the bill, or in the nature of the transaction, to indicate any particular equity which would require the intervention of this court.

The demurrer must therefore be sustained.

WALL v. UTAH COPPER CO. et al.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Oct. 2, 1905.)

CORPORATIONS—ISSUE OF BONDS—INCREASE OF CAPITAL STOCK.

The issuance of bonds by a corporation, with an option to the buyer to convert them into new stock at a certain price at any time within five years, is illegal, and will be enjoined as a deprivation of the right of stockholders to participate in any issue of new stock to an extent measured by the comparative amount of their present holdings and on the same terms with other parties.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 12, Cent. Dig. Corporations, §§ 587-592.]

Suit by Enos A. Wall against the Utah Copper Company and others. On order to show cause why injunction should not issue. Heard on bill and affidavit, and affidavit in opposition thereto. Injunction granted.

Edward A. Day and Gilbert Collins, for complainant. Robt. H. McCarter and Thomas Thatcher, for defendant.

PITNEY, V. C. The complainant, Wall, a resident of Salt Lake City, Utah, is a holder of 80,000 shares (par value $900,000) being one-fifth of the capital stock of the defendant the Utah Copper Co., and is one of the seven directors thereof, and also vice president thereof. The other defendants, six in number, are the other directors thereof, and the defendant MacNeill is the president thereof. On the 11th of September the complainant presented his bill, with one affidavit annexed, the object of which is to restrain the issuing by the corporation of $3,000,000 of bonds, secured by a mortgage, which bonds shall contain a clause giving the holders an option to convert the same into the stock of the company on certain terms presently to be stated. An order to show cause with interim restraint was granted thereupon, returnable on the 22d instant. On the return day of the order the defendants appeared and filed one affidavit in answer to the allegations of the bill. That affidavit had not been previously served upon the complainant, and, upon being read by his counsel, it was discovered that it contained new matters not in direct reply to those set forth in the bill, and apparently not within the knowledge of complainant. The complainant did not ask for time to answer this new matter, but submitted to the argument being had upon the papers including the new matter, upon the understanding, of course, that he was to have the benefit, if any, of the new matter, in all respects as if he had set it out and relied upon it in his bill, and the bill might be considered as amended accordingly. The facts are that the whole of the capital stock, $4,500,000, provided for by the articles of association, was duly issued, and the proceeds invested in a copper mine and property near the town of Bingham in the county of Salt Lake in the state of Utah, and about 25 miles southwest of Salt Lake. The mine, so far as developed, has proved very promising and profitable in its working, and can be made still more profitable by a judicious expenditure of money in the erection of a large smelting works on the shore of Salt Lake and a railroad from the mine to it. The whole incumbrance at present is $750,000.

The defendants MacNeill and Penrose are the largest holders of stock, except the complainant. On the 7th of July, 1905, MacNeill and Penrose, on the one part, entered into a written agreement with the Guggenheim Exploration Company, a corporation of New Jersey, on the other part, by which it was agreed that MacNeill and Penrose should cause the defendant corporation to authorize an issue of $3,000,000 of the par value of its bonds of $1,000 each, payable in 10 years, with interest at 6 per cent, and secured by a mortgage to the Morton Trust Company, each of which bonds "shall be convertible at the option of the holder at any time within five years from the date thereof, into fifty (50) shares of the par value of ten dollars ($10) each of the stock of said copper company." The agreement further provided that MacNeill and Penrose should cause the defendant company and its stockholders forthwith to take proceedings to increase its capital stock to the extent required for the proposed conversion of bonds into capital stock, and to authorize the issue of such increased stock in exchange or in lieu of the convertible bonds. This, it will be seen, will require a provision for the issue of $1,500,000 of new stock, increasing the total issue from $4,500,000 to $6,000,000. The contract further provided that the defendant corporation should agree in writing to give the exploration company the right to take the whole issue of bonds at 98 cents on the dollar. MacNeill and Penrose further agreed to give the exploration company the option to purchase from them 156,000 shares of the stock of the company (par value $10) at $20 per share. The result of this agreement so far, if carried out, would be to give to the exploration company the right, by virtue of its ownership of $3,000,000 of convertible bonds, to acquire $1,500,000 of the new stock of the company, which would thereby be increased to $6,000,000 and by the delivery to it of 156,000 shares of present existing stock, to make it the owner of $3,600,000, which will be a majority of the whole issue of $6,000,000. The contract contains the further provision that MacNeill and Penrose should have the right and option to take on their own account one-half ($1,500,000) of the whole issue of $3,000,000 of bonds, upon condition that, if they should exercise the option and convert the bonds into stock, they should sell and transfer a certain portion of the stock to the exploration company at $20 per share.

In pursuance of this agreement the president, on the 14th of July, 1905, issued a call for a meeting of the directors of the defendant company, to be held on Saturday the 22d of July at Colorado Springs for the following purposes: (1) To consider the advisability of, and, if deemed advisable, to authorize, an issue and sale of $3,000,000 par value bonds of the company, to be secured by mortgage on all of the property now owned by the company, and which may be acquired by it in the future, and to decide upon the rate of interest, time, and terms of said proposed issue. (2) In the event the bond issue, as above, be authorized by the board of directors, then to authorize the calling of a stockholders' meeting for the purpose of ratifying the action of the board of directors in authorizing and providing for the issuance and sale of the aforesaid bonds, if necessary; and to transact any and all other business connected therewith or incident thereto, which, in the judgment of the board of directors, or under the charter or by-laws of the company, or under the laws of the state of New Jersey, it is necessary to submit to the stockholders of the company. (3) To transact any and all business pertaining to the affairs of the company which may be brought to the attention of the board of directors.

Complainant in his bill alleges that he was unable to attend that meeting, "but that he protested in writing against the proposed action to be taken thereat, giving his reasons for his said protest." This written protest was not produced at the hearing, though it was not disputed that it had been received by the defendant officers of the corporation.

On the 26th of July a meeting of the board of directors, adjourned from the 22d, was held at the office of the company at Colorado Springs, at which meeting were present four of the directors, MacNeill, Hawkins, Babbitt, and Jackling; Messrs. Penrose, McLaren, and the complainant being absent. Mr. McLaren is the New Jersey director and holds only so much stock as to qualify him as such. At that meeting the minutes show that the president, MacNeill, laid before the meeting a proposed agreement to be entered into between the defendant company and the exploration company, and called attention to the fact that its performance would require the issue of bonds convertible into stock, and this would necessitate a proper increase in the stock, whereupon it was resolved that the agreement be approved and the officers of the company authorized to execute the same. Then follows in the minutes a formal resolution, subject to the ratification of the stockholders, for the borrowing of $3,000,000 secured by bonds, convertible into the stock of the company at the rate of $500 par value of the stock of the corporation for each $1,000 bond at the option of the holder. It was further resolved that it was advisable that the capital stock of the corporation should be increased from $4,500,000 to $6,000,000, and the fourth paragraph or section of its certificate of incorporation should be accordingly, specifying the amendment; and it was further resolved that a special meeting of the stockholders be called to be held at its office in Jersey City on September 5th to take action upon the increase of stock and the issuing of bonds. The proposed agreement to be executed, and which was in fact executed between the copper company and the exploration company, is in substance the same as that entered into on the 7th of July between MacNeill and Penrose and the exploration company, except that it does not mention those provisions of the first agreement which enabled the exploration company to become the holder of a majority of stock of the defendant company, and does not mention that provision which gives MacNeill and Penrose an interest with the exploration company in the new issue of convertible bonds.

Immediately after the meeting of the directors last stated, to wit, on August 1st, a notice was sent out to the stockholders for a meeting to be held on September 5th at Jersey City to take action upon the proposed increase of the capital stock from $4,500,000 to $6,000,000, and also upon the proposed issue of $3,000,000 of convertible bonds of the character previously stated. Complainant received this notice on the 2d of August and had an interview as soon as practicable with the defendant MacNeill and protested to him personally against the proposed action, and was informed, as he understood, by MacNeill that he (complainant) would have no right to his proportionate share or any of the proposed increased stock or issue of convertible bonds unless he would join with MacNeill and the other stockholders of the company in giving an option of a purchase of 51 per cent. of his holdings of stock to the American Smelters Security Company at $19.60 a share. So far as the case shows this was the first notice complainant had of the proposition to issue convertible bonds and to give some other company the control of a majority of the stock of the defendant company.

In order to protect himself complainant sent an attorney to the meeting of the stockholders held in pursuance of the notice and submitted a written protest there, the material parts of which are as follows: "The plan for the subscription to, and distribution of, the said proposed increase shares of stock, prevents any stockholders, myself included, from subscribing for his pro rata share thereof unless he shall agree to sell, assign, or exchange one-half of fifty-one per cent., or some share of his present holdings, for mortgage bonds of said company; whereas, I am advised that any stockholder, myself included, has the legal right to subscribe for such proportionate number of said increased shares as his present holdings of stock bear to the present number of shares in said company, unconditionally. I object to and protest against such proposed increase of said capital stock, for the further reason that the proposed plan of sale, distribution and exchange thereof compels a subscribing stockholder to pay more than the par value for shares subscribed for by him; whereas I am advised, any stockholder, myself included, has the legal right to subscribe for and have such increased shares at their par value the exercise of which right I respectfully insist shall be accorded me. I am now the holder of one-fifth, or 20 per cent., of the present number of shares of the company, and the proposed sale, distribution and exchange of such increased stock will diminish my holdings from 20 to but 15 per cent., as respects the whole number of shares in said company, thereby reducing the value of my shares by 25 per cent.; and said plan will, to the same extent, diminish the voting power of my said holdings in said corporation. I further object and protest against said proposed plan, because the proposed issue, distribution and exchange of said new shares is to be made upon the illegal consideration, that the company will thereby barter such increased shares of stock of the corporation, for the purpose of enabling the president and officers and other stockholders of the corporation, to make a sale and exchange of their own present holdings and stock in said company. I further object to and protest against the issue of said increased capital stock, and the borrowing of the sum of three million dollars upon the proposed plan, or at all, because the mine and mill of the company at Bingham are capable of earning, if the same are operated with ordinary skill and ability, sufficient money to meet the cost of the proposed improvements. I further object and protest against the proposed plan, because the fact is that the sum of $3,000,000, after deducting the $750,000 for paying the existing mortgage indebtedness, is far in excess of the requirements of said company for making such improvements. That said improvements consist mainly of two items, as follows: (1) The building of a railroad from the mine at Bingham to the site of the proposed new mill on the south shore of Great Salt Lake; (2) the building of said mill and its appurtenant power plant. That the said railroad can be built and equipped with rolling stock for a sum not to exceed $350,000. That I have offered to, and do now hereby offer to, build and equip the same as aforesaid for said company for the sum of $350,000. That said mill can be built and equipped with first-class modern machinery and appliances adapted to all the uses required of it, for a sum not exceeding $750,000, and I have offered, and do hereby offer, to construct the same in manner aforesaid for said sum. I further object and protest because the fact is, as I am informed and believe, that money to the extent of $4,000,000 on the simple contract notes of said company can be borrowed at the rate of five per cent. per annum from a company financially responsible, to wit, the General Electric Company, conditioned only that the company will sell, at market rates, its copper product to the General Electric Company. The increased stock can be sold at par for more money than is needed to pay the expense of said improvements. I further protest and object against said proposed action by the company because I have been and am now ready, able and willing to contribute my share of one-fifth of the money necessary to pay the expense of said proposed improvements upon the plant of the company, as well as the payment of said mortgage indebtedness. That the notice of the directors' meeting, at which the issue of the bonds and stock now contemplated was recommended, contained no reference to or notification of the proposed increase of stock, and that therefore the proposed proceedings to increase said stock are illegal and void; and that there is no warrant at law for the issue of bonds of the tenor and effect set out in the notice of this meeting, and that such bonds, if issued, will be illegal and void."

Several objections are made by complainant to the proposed proceedings. First, it is objected that the notice of the meeting of directors sent to the complainant is insufficient in that it does not set forth truly and fully the business to be brought before the directors. It will be remembered that the notice is confined to specifying the mere issue of bonds to be secured by mortgage and the rate of interest and term of the bonds and to authorize the calling of the stockholders' meeting to ratify the action of the board. The other contents of the notice are quite general. There is nothing in it to indicate that an increase of capital stock was contemplated, or that it was proposed to issue the bonds and negotiate them in a mass to one party.

Now, it will be observed that the twenty-seventh section of the corporation act (P. L. 1896, p. 285), which authorizes an increase of capital stock, prescribes the mode in which it shall be done. The board of directors must pass a resolution declaring that such increase is advisable and calling a meeting of stockholders to take action thereon. Counsel for complainant draws a clear distinction between meetings of directors held for the purpose of supervising and directing the ordinary business transactions of the company, and providing for such emergencies and exigencies as may arise therein, and a meeting of directors to consider the matters provided for in section 27, and they contend, and I think rightly, that while little or even no notice is required to be given to each director of a meeting to transact business of the former character, a special notice is not only proper but necessary to be given in the latter case, and that such notice should state fully the object of the meeting, so that each director may be informed in advance and fully appreciate the importance of his personal attendance. The defendants seem to have felt the force of these considerations, for they did attempt to state the object of the meeting, and the complaint of Col. Wall is that they did not state it fully. It seems clear enough from the affidavits and the statements of counsel that he was aware of the desire of the other directors to increase the indebtedness of the company, and may have thought that it was useless, even if it were practicable for him to leave his home and place of business at Salt Lake City, near the works of the corporation, and travel several hundred miles to Colorado Springs to oppose the issue of bonds, and therefore contented himself with a written protest, while, if he had known that the scheme included the issuing of $1,500,000 more stock and placing that stock under the control of a single corporation, he would have attended the meeting and exercised his influence by argument against it. This was his undoubted right, and it is no argument against his exercising it to say that it is quite clear that it would have been unavailing. The law presumes that the result of a meeting of a body of that kind cannot be determined with judicial certainty by canvassing the individual views of the members, but that in law it depends upon a conference of the several members met as a body after an interchange of views and of arguments. It is impossible to hold that the presence of Col. Wall at the meeting of directors here relied on might not have changed the result. I can see no reason why Col. Wall should not have been apprised not only of the proposed contract of July 26th between the copper company and the exploration company, but also of the previous contract of July 7th between MacNeill and Penrose and the exploration company. I do not deem it necessary at present to express any definite opinion on this objection.

The next objection is that the meeting of directors in question was invalid because not held by a quorum of directors competent to vote thereon on the matter before them. Only four were present, a bare quorum. Of these four, complainants contend that MacNeill was incompetent by reason of his personal interest in the question before the board. This allegation of interest is based on the sixth paragraph of the contract of July 7th heretofore mentioned. By that paragraph the exploration company agreed that MacNeill and Penrose may take the whole or any part of $1,500,000 of the convertible bonds, upon condition that they shall sell to the exploration company one-half of such stock as they shall receive from the company under the option of conversion to be inserted in the bonds. I may not have properly construed the section; but it certainly does give Messrs. MacNeill and Penrose a personal interest in the transaction, and complainant claims that it is fatal to the resolution in question upon the principle laid down in the books that "a director, who is disqualified by reason of personal interest in a matter before a directors' meeting, loses pro hac vice his character as director, and he cannot be counted for the purpose of making out a quorum." This principle was acted upon and approved by our Court of Errors and Appeals in Met. Tel. & Tel. Co. v. Domestic Tel. & Tel. Co., 44 N. J. Eq. 568, at page 573, 14 Atl. 907, at page 910. The answer made by defendants to this position is that this reservation to MacNeill and Penrose was intended by them to be held in trust for the benefit of all the other stockholders who chose to come in and take a share of it and contribute towards making up the $156,000 of stock which they had agreed to sell to the exploration company, in order to give them the majority of all the stock. Complainant's answer to this is that there is nothing in writing signed by either MacNeill on Penrose by which this trust can be established. So far as appears to the court, it is supported only by the affidavit of Mr. Babbitt, one of the directors, and the counsel of the company. It probably furnishes the explanation of the complainant's allegation that he was told by MacNeill, or some one representing him, that he could only obtain his share in the new issue of bonds by contributing shares of stock toward making up the 51 per cent. of the whole issue, required by the exploration company. I shall not express any definite opinion upon this point made by the complainant at this stage of the cause.

The next point made by the complainant is that there is no authority by the common law or by our statute for issuing convertible bonds of this character. They argue, and rightly, that the right to issue bonds and secure them by mortgage is not given by any statute, but rests entirely upon the common-law right of a corporation to incur indebtedness, and that right does not include a right to issue bonds convertible into stock. In this connection reference was made, at the argument, to the second section of the act of March 28, 1902 (P. L. 1902, p. 217). That section, as is well known, was supposed to have been passed at the instance of the great steel trust, and came under review in the case of Berger v. U. S. Steel Corporation, 63 N. J. Eq. 516, 53 Atl. 14, by Vice Chancellor Emery, and again at page 819, 63 N. J. Eq., 53 Atl. 68, by the Court of Errors and Appeals. But that act by its terms provides for convertible bonds issued by a corporation having certain qualifications and characteristics which the present corporation in question does not possess. I do not deem it necessary to express any definite opinion at this time on this objection.

The last and most serious objection urged by complainant is that the proposed action will deprive him of a clear and indisputable right which he has by the law of the land to participate in any issue of new stock to an extent measured by the comparative amount of his present holdings of stock, and upon the same terms that other parties shall participate therein. In other words, that he is entitled to an opportunity to take and pay for one-fifth of the proposed new issue, and that the contract to dispose of all that issue to the exploration company infringes, on that right. This right, as I understand it, is based on two grounds: First. That the complainant became the owner of one-fifth of the property of this corporation with the full understanding that he would thereby have a voice and influence in its management due, among other things, to that share, and that an increase of the stock issued to other people will diminish his voice and influence just so much. Second. That at present he is entitled by law to one-fifth of the whole property of the corporation, whatever may be its value, and he is entitled to one-fifth of any increase of that value, whether such increase be due to the accumulation of actual earnings, or to anticipated increase as the effect of the knowledge, by physical development, of its present value, and any issue of capital stock is of necessity a diminution of his share in that increase, and that in order to protect him against an undervaluation of the new stock to be issued, however that undervaluation may arise, he is entitled to the privilege of taking a proportionate share of the new stock, and especially is he so entitled in the present case, where there is no present sale of the new stock at an appraised value, but where an option is given to purchase at any time within five years at a price now fixed, and which, when the option comes to be exercised, may prove to be entirely inadequate. Thus the holder of the option will have the whole of five years, during which the mining property is being developed, to ascertain and determine whether it is worth while for it to exercise its option. If the property does not improve in value and the stock is not worth $20 per share, it will not exercise its option, but will enforce the payment of the bond. If, on the other hand, the property does, either by its development or by the addition of undivided earnings, increase in value so as to be worth, as it may, many times the price fixed, it will exercise its option and in such case it will gain at the expense and loss of the complainant. The complainant's contention is, in my judgment, thoroughly based upon justice and law.

The leading case, of course, upon the subject is Gray v. Portland Bank (1807) 3 Mass. 364, 3 Am. Dec. 156. There the bank was organized with $100,000 capital with the privilege by its charter to increase it to $300,000. After it had been in successful operation for several years and the stock was worth something more than par, the directors resolved to issue the remaining stock, as I read the case, at par. The plaintiff demanded the right to take his share, which was $14,000 in the new stock, and was refused, whereupon he brought his suit against the bank for damages, and recovered. The case was elaborately argued and opinions delivered by two judges, putting his right on substantially the grounds above stated. That case has been followed with almost unbroken uniformity in most of the states of the Union. Mr. Morawetz, in his valuable work on Corporations, at sections 454, 455, states the rule as follows: "When a corporation declares a stock dividend in wholly or partially paid-up shares, the new shares are paid up in the whole or in part out of the profits which belong to the existing shareholders. It is evident, therefore, that each shareholder is entitled to share in the dividend, to the same extent as if it were paid in cash. It is equally clear that a corporation cannot issue new shares at less than their full market value, except by equal distribution among all the shareholders; for whatever the new shares are worth is represented by capital or profits belonging in equity to the existing shareholders. It seems that, if a corporation resolves to increase the amount of its capital by issuing and selling new shares, every stockholder has a right of pre-emption of a fractional part of the new issue, proportionate to his fractional share in the company's entire stock. Each stockholder is thus enabled to preserve unimpaired his voice in the management of the company's affairs." To the same effect is Angell & Ames on Corporations, §§ 554, 555; also 2 Beach on Private Corporations, § 473. Mr. Cook, in his book on Stock & Stockholders (section 286), lays down the same rule. To the same effect is Mr. Thompson's elaborate book (volume 2, § 2094).

Numerous adjudged cases were cited by counsel for the complainant in support of the general proposition, of which I will mention a few. One is Jones v. Concord & Montreal R. R. Co., 67 N. H. 119, 38 Atl. 120. In the very recent case of Electric Co. of America v. Edison Electric Illuminating Co. (1901) 200 Pa. 516, 50 Atl. 164, the question came under consideration in the review by the Supreme Court of a learned opinion of the presiding judge of the common pleas of Blair county. He there cites the authority of several text writers and refers to previous decisions in Pennsylvania and holds to the rule as laid down by the text writers, and his decree was sustained on appeal by the Supreme Court for the reasons given in the court below. The headnote is this: "Stockholders have a right to purchase a pro rata share of a new issue of stock, so that the directors may not provide that the new issue shall be sold to the one making the highest secret bid." There the complainants already held a majority of the stock but had only a minority in the board of directors. That body, by a majority vote, resolved to issue new stock and sell it to the person who would make the highest sealed bid for it. This action was restrained by the court. In our own state we have the case of Way v. American Grease Co., 60 N. J. Eq. 263, 47 Atl. 44, decided by Vice Chancellor Grey in 1900. The headnote is this: "Directors of a corporation which is fully organized and in the active conduct of its business are bound to afford to existing stockholders an opportunity to subscribe for any new issue of shares of its capital stock in proportion to their holdings, before disposing of such new shares in any other way." In support of that proposition he cites (page 269 of 60 N. J. Eq., page 46 of 47 Atl.) Gray v. Portland Bank. It is true that there were circumstances of actual fraud found in that case, but the principle applies to the present case. I understand that the Court of Errors and Appeals acted upon the same principle in Berger v. U. S. Steel Corporation, 63 N. J. Eq. 809, 53 Atl. 68. The first two headnotes are to that effect.

Against this doctrine defendants rely on the case of Meredith v. Zinc Co., 55 N. J. Eq. 211, 37 Atl. 539, decided by myself and affirmed on appeal, 56 N. J. Eq. 454, 41 Atl. 1118, on my opinion. What is expressly relied upon is found upon page 220 of 55 N. J. Eq., page 542 of 37 Atl., and counsel seem to think that the interpolation of the words in parenthesis, "if there be such" after the words "general rule" manifested a doubt in my mind as to its existence. It is proper for me to say here that what I there said was the result of not more than 10 minutes of consideration, and the only study given to the question was the reading of the section referred to in 2 Beach on Corporations. And if I had then had at command time to give the subject proper consideration, I am not at all sure that I should have dictated the sentence which immediately follows the citation of the Massachusetts case, which was not necessary for the decision of the cause. But be that as it may, the reading of the whole case shows that it is quite different from the one in hand. In the first place, the complainants were the holders of less than 1 per cent. of the whole stock of the corporation. In the second place, the defendants offered at the hearing to give them an opportunity to purchase their proportion of the new stock at par. In the third place, the property purchased had been appraised in the most careful manner and bargained to be purchased between parties entirely at arm's length, excluding the least suspicion that the element existed of a party making a contract with himself. In the present case there is no purchase of property, no appraisement of value by disinterested parties, but a simple clear contract to give a third party the absolute right by way of option to purchase stock of a corporation at a price now fixed, if at a future day that party should feel it his interest to make the purchase. I think that not only is that in direct violation of the complainant's individual right as a stockholder, even if it were an issue of stock in present for a fixed price, but that the optional character of the contract is vicious in itself, and not warranted by that clause in the statute which authorizes the creation and issue of new stock.

Against the general line of authority above cited defendant relies upon the very recent case of Stokes v. Continental Trust Co. (decided by the Appellate Division of the New York Supreme Court) 99 App. Div. 377, 91 N. Y. Supp. 239. I might dismiss the case by saying that the point here involved was not before that court in that cause, and that a careful examination of the reasoning of the several judges tends to help the complainant herein rather than the defendant. It was a suit brought by Stokes against the trust company to recover damages against it for not issuing to him at par his proportion of a new issue of stock, such damages to be measured by the difference between the par value of \$100 per share and the price at which the new stock was actually sold, \$450 per share. At the time when the transaction occurred the book value of the stock was about \$310. At that time the firm of Blair & Co. proposed to buy 5,000 shares of new stock at \$450 per share, the result being a doubling of the amount of stock and increasing its book value considerably, and the market value was increased far beyond its book value. The plaintiff claimed the right to a proportionate amount of the new stock at par on the day of its issue. He never demanded the right to take any part of it at the price paid by Blair & Co., or offered to do so. The trial judge sustained the plaintiff's claim and directed judgment to be entered against the defendant for the difference between the par value of the complainant's 221 shares, namely \$22,100, and the actual market value fixed by stipulation at \$550 per share, which judgment amounted to \$115,151.07. It seems to me that such a judgment could not stand the test of reason for a moment. The mere statement of the case shows its utter indefensibility. The leading opinion of the Supreme Court was written by Justice O'Brien. He reviews all the cases in New York and expresses some doubt upon the soundness of much that has been written and decided upon the question, and then calls attention to the peculiar claim of the plaintiff to subscribe for the stock at par and his failure to offer to pay the same price as Blair & Co. paid, and then proceeds as follows: "Much might be said, and considerable force may be derived from the view of text writers and from the expressions in opinions, in support of the proposition that a stockholder, as against an outsider, has a primary or pre-emptive right to subscribe for any increase of stock made by the corporation. This primary or pre-emptive right, however, to subscribe at par for increased stock which is to be issued at par, or, where the value of the stock is greater than its par value and it is proposed to issue it at its greater price, to subscribe for it at such price, in preference to outsiders, is quite different and distinct from the right here claimed, which is that of a stockholder to have at par stock which is worth or can be sold, in the interest and for the benefit of the corporation to others, for $4\frac{1}{2}$ times its par value. We do not think, in the absence of any statute of the state conferring such right, or provision in the charter of the corporation, or in the resolution authorizing the increase, or of fraud or illegality in making the increase, that this contention as to the right of stockholders which the plaintiff here asserts can be sustained either in law or in reason." In this opinion Van Brunt and Hatch, JJ., concurred, Patterson, J., concurred in the result, and Laughlin, J., gave his own reasons. Speaking of the power to issue stock where there is a minority against it, he uses this language, which seems to me to express the rule accurately and tersely: "In that event, I think the statute confers implied power upon the majority to determine whether the stock shall be issued at par or above par, at what may be deemed its actual value in view of the value of the assets of the existing corporation, the right to ultimately share in which the holders of the new issue of stock will thus acquire. The action must be taken, however, in a manner that will secure the existing stockholders an opportunity of exercising their pre-emptive right of subscribing for a share of the increased capital stock in proportion to their holdings of the original. I think, for instance, that the sale of the new stock to the highest bidder upon sealed proposals would be a violation of this right. A stockholder prior to the increase has a right to a voice in the management and to a share of the assets of the corporation, on final dissolution, in the proportion that his holdings bear to the entire outstanding capital. These rights are materially affected by an increase of the capital stock; and such increase must therefore be made in a manner to enable him to become the purchaser of such a proportion of the increased capital stock as will preserve his right to the same proportion in the assets on final liquidation as he originally had and also the same voice in the management of the corporation. Moreover, the immediate effect of an increase in the capital stock of a corporation, the value of which is above par, would be to depreciate the value of the original stock, unless the new capital is issued and sold at a valuation equal to that of the original issue. It is therefore manifest that, if the holders of the original stock are not to purchase the entire new issue, it is to their interests that the increase of stock be issued not at par, but at what will be its actual value as near as the same may be ascertained."

For the reasons above set forth I am of the opinion that the last objection taken by the complainant to these proceedings is fatal, and, without expressing any opinion upon the other objections made, that an injunction must go until the time of the hearing.

HOBOKEN & M. R. CO. et al. v. JERSEY CITY, H. & P. RY. CO. et al.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Dec. 14, 1905.)

1. STREET RAILROADS—LEASES—ULTRA VIRES ACT.

Plaintiff, a tunnel company, desiring to extend its tunnel under the North river, still further underground, leased from defendant street railway company the right to use certain of its land for that purpose for 999 years. The land so leased was vacant, except for an old storehouse, and it appeared that the use of the land for the extension of such tunnel would not interfere in any way with the exercise of the franchises of the lessor. Held, that such lease was not beyond the lessor's power to grant.

2. INJUNCTION — TRESPASS — REMEDY AT LAW—INADEQUACY.

Where plaintiff under a lease from defendant was entitled to enter certain land for the extension of plaintiff's tunnel which had been constructed under the North river, but defendant intervened and with a strong hand refused to permit plaintiff to do the work contemplated, plaintiff's damages being uncertain, it had no adequate remedy at law, and was entitled to an injunction restraining such acts.

3. APPEAL—SUSPENSION OF INJUNCTION.

Where an injunction was granted restraining defendant from interfering with a strong hand to prevent plaintiff from constructing certain improvements under a lease, the injunction would not be suspended pending appeal under a statute declaring that no appeal from an order granting an injunction shall suspend or modify its operation without an order of the chancellor, and that a suspension or modification thereof shall extend only so far as may be necessary to preserve the subject of the appeal, and shall not in any case be allowed to destroy the right established or protected by the decree appealed from.

Suit by the Hoboken & Manhattan Railroad Company and others against the Jersey City, Hoboken & Paterson Railway Company and the Public Service Corporation of New Jersey for an injunction. Order to suspend a temporary injunction pending appeal. Order discharged.

Collins & Corbin, for complainants. Frank Bergen and William D. Edwards, for defendants.

PITNEY, V. C. (orally). I have thought this matter over seriously, and I will now state the reason for my action. The complainant is the Hudson Tunnel Company. The defendant is a trolley company, having a terminus near the southerly Hoboken ferry at Hudson Place. The tunnel company built a tunnel under the North river, ending on this side some distance—half or three quarters of a mile from the ferry—the terminus of the trolley. Its right of way continues to that terminus. Desirous of extending its business, and of intercepting the travel that is brought to the ferry by the trolley company from the high grounds about Hoboken, the tunnel company entered into a written contract with the trolley company for their mutual benefit. It was prepared with great care—it is not a loose contract—and there is no allegation or proof that there was any fraud or accident in connection with it. That contract, in effect, gives a lease by the trolley company to the tunnel company. And now, if you will, hand me one of those maps (the map indicated is handed to the court) of a certain tract of land in Hoboken, a map of which is exhibited and proven before the court, by which there appears to be a considerable piece of land, owned, but not all used, for its present purposes by the trolley company. That lease gives the tunnel company a certain right for 999 years, by clear and express language, in a part of that plot of land. The object was to extend the tunnel from its present terminus still underground until it reaches that point, and there to make a common terminal for passengers, so that passengers arriving at that point from the hill country and the body of the city to the west can conveniently take the tunnel and cross to the city of New York without taking the ferry, and, vice versa, passengers coming from New York to Hoboken would come to the surface from the tunnel and take the trolley. That was understood to be a matter of mutual benefit to each party; otherwise, we must presume they would not have entered into it. When the time came for going to work on the construction of the tunnel near that point, and especially for the tunnel company to excavate, in order to sink their shaft and start their work on the underground connection between this terminal and the present terminus of the tunnel, some half a mile distant, there seemed to be a reluctance on the part of the trolley company to do as they expressly covenanted to do. The tunnel company thereupon started the work. They entered upon this piece of land, which is vacant, except as a storehouse for worthless rubbish, and began to dig. There they were met by physical opposition. The trolley company did not take the course which litigants generally take, and which this court thinks they ought in all cases to take, and never to resort to the strong hand; but it interfered by the strong hand, and arrested and drove out the workmen of the tunnel company.

The tunnel company thereupon prepared its bill with some care, addressed to this court, setting forth those facts, setting forth the contract and the correspondence, and setting forth that they had attempted to go to work, as by the language of the contract I think they had the right to do, and obtained an order to show cause why an injunction should not issue. By their bill they pray that the court will undertake to see that this contract was carried out under its supervision, and, incidentally, they asked for an injunction, not to restrain the defendants from doing anything, not to restrain the trolley company from breaking or damaging anything, but to prevent them by the strong hand from interfering with the complainants in their legitimate work under that contract, where the trolley company had agreed under seal that they should work. On the return day the bill was presented to me with a mass of affidavits and maps which rendered the matter quite clear. When these had been read, I asked Mr. Bergen and Senator Edwards, counsel for the trolley company, if they had any affidavits in reply, and they said they had an answer and a plea. The answer handed up was by the Public Service Corporation, in which it was declared it had nothing to do with the contract. The plea was by the trolley company, and it simply set up that the contract was beyond their power—that it was ultra vires. It further added that two of its stockholders had objected to it, and had filed a bill to have the whole contract set aside. There were no proofs establishing the status of the two men who had objected to the contract. There were no new facts proven that the court could act upon in the matter of granting, or refusing to grant, an injunction, and the facts upon which I must act must be shown either by record or affidavit.

But there was not an affidavit produced. It was simply stated that the execution of the contract was opposed. All they really said was: "It is ultra vires, and we want that matter settled before anything is done." No contention was made that the letter and spirit of the contract did not authorize what the complainant was doing. I thought then, and I think now, that the plea was perfectly futile for any purpose whatever, except to act as a demurrer to the bill, and the whole question then and now is, did the bill, with the affidavits, set up a case? I thought then, and I think now, that it does. The complainants were in possession, peaceably, trying to work under a deed and contract which gave them the land in the strictest language, and they were proceeding to carry out that particular purpose; and I think they had a perfectly clear case at law, requiring no adjudication at law to bring it within the jurisdiction of this court, and the defendants were stopping them by force. They did not come to this court by bill and ask this court to restrain the complainants or their workmen. They did not take that course, nor would they suggest anything by way of defense at all, except that they wanted the question first settled as to whether the contract was ultra vires. I think that, under the pleadings and the affidavits, it is not ultra vires. I do not think there is the least doubt about it. It is simply a lease of an easement in a certain tract of land, because it appears clearly by the map that it is not all used for the tracks of the company, and it is a matter of vision that it is not all necessary for the present use of the railroad company, and the idea of ultra vires does not apply at all to such a case. I know of no reason why any man who wishes to buy the property leased should hesitate to take title to it. The lease under which complainant claims does not interfere with the exercise of the defendant's franchise in the land. It is clearly property which is subject at law to the ordinary disposition of the owner, and the title includes the right to convey. It may be that the railroad company could not lease its whole tracks without some legislative authority, but that is not the question here, and it has been well remarked by Mr. Corbin that there is nothing about the use of this piece of land, as indicated by the proofs, to show that it is ultra vires. I have no doubt about it.

The next point is, shall the matter be treated as a mere trespass? The ground on which I went the other day is that this company has this contract, and had presumably acted upon it. It has finished its tunnel under the Hudson river on the strength of it. I do not recollect the date of the contract.

Mr. Corbin: More than a year and a half ago—April, 1904.

The Court: And it is held up now in the operation of carrying out the enterprise. Nobody could ever ascertain what the damages are or will be to it. And one ground for this court interfering in cases of trespass is that the damages are uncertain, and that the remedy at law is entirely inadequate. This bill, however, asks the court to go further and superintend the carrying out of this contract, something in the nature of specific performance, and, as has been stated by Mr. Corbin, and shown by the authorities, it is the duty of the court in such cases to prevent violence and to supervise the carrying out of such a contract. So, independent of preserving to these parties the right to work under that contract, there is a prayer in their bill which certainly calls for something this court should and ought to do, even though it does not go as far as Mr. Corbin would like. An order for restraint was made on Monday last. An appeal was taken, and on Tuesday evening Mr. Bergen and Mr. Edwards called at my study at Morristown, and said to me that an appeal was taken, and asked that the operation of the restraint be suspended. I heard their application, and, without arriving at any judgment in the matter, I granted an order to show cause why the operation of the injunction should not be stayed pending the appeal, returnable here this morning, so that for one day I stayed the operation of the injunction, during which time the defendant has been at liberty to go on with a gang of men and interfere, if it could, with the operations of the complainant.

Senator Edwards: Nothing was done.

The Court: Reference has been made to the rule, the fundamental rule, that the disposition and desire of this court is to preserve things, and not destroy them, pendente lite, especially where an appeal is taken, pending the appeal, the subject-matter of the suit should be preserved in statu quo, so that the party appealing can receive the benefit of the appeal. That is an ideal and desirable object, but every lawyer who has thought of it will tell you it is absolutely impossible. It is a thing which cannot be done in every case. I will put it to you in this way: A man thinks he owns a house and lot. Another man claims that two feet of it is his, and he commences to cut away the two feet. The gentleman whose house is going to be destroyed asks for an injunction. The Chancellor thinks there is no case for an injunction. He has not shown title, and he refuses an injunction. An appeal is taken, the appellate court takes a different view, and, when he gets his decree of reversal, the house has been cut down. That is one case. There are plenty of other cases which can be imagined where it is quite impossible to preserve the thing in statu quo. I have heard that question discussed over and over again by the bar, and the opinion generally expressed is that the ideal of the late Chief Justice can never be attained.

However, that is the principle on which courts ought to go as far as practicable; and after the decision of the Court of Errors and Appeals in the famous National Docks Case our friend here, Mr. Corbin, who is famous for his work in that line, drafted and had this act passed, and it has now become part of our Code. The section declares, in its first half, that "no appeal taken from an order or decree granting an injunction shall suspend or modify the operation of the injunction without an order of the Chancellor," etc. That part of the section does not help the defendant, and counsel will hardly contend that their appeal has modified the injunction. Hence they ask a special order of this court. And that brings us to the latter part of the section, which declares that a suspension or modification by the court shall extend only so far as may be necessary to preserve the subject of the appeal, and shall not in any case be allowed to destroy the right established or protected by the order or decree appealed from. That amounts to a direction to the Chancellor, if he sees fit, to modify the injunction, and to so do it as to preserve and not destroy the right protected by the order or decree appealed from.

Now, what is the right here protected by the order appealed from? It is simply the right to be on those premises and to work there without being physically obstructed in that work. Now, that right I am forbidden to disturb or destroy, and I conceive it to be a continuing right, running from day to day. All that I determine is this: the defendants have shown no answer to the complainant's case. It is open to them to do it. If they have an answer, let them put it in, or present a bill of their own, and then they will bring the case within the scope of this act. But the only thing here in question is the right of these people not to be dealt with by the strong hand. That is all. I have not protected them in anything else. I think they have shown a prima facie case, which has not been answered. They have a right to go on that ground and work under that contract. That is the right I protected by the order, and that right ought not to be taken away from them pending the appeal. They ought not to be subjected to treatment by the strong hand. This court is against that sort of thing at all times. It deprecates that kind of thing. Go to the law, if you do not want these men to dig there. The courts are open. But do not drive them out by force and come here and say, "We have reasons, but we do not want to tell them." The courts say you must not do it.

I will not suspend the injunction in this case for that reason. I refuse to suspend the operation of the injunction, and will advise that the order be immediately discharged.

MILLS v. HENDERSHOT et al.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Dec. 23, 1905.)

1. CORPORATIONS—INSOLVENCY—TRANSFER OF ASSETS TO OFFICERS—VALIDITY.

The directors of an insolvent corporation ordered that corporate property should be transferred to two of their number, who assumed to pay certain creditors. The remaining property was insufficient to pay the corporate debts. The transfer to the two directors was made in contemplation of the corporation suspending business by reason of its insolvent condition. Held, that the transfers were void under Corporation Act (Laws 1896, p. 298, c. 185) § 64, providing that, when a corporation shall become insolvent, neither the directors nor officers shall convey any corporate assets, and the receiver of the corporation was entitled to recover from each transferee the value of the property transferred to him.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 12, Cent. Dig. Corporations, §§ 2154-2158.]

2. SUBROGATION — PAYMENT OF CORPORATE DEBTS—RIGHT TO SUBROGATION.

One of the transferees paid debts of the corporation in consideration of the transfer. Held, that he was entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the creditor to the extent of the debts paid, and have them included as a part of the claims against the corporation.

3. CORPORATIONS—INSOLVENCY—TRANSFER OF ASSETS—LIABILITY OF OFFICERS PARTICIPATING THEREIN.

Directors of an insolvent corporation transferred corporate property to two of their number in consideration of their paying certain creditors. The transfers were made in contemplation of the corporation suspending business. The remaining property was insufficient to pay the debts. Held, that, as the transfers were in violation of the duties of the directors and were participated in by all, each was liable for the diversion of the assets so far as necessary to pay the debts.

4. SAME — PAYMENT OF DIVIDENDS OUT OF CAPITAL—RECOVERY ON INSOLVENCY.

Dividends paid out of the capital of a corporation are recoverable by the receiver of the corporation on its insolvency, as far as may be necessary for the payment of debts.

5. SAME—PAYMENT OF EXCESSIVE SALARIES.

Officers of a corporation, misappropriating its assets by receiving excessive salaries, are liable to refund the same in an action by the receiver of the corporation to recover assets to pay debts.

6. SAME.

Where the stockholder of an insolvent corporation did not continue business for the purpose of giving an officer a salary, and the officer drawing the salary acted in good faith, and but for a division of opinion between him and other holders of the stock who controlled the corporation the business would have been closed up several years earlier, the receiver of the corporation, seeking to recover assets to pay debts, could not recover the reasonable salary received by the officer after the insolvency of the corporation.

7. SAME—INSOLVENCY—ACTION BY RECEIVER—RIGHTS OF RECEIVER.

Three persons, contemplating the formation of a corporation, entered into an agreement which provided for their salaries as officers of the corporation, and declared that they should be paid from the profits of the business and that the stockholders should be paid dividends before salaries were paid. The certificate of organization did not refer to the agreement, nor was it adopted at the first stockholders' meeting to organize the corporation. The three persons were elected directors, and at their meeting adopted a resolution providing that the dividends and salaries should be paid as specified in the agreement. Held, that the receiver of the corporation, seeking to recover assets to pay debts, was not entitled to the benefit of the agreement, and could not recover salaries paid from the capital with the acquiescence of the stockholders.

8. SAME—RECOVERY OF DIVIDENDS—TIME TO SUE.

A stockholder, receiving in good faith dividends declared by the officers of a corporation, without knowledge that they were paid out of the capital instead of the profits, holds them under a constructive trust, and an action by a receiver for their recovery to make assets to pay debts is barred in six years.

9. SAME.

Equity will not interpose the bar of limitations to prevent a receiver of a corporation from recovering from the directors and officers of the corporation dividends paid to them out of the capital of the corporation; such acts being in fraud of the corporation and its creditors.

10. SAME—STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION.

Corporation Act (Laws 1896, p. 298, c. 185) § 30, making directors liable for dividends declared and paid out of the capital of the corporation, does not affect the liability of officers of a corporation receiving as stockholders there-of dividends paid out of the capital.

11. SAME — AGREEMENT BY INCORPORATORS — ENFORCEMENT.

Three persons contemplating the formation of a corporation, entered into an agreement which provided for their salaries as officers of the corporation, and declared that they should be paid from the profits of the business after the stockholders had been paid dividends. The corporation was formed and became insolvent. In a suit against the three by the receiver of the corporation to recover assets to pay debts, two of them filed cross-bills against the third, and claimed the right to enforce the agreement by declaring a primary liability to the receiver on the part of the third on account of salary received by him, without asking a decree against him for the payment to themselves for the amount withdrawn by the third as salary, in violation of the agreement. Held that, as the receiver was not entitled to enforce the agreement, the decree in his favor could not establish the order of liability between the three defendants, based on the agreement.

12. SAME.

Three persons, contemplating the formation of a corporation, entered into an agreement providing for their salaries as officers of the corporation, and declaring that they should be paid out of the profits of the business. The corporation was formed, and one of the three received a salary as officer, paid from the capital. The other two knew that there were no profits and assented to such payment. Held, that the two could not recover the salary received; the payment allowed by themselves being a breach of the agreement.

13. SAME.

H., S., and W., officers of an insolvent corporation, directed the transfer of corporate property to H. and S. under an agreement whereby H. agreed to pay a certain creditor and S. a part of a note held by another creditor, and whereby S. and W. agreed to pay the balance of the note. In a suit by the receiver of the corporation, H. sought to enforce the agreement by directing a primary liability on the part of S. and W. to pay a decree in favor of the receiver. Held that, as the suit by the receiver was based on the invalidity of the contract, any right H. had against S. and W. under it was a matter of enforcement by an independent suit only.

14. ACTION—NATURE—LEGAL.

A contract entered into between the officers of an insolvent corporation on a distribution of a part of the assets thereof, whereby two of the officers agreed with the third to pay a note held by a creditor, creates, if established, a legal liability, and the persons liable thereon are entitled to have it established in a court of law.

15. WITNESSES — TRANSACTIONS WITH DECEASED PERSON.

A person seeking to enforce a contract entered into between him on the one hand and a decedent and a third person on the other is, under the express provisions of section 4 of the evidence act (P. L. 1900, p. 363), incompetent to testify as to transactions between himself and decedent, resulting in the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 50, Cent. Dig. Witnesses, § 664.]

Action by John M. Mills, as receiver of the F. D. Stephens Company, against Charles B. Hendershot and others. Heard on bill, answers and cross-bills, replication, and proofs. Decree ordered.

Charles Stillwell, Jr., for complainant. Elmer King, pro se. Albridge C. Smith, for defendant Hendershot. Joseph Hinchman, for defendant Welsh.

EMERY, V. C. The receiver of an insolvent corporation files this bill against the defendants Hendershot, Welsh, and Downs, three of the four stockholders of the company, and the administrator of the only remaining stockholder, F. D. Stephens, who is deceased. For the purpose of paying the debts of the insolvent corporation a recovery is sought upon three classes of alleged liabilities. Against the two defendants, Hendershot and the administrator of Stephens, the receiver claims the value of goods of the corporation taken by Hendershot and Stephens on a partial division of its assets, made between them after its insolvency, and on an agreement between Hendershot, Welsh, and Stephens, the only officers and directors of the company, for closing up its business and affairs without legal proceedings. The second claim is a several claim against all of the stockholders, including Downs, for the dividends received by them on their respective stock from the year 1895; it being alleged that the company from that time was insolvent, and that the dividends were paid, not out of the profits, but out of the capital of the company. The third claim of the receiver is against the defendants Hendershot and the administrator of Stephens for a return of their respective salaries since the year 1895. The liability to return the salaries is based partly on an agreement (set out in the bill) made prior to the formation of the company between the three proposed stockholders, Hendershot, Welsh, and Stephens, and partly on the claim that, since 1895, the business was continued and their salaries drawn with full knowledge of the insolvency of the company, and that it is liable to the extent of this further depletion of its assets by continuing the business, instead of closing up its affairs, in insolvency or otherwise. The agreement between Stephens, Hendershot, and Welsh was made for the purpose of taking over a general plumbing, heating, and tin-ware business previously conducted by Stephens, and of continuing the business, with its good will, as the F. D. Stephens Company; Stephens contributing stock, plant and good will, for which paid-up stock was to be issued to the amount of $8,000, $5,000 on the formation of the company and $3,000 by subsequent purchase. Hendershot and Welsh each paid in $2,500 in cash for their subscriptions to that amount. As to salaries, the agreement provided that Stephens, as secretary and salesman of the company, and Hendershot, as treasurer and bookkeeper, should each have an annual salary of $1,000, for which each should give his whole time and attention to the business. Welsh, the president, was to have no salary as such officer, but was to be paid for other services. The agreement contained these further provisions, on which the claim of the receiver is based: "Said salaries are to be paid from the profits of the business. The stockholders are to be paid a dividend of 10 per cent before anything is paid in salaries, and next in preference shall be the salary of C. B. Hendershot before any other salaries are paid." The certificate of organization did not refer to this agreement, nor did it contain the agreement in reference to the payment of dividends and salaries. Nor was the agreement referred to or adopted at the first stockholders' meeting to organize the company. But at the first meeting of the stockholders Welsh, Hendershot, and Stephens were elected the three directors, and at the first directors' meeting a resolution was passed that the dividends and salaries should be as specified in the article of agreement, which was placed in the book of minutes of the company. Cross-bills are filed by the defendant Stephens' administrator against Hendershot, and by defendant Welsh against both Stephens' administrator and Hendershot. The general object of each cross-bill is to establish against Hendershot a primary liability for the claims made by the receiver, or some of them, if established. This primary liability was claimed at the hearing as arising out of the contract relating to the postponement of salaries to dividends, and it is claimed that by reason of this agreement Hendershot should be held primarily liable for the salaries received, so far as necessary to pay debts, before any decree for the payment of dividends.

The evidence shows the company, whose business had been unprofitable since at least 1897, was in serious financial difficulty in the spring of 1903, and that in August, 1903, the Pierce, Butler & Pierce Company, its largest merchandise creditor, with a claim of about $2,100, was pressing for payment and threatening proceedings in bankruptcy. In consequence of this, and for the purpose of closing up the business without the appointment of a receiver, an arrangement was made by which Hendershot and Stevens, with the consent of Welsh, the president, and the other director, each took over at an appraisement or valuation, stock and goods of the company—Hendershot to the amount of $1,846.48, and Stevens to the amount of $1,530.86. Hendershot, under the agreement for division (which was made in August, 1903), was to pay the purchase price for the goods taken by him, to the Pierce Company on account of their claim, and shortly after making the agreement, and before actually taking the goods or consummating the agreement, Hendershot did, from his own money, pay $1,800 to the Pierce Company on account. After this payment disputes arose between the parties in reference to carrying out the agreement, and it was not until September 26, 1903, that Hendershot took the goods assigned to him, and on that date this receipt, signed by Welsh as president, and Stephens as secretary, was put on the inventory or bill of sale of his goods: "Received payment of the F. D. Stephens Co., the same to be applied to account of Pierce, Butler & Pierce Mfg. Co." Stephens was to pay his purchase price of $1,530.86 toward the reduction of notes of the company amounting to $3,000, held by the Clinton National Bank, on which Stephens and Welsh were indorsers. The balance of the stock not taken by Hendershot and Stephens, inventoried at a few hundred dollars, and which neither party desired to take, was to be sold by either of them and applied to the debts of the company. The assets were finally divided and the business taken over about September 26, 1903; Hendershot from that time carrying on the steam-heating business, and Stephens the other business of the company. Hendershot also undertook the completion of the company's outstanding contracts for putting in heaters, and has carried these out, paying the expenses and realizing a small profit, which has been used toward paying some of the company's debts. Hendershot also paid from his own money to the Pierce Company $1,800 on account of their claim, leaving about $300 still due, for which claim has been presented to the receiver. Stephens, although he took possession of the stock assigned to him, did not pay anything therefor, either to the company or by paying the price on the note held by the Clinton Bank or on any other claims. He died in November, 1903, and his estate is insolvent. Some of the goods not taken on the division were in the actual possession of Stephens at the time of his death, and his administrator has sold them, retaining the proceeds in a special account. The Clinton Bank's claim is over $3,700, and other valid claims for over $500 have been presented to the receiver, who has realized from the assets (including the stock not divided between Hendershot and Stephens) less than $600. At the time the assets of the company were taken over by Hendershot and Stephens the company was clearly in an insolvent condition. Its assets were not sufficient to pay its debts, and, the stockholders not being willing to make further advances, its credit was exhausted. The transfer to these two directors was made in contemplation of the company suspending its business by reason of this insolvent condition, and must, so far as the receiver representing creditors is concerned, be considered as having been made in contemplation of insolvency. The transfers were therefore void under the sixty-fourth section of the corporation act (Laws 1896, p. 298, c. 185), and the receiver is entitled to recover from each transferee the value of the property respectively assigned to him. The section saves only bona fide transfers, without notice and for present valuable consideration, and these transfers were in fact substantially arrangements between the stockholders, by which they agreed with each other to prefer two of the creditors by paying to them the money which was due to the company for the equal payment of all its creditors. Had the transfers been made to the creditors direct, they would have been utterly void under the statute, and if arrangements of this kind for disposition of a company's assets, on the brink of insolvency, are to be sustained, the law has been circumvented. The fair value of the property taken is admitted to be the inventory value, and the receiver is entitled to a decree against Hendershot and the administrator of Stephens for the amounts respectively taken, with interest. Hendershot, however, having paid debts of the company in consideration of the assignment, is entitled to be subrogated to the extent of the debts paid, and to have these debts included as part of the claims against the company. If the estate of Stephens, by reason of insolvency, does not satisfy the decree against him, then for the balance both Welsh and Hendershot are in the second place equally liable, and Welsh is secondarily liable on the decree against Hendershot for the value of the stock taken by him. The reason is that all three were the only directors and officers of the company, and the division of the assets in contemplation of insolvency, in violation of the statute and of their duties as directors, was made and concurred in by all. Each of them, in his proper order, is liable for the diversion of the assets, so far as necessary to pay the debts, and the value of these assets is the primary source of payment of the debts of the company.

But these values, together with the assets in the receiver's hands, applicable to that purpose, are not sufficient to pay the debts (including in these the amount of the Pierce Company claim, to which Hendershot is entitled to be subrogated if he satisfies the decree), and the next question is the right of the receiver to recover for that purpose sufficient of the dividends or salaries. This involves also the question of the order of liability as between the recipients of dividends and salaries. The fact relating to the receipts of dividends and salaries are that from March 1895, the dividends were paid, not out of the profits, but from the capital of the company. At this time Hendershot and Stephens, on account of the condition of the business, agreed to reduce their combined salaries from $2,000 to $1,000; Hendershot receiving $600, and Stephens $400. The payments of dividends continued up to March, 1900, and the amounts received by the defendants, respectively, were Stephens, on 45 shares, $2,475; Hendershot, on 25 shares, $1,375; Welsh, $1,375; and Downs, on 5 shares, $275. Within the six years prior to the filing of the bill (August 25, 1904) Stephens received $375, Hendershot $375, Welsh $375, and Downs $75. For salaries from and after March, 1895, Stephens received $800, nothing later than April, 1896, and Hendershot received $7,100, of which all except $2,400 was received prior to August, 1898. From 1895 to 1899 Hendershot received salary at the reduced rate of $600 yearly; in 1900 and 1901, after payment of dividends ceased, $800; and in 1902, and to October, 1903, at the rate of $1,000.

Stockholders are liable to the receiver for dividends paid out of the capital, so far as necessary for the payment of debts (Williams v. Bolce, 38 N. J. Eq. 364 [Runyon, Ch., 1884]), and for the same purpose officers are liable to refund excessive salaries, as being misappropriation of the assets (Hayes, Receiver, v. Pierson [Stevens, V. C.] 65 N. J. Eq. 353, 58 Atl. 728, affirmed on appeal [N. J. Err. & App.] 45 Atl. 1091; Davis v. Davis Co. [N. J. Ch.] 52 Atl. 717 [Reed, V. C.; 1902]; Lillard v. Oil, Paint & Drug Co. [N. J. Ch.] 56 Atl. 254 [Emery, V. C.; 1903]). From April, 1896, Stephens stopped drawing salary or rendering service, and Hendershot from that time seems to have managed the entire business, charging for three years $600 a year besides receiving $250 a year as dividends. The proofs as to the work actually performed by him would not justify the conclusion that $800 was an excessive salary. There was, however, no justification or excuse for the increase of his salary from $800 to $1,000 while the company was becoming more deeply involved every year, and his present explanation of it, that he drew the increased amount because Welsh and Stephens insisted on carrying on the business, and that he was entitled to $1,000 under the agreement, is altogether unsatisfactory as a justification of the increase. For the excess over $800 a year he must account to the receiver. So far as the receiver alone is concerned, there would be no liability (independent of the agreement between the stockholders) for the repayment by Hendershot of any of the salary beyond this excess, unless it be considered that the mere continuance of the business after the company's capital became impaired created such liability on his part. There is no evidence to sustain a conclusion that the business was continued by the stockholders for the purpose of giving him the salary, or in any bad faith on Hendershot's part; and, on the contrary, his evidence shows that, but for a division of opinion between him and the other holders of the stock who controlled the company, the business would probably have been closed up several years earlier. Independent of the agreement, therefore, the receiver, as representing creditors, has no right to recover any further portion of the back salaries from either Hendershot or the Stephens' estate. Does this agreement give him, as receiver, any right of recovery for that purpose? I think not. The agreement was made for the primary purpose of regulating, as between these individual stockholders themselves, and inter sese only, the disposition of the profits of the business while these stockholders continued to manage the business and draw salaries, and to define inter sese what should be profits. By force of this agreement salaries, which are ordinarily expenses of the business, were not (as between the stockholders entitled to dividends and to salaries also), to be considered as expenses. Reasonable salaries are in fact expenses to be deducted before any profits or dividends are payable, and the receiver, as representing creditors, is, in my judgment, not entitled to the benefit of this contract between these individual stockholders, for the purpose of recovering back the salaries which have been paid to them. From April, 1900, no dividends were paid, and to the knowledge of both Stephens and Welsh Hendershot took his salary without objection on their part. The contract might perhaps have been enforceable against either Hendershot or Stephens, drawing salaries as managers, on the application of any of the other stockholders while the company was a going concern, and if the payment had been objected to; but, the other stockholders having for over three years acquiesced in the payment of the salary before dividends, it is questionable whether they could require the return for their benefit as stockholders of a going company. The receiver, as representing creditors merely, occupies a less favorable position, and has no claim to recover the salaries, either directly or by way of adjusting any supposed equities between defendants. The decree to which he is entitled on his bill for the payment of debts must therefore be that he is entitled to recover, first, the value of the assets diverted in the manner above indicated by the defendants Hendershot and Stephens; secondly, the salary received by Hendershot after 1901 in excess of $800 a year; and, thirdly, the amounts of dividends. This includes all dividends paid within six years from the time of filing the bill, and the next question is whether the dividends paid prior to this date can be recovered, or whether the statute of limitations is applicable to the claim.

Against defendant Downs there can be no recovery for dividends received more than six years prior to the filing of the bill. He was not an officer of the company, and there is no proof that at the time of the receipt of the dividends before that time he had notice that the dividends were paid out of the capital of the company, instead of the profits. The dividends, when received, were received as his own money, and the receiver can be entitled to their return only on the equitable doctrine that, being in fact paid from the capital, a fund held by the company in trust for the payment of debts, the money received for dividends, being in fact capital, was impressed with this trust. But this trust, so raised by the doctrines of the court of equity, belongs to the class of implied or constructive trusts, and as to such trusts the general rule is that, in the absence of fraud, the statutes of limitations are applicable. In McLane v. Shepherd, 21 N. J. Eq. 76, 79 (1870), the rule was stated and the authorities cited by Chancellor Zabriskie. The case, however, was one where the remedies at law and equity for the alleged trust were concurrent, it being a case of agency, and in that class of cases the validity of the defense is settled. Smith v. Wood, 42 N. J. Eq. 563, 569, 7 Atl. 881 (Van Fleet, V. C.; 1887), affirmed on appeal 44 N. J. Eq. 603, 17 Atl. 1104 (1888). In Hayden v. Thompson, 71 Fed. 60, 69, 17 C. C. A. 592, the leading federal authorities for the general rule that the statute is applicable to implied or constructive trusts are collected by Sanborn, J., and a suit in equity by the receiver of an insolvent national bank against a stockholder for the recovery of dividends unlawfully paid out of the capital was held to be barred by the statute; the stockholder having innocently received the dividends in good faith, and without notice of any fact which would lead a reasonably prudent man to learn that the dividend was not earned. The opinion of Chancellor Runyon in Williams v. Boice, 38 N. J. Eq. 372 (1897), is relied on as holding the statute not applicable. That was a bill by the receiver of an insolvent bank to recover dividends alleged to have been paid out of capital, and on general demurrer to the bill this question of the application of the statute, although not raised either in the demurrer or at the argument, was considered by the Chancellor, and the statute declared inapplicable. As the bill was filed to recover all dividends paid after a certain date, and included (as I read the case) dividends paid within six years, the decision of the question whether the statute applied was not necessary or involved on a general demurrer. Under these circumstances I think I am justified in considering the question as not conclusively disposed of by the opinion. On examining the ground upon which it was based it appears that the decision of Justice Story in Wood v. Dummer, 3 Mason, 308, Fed. Cas. No. 17,944, was mainly relied on. This case was one where the stockholders of a bank, for the purpose of liquidating its affairs, divided the capital without reserving sufficient to pay the debts, and the right of recovery was placed expressly on the ground that, the capital stock being a trust fund, might be followed by the creditors into the hands of any person having notice of the trust attached to it, and that, as to the stockholders themselves, there could be in the case no pretense to say that both in law and in fact they were not affected with the most ample notice. Justice Story held that, under the charter of the company, the capital stock was a trust fund for the creditors, and the stockholders, upon the division, took it, subject to all equities attached to it, as impressed with the trust and cum onere. Such division of the capital among stockholders on liquidation is plainly a very different transaction from the receipt by the stockholder of dividends of a going company in the ordinary course of business, and legally declared, as he supposes, from the profits, and not from the capital. As to such innocent stockholder, who is liable only by reason of a constructive or implied trust which arose by reason of his receipt of the dividends, and which arose also at the time of the receipt, I think the statute should be held applicable. The other stockholders, however, Hendershot, Welsh, and Stephens, who were also the sole directors and officers of the company, as early as March, 1895, knew that the dividends were not paid from the profits, but from the capital. Their receipts of the dividends were, therefore, in fraud of the company and of its creditors, and a court of equity will not, on their behalf, interpose the bar of the statute. The circumstance that, under the corporation act (Laws 1896, p. 286, c. 185, § 30), they are not liable as directors after six years, does not affect their liability as stockholders for the amounts actually received in fraud of the company, for the liability of each of the directors under this statute is for the return of the whole dividend paid to all of the stockholders during the administration of the directors, a liability different in its character from that arising from the actual receipt of funds. Hendershot, Welsh, and Stephens are liable for the amounts received by them, respectively, as dividends since March, 1905, and Downs, since August, 1898, so far as necessary to pay the debts of the company, including the expenses of administration. As stockholders they are not liable beyond the amounts respectively received, but the liability is not merely for a proportionate share of the indebtedness; and therefore the solvent stockholders must make up, so far as they are chargeable with dividends, the deficiency of the insolvent estate of Stephens to pay its share of the debts. The bill is not framed to enforce any liability as directors, and no decree can be made on that basis.

The defendants Welsh and Stephens' administrator file separate cross-bills, based on the agreement of April 1, 1892, relating to the payment of dividends before salaries. The cross-bill of Stephens' administrator is filed against Hendershot, and that of Welsh against both Hendershot and Stephens' administrator. Neither the receiver nor the company is a party defendant to either cross-bill. Both bills make charges against Hendershot, relating to the management of the business, but the whole relief claimed at the hearing rests on the enforcement of the agreement, by declaring a primary liability to the receiver on the part of Hendershot on account of his receipt of salaries under the agreement. Neither of the cross-complainants asks in this suit a decree against Hendershot for the payment to themselves of the amounts withdrawn by him, or claim that there were any profits applicable to either dividends or salaries, under the agreement after 1895, or at least 1898. For the reasons above given the receiver is not at all entitled to an account of the salaries under the agreement for the purpose of paying debts, and there should be on his decree no provision for this indirect recovery of the salaries, by establishing an order of liability between the defendants themselves, based on an agreement which he cannot enforce. If the receiver was entitled, as he claimed in his bill, to a decree for the return of all salaries paid under the agreement, as well as all dividends, then a settlement of the order of liability, as between dividends and salaries, might be proper. The cross-bills must therefore, on the evidence be disposed of as independent suits in equity against Hendershot and Stephens' estate for an accounting for the salaries. Considered on this basis, they must both be dismissed.

Stephens received no salary within six years from the time of filing the bill, and any claim of Welsh against him is outlawed. Hendershot's salary was received with the assent of both Welsh and Stephens, who knew the financial condition of the company, but desired the continuance of the business by Hendershot, the only manager of the business for six years before the bill was filed. Neither of them, therefore, is entitled to recover back from Hendershot the salary for conducting the business which they together controlled, and which salary both understood he was receiving. These payments, made by consent and with full knowledge of the condition of the company, cannot be recovered or brought into account, on the ground that the payment allowed by themselves was a breach of the contract with them. Treating the payments of salaries as coming within the scope of the contract, the contract must, as to these payments, be considered as waived or abandoned. But I think that the sounder view is that these payments of salaries (at least those made after dividends ceased in 1900) were not considered as payments controlled by the dividend clause of the agreement. For, by the agreement, neither dividends nor salaries were to be paid, except from profits, and from 1900, at least, all parties knew that there were no profits to pay either dividends or salaries. And from this time, at least, the salary was by common consent treated as part of the expense of carrying on the business. If this view be correct, it cannot now be recovered on the theory that it was intended by the parties as a payment out of profits under the agreement relating to the division of profits. Both cross-bills must therefore be dismissed.

On behalf of Hendershot the claim is also made, by answer, but not by cross-bill, for the enforcement of the contract, alleged to have been made with him on the division of the assets, that Stephens should pay $1,500 on the Clinton Bank notes, and that Welsh and Stephens should take care of the balance due on these notes, if the assets were insufficient. This enforcement is also sought by the indirect method of directing a primary liability on their part to pay any decree to the receiver. The receiver does not seek the enforcement of this contract or any rights thereunder, for his decree is based on the repudiation of its validity. Any right, therefore, which Hendershot has against either Welsh or Stephens under such contract, is a matter for enforcement by an independent suit, and not by a direction as to the order of liability for the receiver's decree. The contract, moreover, if considered to be proved by Hendershot, establishes a liability which is purely legal and not equitable, and both Welsh and Stephens' administrator are entitled to its establishment in a legal tribunal. In Headley v. Leavitt (Err. & App. 1905), 60 Atl. 963, a claim under a similar contract was sent to a court of law for settlement. It should be further stated that, as against the administrator of Stephens, there is no evidence of his intestate's contract to pay the balance due on the Clinton Bank notes after paying thereon the value of the goods taken by Stephens, except that of Hendershot as to transactions between the intestate and himself. The evidence was objected to at the hearing, and, being inadmissible under the evidence act (P. L. 1900, p. 383, § 4), cannot be considered. On the answer of Hendershot, therefore, there can be no direction, in the decree in the receiver's bill, that a primary liability, either for the Clinton Bank notes or any other debt of the company, must be first satisfied by either Welsh or the Stephens' estate, because of this alleged contract on the division of the assets.

Decree will be advised in accordance with this opinion, and on the settlement of the decree I will hear parties as to a reference.

LENGYEL et al. v. MEYER et al.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Dec. 28, 1905.)

1. EASEMENTS—LIGHT AND AIR.

Where a deed with full covenants of warranty conveyed certain property, including a party wall containing windows overlooking defendant's adjoining property, and provided that such wall should remain a party wall and that both parties should be entitled to rights therein, the grantee in the deed acquired an easement over such adjoining property of the right to keep such windows open and receive light and air therefrom, which was determinable only on the use of the wall for building purposes by the adjoining property owner.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 17, Cent. Dig. Easements, §§ 35-39.]

2. COSTS—EQUITY SUIT—APPORTIONMENT.

Complainants sued to reform a deed for fraud and to restrain the violation of their easement of light and air through windows in a party wall. Defendant, the grantor, and his grantee of the adjoining property defended the whole case jointly, under circumstances indicating that the grantor was interested in defeating complainants' claim. A large part of the expense was caused by the charge of fraud alleged by complainants, which was not sustained; but complainants were successful in restraining the violation of their alleged easement. Held that, each party having partially succeeded, no costs were to be allowed to either.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 13, Cent. Dig. Costs, §§ 98-101, 111-114.]

Bill by John Lengyel and another against Julius Meyer and others to establish an alleged right to the use of windows and light and air through the same. Decree for complainants.

Harry Meyer and Peter Backes, for complainants. David H. Bilder, for defendants.

STEVENSON, V. C. 1. The allegations in the bill to the effect that the covenant in relation to the party wall was fraudulently inserted in the deed to the complainants without their knowledge or consent, are not only not proved to be true, but are proved to be false. Counsel for complainants on the argument abandoned all claim that the deed from Julius Meyer to the complainants should be reformed so as to excise the above-mentioned covenant. The claim of the complainants in this cause remaining for consideration is confined to the question whether under the facts proved, allowing the deed to stand unimpeached, on the ground of fraud, and containing this covenant relating to the party wall, the complainants are entitled to an injunction against the defendant Lobsenz.

2. In December, 1899, the complainants were the equitable owners of a lot in the city of Passaic, 25x100 feet, situate on the corner of Second and Bergen streets. Their title was created by an agreement with one Samuel Weinberger, who in turn held a similar agreement with Julius Meyer, the then owner of the property. The lot was covered for a distance of 90 feet from the front of a four-story brick building. Julius Meyer, from whom this equitable title in the complainants had come, was the owner of a lot 25x100 feet adjacent on the south to the lot which the complainants had contracted to buy. This adjacent lot was vacant, except so far as it was occupied by the small one-story building hereinafter mentioned. 'As a matter of fact the southerly wall of the brick building throughout its entire length, extending back 90 feet from Second street, rested almost equally upon the complainants' lot and the lot retained by Julius Meyer. The stone foundation wall is 2 feet thick. For a certain height the brick wall resting upon the stone foundation is 16 inches thick, and the upper portion of the brick wall is 12 inches thick. The position of the wall and its thickness, which is quite beyond the requirements of a single building, indicate that it was constructed by Mr. Meyer as a party wall, to be used for the purposes of a building on each lot. The first story of the complainants' building was constructed for use as a store or place of business and is now used for such purpose. The three upper stories are divided into apartments for families. In order to supply light and air to the apartments situate on the southerly side of the building, as the bill alleges, "the said Julius Meyer caused to be constructed in the southerly wall of the said building 22 windows overlooking the adjoining premises belonging to the said Meyer, and at the same time the said Meyer caused to be erected and constructed on the adjoining property on the south a one-story brick building to be used and which is now used for store purposes." The proofs show that with all these windows opening upon his practically vacant lot, Julius Meyer agreed to sell the corner lot with its building, and the equitable title created by this agreement became vested in the complainants. The contract between complainants and Samuel Weinberger, under which the complainants acquired their title, expressly provides for the conveyance of the land "with the building thereon erected"; and further provides that upon the stipulated payments being made Weinberger would procure a proper deed to be made by Julius Meyer conveying the property to the complainants free from all incumbrances, with full covenants including warranty. Whether the contract between Meyer and Weinberger was the same, mutatis mutandis, as the contract between Weinberger and the complainants, it is unnecessary to inquire on account of the subsequent carrying out of both contracts.

When the complainants made their contract with Weinberger upon which they made a substantial payment, they supposed that the entire wall rested upon the 25-foot lot, which by the contract they were to acquire. Their counsel, however, discovered what the situation of the wall was, and thereupon he informed the complainants, and a survey was made which showed all parties the true location of the wall, that the wall stood manifestly as a party wall. What relief the complainants would have been entitled to in a court of equity on the ground of mistake or on the ground of fraud if they had made complaint immediately upon making this discovery, we need not discuss; nor need we discuss the nature and extent of the rights which the complainants and Julius Meyer, respectively, would have enjoyed in respect of this wall, and particularly in respect of the windows therein, in case the deed from Julius Meyer to the complainants had followed the agreement and had conveyed the corner lot 25 feet by 100, with the brick building erected thereon. What the complainants might have done, what rights they would have enjoyed, whether the complainants did or did not place themselves in a worse position by accepting the deed which finally they did accept, or whether that deed with its covenant in reference to the party wall merely expressed what would have been implied in case such covenant had not been inserted in the deed. These are all questions which may be dismissed without consideration. What the parties with full knowledge of the facts did, was this: They met with counsel and an interpreter, and the result was that the deal was closed, and the warranty deed from Julius Meyer to the complainants was delivered, to which deed, however, was added the following covenant: "It is hereby stipulated and agreed by the said parties for themselves, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, that the wall on the southerly side of the building on the lot herein conveyed, which wall is 16 inches wide at the first story, 8 inches on the lot herein conveyed, and 8 inches on the lot adjoining, and 12 inches above the first story, 7½ inches on the lot herein conveyed, and 4½ inches on the lot adjoining, shall be a party wall, and both parties entitled to rights therein; the party of the first part owning the said lot adjoining."

Subsequently Julius Meyer conveyed the vacant lot to the defendant Lobsenz, who confessedly occupies with respect to this controversy the same position that Julius Meyer would have occupied if he had retained the ownership of the vacant lot. The dispute between the parties in this cause has not arisen from any attempt on the part of either Meyer or Lobsenz to use the wall in question as a party wall, and by such use to obstruct the passage of light and air through the complainants' windows. The defendant Lobsenz claims the right to block up these windows with thin brick walls, erecting the same upon the window sills, without trespassing upon the land of the complainants. The complainants allege that Lobsenz has sought to compel them to pay him for the privilege of maintaining the windows. Lobsenz alleges that the tenants of the complainants have thrown articles out of the windows upon his lot, and have also trespassed upon the roof of his one-story building causing the roof to leak, etc. These matters, however, seem to be of no importance. If the complainants are entitled to an easement of light and air, the defendant Lobsenz cannot be permitted to interfere with that easement by blocking up the windows for the purpose of protecting his property from trespass through the windows. Bloom v. Koch, 63 N. J. Eq. 10, 50 Atl. 621 (1902). Excluding from consideration both the fact that this wall from its position and size appears to have been designed as a party wall, and the express covenant relating to the wall contained in the deed, there can be no question that under the settled law of New Jersey the conveyance of this lot and building to the complainants created by implication an easement of light and air for the benefit of the existing windows. These windows plainly are "necessary" to the enjoyment of the upper stories of the building within the meaning defined, so far as such meaning has been defined by the decisions of the courts of this state. Sutphen v. Therkelson, 38 N. J. Eq. 318, 323 (1894); Johnson v. Hahne, 61 N. J. Eq. 438, 441, 49 Atl. 5 (1901); Tooth v. Bryce, 50 N. J. Eq. 589, 594, 25 Atl. 182 (1892).

It may be that the doctrine under which the easement of light and air is created by an implied grant or an implied reservation ought not to be extended. The rule which permits an implied reservation of this easement has been criticised by Vice Chancellor Pitney (Tooth v. Bryce, 50 N. J. Eq. 589, 25 Atl. 182 [1892]), in which criticism Vice Chancellor Stevens seems to concur. Denman v. Mentz, 63 N. J. Eq. 618, 616, 617, 52 Atl. 1117 (1902). To many minds the rule prevailing in Massachusetts and in other states that in cases like the present one the easement of light and air can only be created by an express grant, or an express reservation, may seem more consistent with the American view of this easement and less liable to produce situations of hardship and injustice than the rule which prevails in New Jersey. See Keats v. Hugo, 115 Mass. 204, 15 Am. Rep. 80 (1874). But the duty of this court; whatever may be the views of individual judges, is to fairly apply the established law of the state. That law, leaving out of view the party wall, gives the complainants the easement which they claim, and entitles the complainants to the remedy of an injunction to protect the enjoyment of their easement from the conduct of the defendant Lobsenz in blocking up their windows. The narrow question is whether the existence of the party wall under this express covenant in the deed makes the case an exception to the general rule, so as to prevent the deed in which the covenant appears, from creating the easement of light and air by implication by an implied grant.

There seems to be two ways in which an express covenant in a deed may have the effect to prevent the creation of an easement by an implied grant. One of these ways is exhibited where the express covenant and the implied grant relate directly to the same subject-matter. The rule to be applied in such cases is contained in the maxim "expressum facit cessare tacitum." Greer v. Van Meter, 54 N. J. Eq. 270, 33 Atl. 794 (1896); Bloom v. Koch, supra. It is quite evident, I think, that the express covenant in this case does not relate directly to the reception of light and air through the complainants' windows. In making the covenant the minds of the parties were engaged in dealing with the status of the wall as an appurtenance to the existing building, and as an appurtenance to a building which might thereafter be erected upon the adjacent lot. The covenant ignores the existence of the windows, and apparently is in the same form in which it would have been cast if no windows in fact had been in existence. The other way in which an express covenant may operate to prevent the grant of an easement by implication is exhibited where the rights created by the express covenant are inconsistent with the enjoyment of the easement. The maxim "expressum facit cessare tacitum" also applies to this class of cases but manifestly for a different reason from that which sustains its application to the class of cases first above mentioned. In Denman v. Mentz, 63 N. J. Eq. 618, 52 Atl. 1117 (1902); an express covenant against incumbrances was held to prevent the creation of an easement of light and air for the benefit of the grantors' building by an implied reservation. A covenant on the part of the grantor that the granted land was free from all incumbrances was held to be inconsistent with an implied provision to be read into the instrument creating an incumbrance.

I do not find that the existence of this party wall and of the express covenant in relation to it contained in the deed is inconsistent with the establishment of an easement of light and air in some form. Let it be assumed that the covenant gives the defendant Lobsenz the right to close up all the windows so as to make the entire wall solid at all points and equally capable at every point of holding beams and performing the functions of a party wall. It is not necessary to decide that the correct construction of this covenant leads to any such result. The matter may all be left open, so far as this case is concerned. The above assumption, however, establishes a condition which gives the argument against the existence of the easement in any form the greatest possible force. We may note in passing that the covenant was made with reference to an existing wall, which in fact had windows, and that it is plainly possible to use the wall to a large extent as a party wall without entirely blocking up all these windows. It may be, also, that owing to some other conditions which appear from the evidence, but which I have not described, the right of the defendant Lobsenz to use this wall as a party wall in the ordinary way is subjected to modification. I do not pause to consider these matters because upon the extreme supposition that under this covenant the defendant Lobsenz may at any time erect a building upon his lot and use the entire length and height of this wall as a party wall to sustain his beams and constitute one side of his building, placing his beams wherever he may see fit and rendering the wall at all points uniformly strong and thick, my conclusion is that if our New Jersey doctrine of easements of light and air by implied grant is fairly applied, it must be held that the complainants' building has at least a modified easement which only the actual use of this wall by the owner of the adjacent lot as a party wall can interfere with or destroy. There seems to be no reason why an easement of light and air may not be created, which shall be determinable upon the happening of some condition within the control of the parties to the instrument, by which expressly or impliedly the easement is created.

The easement in its ordinary form is liable to prove a somewhat uncertain and even transient form of property. In order to its continued enjoyment the windows to which it relates must be maintained without change of location. The value of the easement may depend upon the maintenance of a frail and ruinous building or the ability of the owner of the dominant tenement to replace such building with another having windows in the same places. Johnson v. Hahne, supra; City National Bank v. Van Meter, 59 N. J. Eq. 32, 45 Atl. 280 (1896). It may be observed, also, that even though the easement of light and air may not be acquired by prescription, the owners of buildings frequently open windows upon their neighbor's land in order to receive light and air through them, to the same extent as if they had an easement, although they are well aware that at any time their windows are liable to be closed. The reception of light and air through windows may be of great practical value to the owner of a building, notwithstanding the fact that this light and air may be cut off at any time when the owner of the adjacent land may so elect. There is no reason why an easement of light and air cannot be expressly granted, so as to endure for the benefit of windows through a party wall until such party wall shall be applied to the use of an adjacent building. This, I think, is precisely what these contracting parties did. The implied grant of the easement of light and air is modified by the express covenant to the extent that the accomplishment of all the objects of the covenant—the enjoyment of all the rights created by it—imposes such modification. The complainants, I think, have a right to the enjoyment of this easement until the defendant Lobsenz, in the exercise of his right to use the wall as a party wall (whatever the extent of that right may be), shall necessarily modify or destroy the complainants' right. Inasmuch as the defendant Lobsenz has threatened to wall up the complainants' windows, not for the purpose of any use of the wall by him as a party wall, but merely for the purpose of shutting off the complainants' light and air, and blocking up openings through which persons may go, and objects may be discharged from the complainants' building onto his (Lobsenz's) premises, the complainants, I think, are entitled to an injunction. The decree will not attempt to construe this covenant, so as to define the extent of the defendant Lobsenz's right to use the wall as a party wall because this court in this case has no jurisdiction of that matter. The conduct of the defendant complained of, which will be restrained by the injunction, has no possible relation to any right which he claims to use the wall as a party wall under the covenant.

3. Counsel for defendants urges that the defendant Julius Meyer is entitled to have the bill dismissed as to him with costs inasmuch as the charge of fraud in respect of the covenant relating to the party wall contained in the deed from him to the complainants has been disproved and abandoned. Julius Meyer, however, has defended this whole case jointly with the defendant Lobsenz, a single joint answer being filed. Moreover, it appears that Meyer conveyed the servient tenement to Lobsenz and for all that appears he may have given a covenant against incumbrances. However, that may be, Meyer has defended the whole case precisely as Lobsenz has defended it, and there are indications that he was interested in some way in defeating the complainants' claim, not only to a reformation of their deed, but to the remedy of an injunction. On the other hand, a large part of the expense of this cause has been caused by the false charge of fraud contained in the complainants' bill on which they founded their prayer that their deed from Meyer should be reformed.

Under the circumstances, each party having partly succeeded, no costs will be allowed to either.

IN RE FERDON'S ESTATE.

(Prerogative Court of New Jersey. Oct. 13, 1905.)

GIFT—EVIDENCE TO ESTABLISH—EXECUTORS—ASSETS.

A note payable to an intestate had been inventoried as an asset of her estate. A person not a party to the note by petition to the orphans' court asked an order directing the administrator to deliver the note to him. On an order to show cause, petitioner's proofs tended to show that the note took the place of a previous note made by the same maker to a person previously deceased, which petitioner claimed had been given by her to the intestate for life and on her death to petitioner.

Held, that the orphans' court properly refused the order sought (1) because there was no sufficient proof of the gift which petitioner claimed, and (2) because, if sufficient proof had been made, the court had no jurisdiction to determine the equitable ownership in the absence of parties who might contest that claim.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Orphans' Court, Bergen County.

In the matter of the estate of Louisa Ferdon, deceased. From a decree of the orphans' court on petition of Stephen B. Ferdon, he appeals. Modified.

Charles B. Dunn and Michael Dunn, for appellant. Cornelius Doremus, for respondent.

MAGIE, Ordinary. This appeal challenges the correctness of a decree of the orphans' court of Bergen county, made upon the petition of Stephen B. Ferdon, the appellant.

The petitioner represented that Louisa Ferdon, the mother of appellant, had died intestate, and that letters of administration had been granted upon her estate to Clarence Mayble, who had included in the inventory of the assets of the estate a note made by L. L. Conklin to the order of the intestate for $500. The petition avers that the note was not the property of Louisa Ferdon, but of appellant. Thereupon the petitioner asked an order requiring the administrator to show cause why the note should not be delivered to appellant. Upon the petition and affidavits annexed, a rule to show cause why the note in question should not be delivered to Stephen B. Ferdon, the petitioner, was allowed and brought to hearing. Thereupon the order appealed from was made, decreeing that the note in question was an asset of the estate of Louisa Ferdon, deceased, for which her administrator should account.

Appellant's evidence presents the following case: One Jane Berdan, who died at a time not specified, but long before the date of the note in question, had, in her lifetime, a note made to her by Lewis L. Conklin for $500, with interest. There is some evidence that she left at her death written directions respecting that note, but the directions are not produced, nor is it made to appear that they were testamentary in character. But it does appear that after her death Stephen Berdan, her husband, had possession of the note and dealt with it as if it was held by him upon a trust to pay to Louisa Ferdon the interest thereof during her life and after her death to pay the principal to Stephen B. Ferdon the appellant. It appears that Stephen Berdan continued to pay the interest on $500 to Louisa Ferdon until August 1, 1870, when, pursuant to an agreement executed by Louisa Ferdon and her husband and Stephen B. Ferdon, the appellant, Stephen Berdan delivered the note to Louisa Ferdon and was released and discharged from all liability therefor by the said Louisa Ferdon and her husband and Stephen B. Ferdon. The note thus delivered was the note given by Conklin to Jane Berdan. Appellant testifies that he left that note with his mother so that she might collect the interest. He asserts that he never knew, until after his mother's death, that a new note had been made by Conklin to the order of his mother. Conklin is now dead. Appellant insists that the note inventoried represents the note originally made by Conklin to Jane Berdan, and lays his claim upon the gift of Jane Berdan to his mother Louisa Ferdon for life, and to him upon her death.

The court below refused the relief prayed, upon the ground that appellant had not established his claim by proof. The order may well be supported upon the grounds stated in the orphans' court. The money due upon the original note to Jane Berdan is not shown to have been disposed of by her by any testamentary disposition, nor by any proof of a gift inter vivos. Until such proof is presented, it remains the property of the representative of Jane Berdan. But, if proof by the appellant could raise the question he seeks to have solved, it is manifest that he has resorted to a tribunal incompetent to give relief. The relief he asks, namely, delivery of the note to him, would leave him as far from effective relief as when he filed his petition. His claim, if he has any claim which can be sustained, is to be pursued in a court of equity, and as against the maker of the note or his representatives. They are not parties to this proceeding. If the note inventoried represents the original note, the administrator of Louisa Ferdon would also be a necessary party, as well as the representatives of Jane Berdan, deceased. On such a proceeding the appellant, if his proof were sufficient, might obtain relief.

The decree of the orphans' court, however, adjudicates that the note in question is an asset of the estate of Louisa Ferdon, to be accounted for by the administrator. This action may embarrass, and possibly prevent, petitioner from asserting his equitable right in a proper proceeding with proper parties. The proper order would have been to discharge the order to show cause and to dismiss the petition.

The decree appealed from will be thus modified, and affirmed as modified.

BOLAND v. KAVENY.

(Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey.
Nov. 20, 1905.)

APPEAL AND ERROR — DISMISSAL — INSUFFICIENCY OF BOOK.

Where a book furnished the Court of Errors and Appeals on a writ of error contains no transcript of the proceedings, no pleadings in the court below, and no statement of the case, there is nothing upon which the court can act, and the writ of error will be dismissed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 3, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, §§ 2721, 3126.]

Error to Supreme Court.

Action by Matthew Boland against John Kaveny. There was a judgment of the Supreme Court (58 Atl. 99), affirming the judgment of a district court for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Dismissed.

James N. Trimble and Elvin W. Crane, for plaintiff in error. Charles C. O'Connor, for defendant in error.

PER CURIAM. The writ of error was returned with a judgment of the Supreme Court (58 Atl. 99), affirming a judgment of a district court. The book furnished the court contains no transcript of the proceedings, no pleadings in the court below, and no state of the case. There is, therefore, nothing upon which the court can act, and the writ of error will be dismissed.

In re POLLEY'S ESTATE.

(Prerogative Court of New Jersey. Dec. 14, 1905.)

1. WILLS—CONSTRUCTION—SUBSTITUTION OF WORDS.

A testatrix bequeathed and devised to her infant daughter all her residuary estate absolutely, with the following proviso: "Provided, however, that if my said daughter should die before attaining the age of 21 years, or without disposing of the same or all of it, or without having made a last will and testament," then over. Held, that in construing the proviso "and" cannot be substituted for "or," as such substitution would express a sense contrary to the plain intent of testatrix.

2. SAME.

Considering the incapacity of the infant to make a will or dispose of property during minority, an intent is disclosed to make applicable the first contingency to the period of minority, and the two other contingencies to the infant's life after coming of age.

3. SAME—GIFT OVER.

Upon this construction the power of disposal given to the first taker will not avoid the gift over, if the first contingency, viz., death of the infant during minority, shall happen. Whether, if the infant survives to be 21, the power of disposal thus given will not avoid the gift over—quære.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Orphans' Court, Passaic County.

In the matter of the estate of Eva R. Polley, deceased. From an order holding that a certain provision of the will was void, Rose Ryerson and Laura Watson appeal. Reversed.

Pitney & Hardin, for appellants. Horton & Tilt, for respondent.

MAGIE, Ordinary. Eva R. Polley, by her will probated May 11, 1900, appointed her mother, Rose Ryerson, and her sister, Laura Watson, executrices, and directed them to pay debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, and then provided as follows: "I give, devise and bequeath to my daughter Viola Polley all my estate, both real and personal, of every kind and nature whatsoever, to be hers absolutely, provided, however, that if my said daughter should die before attaining the age of 21 years, or without disposing of the same or all of it, or without having made a last will and testament, then and in such case I give, devise and bequeath the same to my said mother and sister, share and share alike." By an order made March 30, 1905, the orphans' court of Passaic county, after adjudicating that the proviso of the will above quoted was void, directed that certain chattels, which comprised the residue of the personal estate of the testatrix in the hands of the executrices, should be delivered to Robert H. Fordyce, the guardian of Viola Polley (who is a minor), on his paying certain sums which, by the account of the executrices previously allowed by the court, were due then from the estate. Notwithstanding the adjudication that the proviso was void, which adjudication seems necessarily to deny any contingent interest of Rose Ryerson and Laura Watson in the residue of testatrix's personal estate, the order directed the guardian to give security to protect their interest. The appeal before me is taken by Rose Ryerson and Laura Watson from the order above stated, and they claim, first, that the orphans' court possessed no jurisdiction to pass upon the meaning of the will and make such an order as was made, and, second, that if there was jurisdiction in the orphans' court, it erred in its construction of the proviso, which was adjudged void.

By the opinion of the learned judge of the orphans' court it appears that his conclusion was reached, upon the ground that the three distinct contingencies, on the happening of which the gift over was to take effect, were coterminous, so that death before 21 years, and death without having disposed of all the gift, or death without having made a will, were all contingencies applicable during the minority of the infant. Upon such construction, the inference was that a power of complete disposition having been disclosed, the gift was absolute, and the proviso for a gift over was unavailing. If the learned judge correctly divined the intent of testatrix as disclosed by the clause above set out it would seem that his deduction is in accord with the well-known rule that an absolute gift with unlimited power of disposition, will not be limited by a gift of what has not been disposed of, because of an incompatibility of the gift over with the absolute gift. Borden v. Downey, 35 N. J. Law, 74; Downey v. Borden, 36 N. J. Law, 460; McClellan v. Larchar, 45 N. J. Eq. 17, 16 Atl. 269; Rodenfels v. Schumann, 45 N. J. Eq. 383, 17 Atl. 688; Dobson v. Sevars, 52 N. J. Eq. 611, 30 Atl. 477; Id., 53 N. J. Eq. 347, 33 Atl. 388; Annin's Ex'rs v. Vandoren's Adm'r, 14 N. J. Eq. 135; Benz v. Fabian, 54 N. J. Eq. 615, 35 Atl. 760. But I am unable to attribute to the words of the proviso the meaning which the court below gives to them. In my judgment the words disclose a different intent on the part of testatrix. The three contingencies, on the happening of all or one of which the gift over is to take effect, are not connected by the copulative "and," but by the disjunctive "or." In support of the order appealed from it is argued that "or" may be, and in this case should be, read as if it were "and." There is no doubt that such substitution has been made in many cases. Nevison v. Taylor, 8 N. J. Law, 43; Den v. Mugvay, 15 N. J. Law, 332; Holcombe v. Lake, 24 N. J. Law, 688; Id., 25 N. J. Law, 609.

In the Court of Errors it was declared that, when there is a devise with a limitation over in case the devisee die under 21 or without issue, the word "or" must be construed "and," unless there are words in the will manifesting a contrary intention. Holcombe v. Lake, 25 N. J. Law, 618. With such a limitation over, the inference of an intent which could only be expressed by the use of the copulative, is so persuasive as to require that use, unless other words in the will forbid it. But where the limitation over is on contingencies which indicate in their language a particular intent which would not be expressed by the substitution of "and" for "or," then no such substitution should be made. To do so would be to thwart the will of the testatrix. In this case, the substitution of "and" for "or" would be contrary to the manifest intention of the testatrix in my judgment. At the time of the execution of the will, the primary beneficiary was an infant of a few years of age. She could make no will until she became of age. During minority, she could not dispose of her property. When her mother, by this proviso, made a gift over upon one contingency, viz., death of the infant during minority; and then added two other contingencies, viz., death without having disposed of the property and death without having made a will, it seems to me clear that her intent was that the latter two contingencies were only to take effect on the gift after the infant became of age, and was capable of making a will and disposing of the property. It should be read thus: "Provided however that if my said daughter should die before attaining the age of 21 years, or 'if after attaining such age she should die' without having disposed of the same, or all of it, or without having duly made a last will and testament, then * * * I give," etc. Upon this construction, the first contingency is the only one operative during the infant's minority. When the other contingencies come into operation upon the infant's arriving at full age, it may be questioned whether, since a complete power of disposition is then given, they will not be wholly void. But that question is not now presented.

It results that it was erroneous to adjudicate that the proviso is void. On the contrary, that part which provides for a gift over if the infant dies before 21, is effective, and while the residue may be taken by the infant's guardian, the court may require security to be given to those who will succeed if that contingency happens, pursuant to the proviso. This result renders it unnecessary to determine whether the orphans' court had jurisdiction to make such an order. It is conceded that its power in that respect arises solely from legislation which is now contained in section 173 of the act entitled "An act respecting the orphans' court and relating to the powers and duties of the ordinary and the orphans' court and surrogates," approved June 14, 1898. Laws 1898, p. 715. Whether such legislation is within the constitutional power of the Legislature, has been questioned. Adams v. Adams, 46 N. J. Eq. 298, 19 Atl. 14. In re Lippincott's Estate (N. J. Frerog.) 59 Atl. 884. It may be further observed that the transcript discloses no application on the part of the guardian, such as is required by the act. As this legislation seeks to transfer to the orphans' court the jurisdiction which the court of chancery always possessed over suits for the recovery of legacies, and the incidental jurisdiction over the construction of wills, it is not possible to conceive that the Legislature intended that the orphans' court could be moved to act without some formal petition setting out the applicant's claim. If the legislation is effective, it has been determined that an order or decree made thereon will have no force as to a person interested, unless notice to him has been given of the application. Adams v. Adams, ubi supra.

It therefore seems clear that a formal application should be made in such cases, and the parties in interest should be brought in by some process or notice. But upon the erroneous construction of the will in question, I conclude that the order appealed from must be reversed.

WHITEHEAD et al. v. AMERICAN LAMP & BRASS CO.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Dec. 29, 1905.)

1. GUARANTY—CONSTRUCTION—DURATION.

Where a letter of a guaranty was dated August 1, 1903, and recited that the writer would guaranty purchases made by a third party during "this year," the guaranty should be construed as limited to the remainder of the year 1903.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 25, Cent. Dig. Guaranty, §§ 46, 47.]

2. SAME—PAST INDEBTEDNESS—CONSIDERATION.

A guaranty of past indebtedness of a third person without a consideration passing to the guarantor is unenforceable.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 25, Cent. Dig. Guaranty, §§ 18-60.]

3. CORPORATIONS—INDEBTEDNESS OF THIRD PERSONS—GUARANTY—ULTRA VIRES—ESTOPPEL.

Where defendant corporation, engaged in a manufacturing business, agreed to guaranty the indebtedness of a third person for materials to be used in the manufacture of goods for such corporation, which could not have been obtained but for such guaranty, it was estopped, after obtaining the benefit thereof, to deny its liability on the ground that the contract was ultra vires.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 12, Cent. Dig. Corporations, §§ 1556-1561, 1815.]

Action by William R. Whitehead and others against the American Lamp & Brass Company. From an order of a receiver of defendant company disallowing the claim of the Fostoria Glass Company, it appeals. Reversed in part.

E. C. Long, for appellant. F. S. Katzenbach, for the appellee receiver.

BERGEN, V. C. The Clark Bros. Glass Manufacturing Company, a partnership, was engaged in the business of manufacturing glass, and assembling parts of lamps with which they made the completed article. The lamps were made for the insolvent corporation, which had been organized under the laws of this state and carried on its business in the city of Trenton. The Fostoria Glass Company, prior to August 1, 1903, had sold to the Clark Bros. Company a considerable quantity of goods, and applied to its debtor for a guaranty of the payment, not only of the amount due, but of all future purchases by the Clark Bros. Company. In reply to this application, which was referred to the defendant company, it wrote to the Fostoria Company, the following letter, signed by its proper officers: "Trenton, N. J. Aug. 1, 1903. Fostoria Glass Company, Moundsville, West Va., W. A. V. Dalsell, Pres.—Dear Sir: The Clark Bros. Glass Manufacturing Company of Elwood City have referred to us your letter of July 30th regarding your account against them, and, as the goods which they buy of you are used in the manufacture of lamps for our account, we are willing to guaranty to you the ultimate payment of all purchases from you up to date, as well as any future purchases during this year, regardless of whether the account is an open one or has been closed by their note. As this letter is a standing guaranty covering all transactions, it will obviate the necessity of indorsing any note sent you from time to time, so that settlement need not be referred to us for specific guaranty in each instance." The appellant company shipped to the Clark Bros. Company goods as ordered by them until the month of February, 1904, when that partnership was declared insolvent and an assignee appointed for them in the state of Pennsylvania, and about the same time the defendant in this cause was declared to be an insolvent corporation, and Robert S. Woodruff was appointed its receiver by this court. At the time of the insolvency of the Clark Bros. Company it was indebted to the appellant in the sum of $5,229.52, and it is for this debt that the claim of the Fostoria Glass Company was presented to the receiver of the defendant company; payment being claimed from it, based upon the guaranty alleged to be contained in the foregoing letter. This claim the receiver has rejected, and from such determination this appeal has been taken.

The Clark Bros. Company and the defendant company kept separate books of account, and at the time of the adjudication of insolvency of the Clark Bros. Company the defendant company was their creditor to an amount exceeding $27,000. That the power to guaranty the payment of the past and accruing indebtedness of a third party is not within the chartered powers of the insolvent corporation is the ground upon which the receiver bases the disallowance of this claim.

Whether an indemnity to one who is to furnish material to another for the purpose of being used in the manufacture of goods for the account of the guarantor is beyond the corporate powers of a manufacturing company organized under the laws of this state, it is not necessary here to determine, because I am of the opinion that the corporation is estopped from setting up the plea of ultra vires to so much of this claim as accrued during the year 1903, after August 1st, the date of the guaranty. The written indemnity is limited to "any future purchases during this year," the proper interpretation of which is, during the year 1903. The guaranty of payment of past indebtedness was without any consideration to the guarantor (so far as this case shows), and such action was plainly beyond the purposes for which the corporation was organized, as it does not appear that it received any benefit or consideration. A different rule might be applied if it appeared that the future conduct of the business of the guarantor depended upon the furnishing of goods, which could only be had from a vendor who refused to supply, unless his accrued account was made secure by a guaranty, and that such continued supply was necessary to save the business of the guarantor from ruin, but such a condition is not shown to exist in this case, and no opinion is required or expressed on this point. My conclusion is that so much of this claim as accrued before August 1 and after December 31, 1903, is not provable against the insolvent estate and should be eliminated, and that the residue of the claim should be allowed.

The defendant company was engaged in a manufacturing business, to carry on which certain articles were being manufactured for its account by the Clark Bros. Glass Company, to produce which the materials furnished by the claimant were essential. They could not be had from the claimant without the guaranty of the defendant company, which was given for the purpose of continuing its own business, and resulted in a direct benefit to it in the prosecution of the business it was chartered to carry on, and, if the act of guaranty was beyond its expressed powers, it is not prohibited by the corporation act of the state under which it was organized, still, if the act was in excess of its authority, it having induced the claimant to part with its property relying upon the promised "ultimate payment," and being benefited by having the material manufactured for its account, it would be unconscionable to now permit it to interpose the plea it offers. The weight of modern judicial authority favors the rule that where a private corporation enters into a contract in excess of its granted powers, but not expressly prohibited, and has received the benefits contracted for, it will be estopped from pleading a want of power to make the agreement for the purpose of escaping performance on its part. The strict rule applied to a quasi public corporation to prevent it from doing an act which may disqualify it from discharging its duties to the public is not enforced as to private corporations to such an extent as to permit them to do an injustice. Bowman v. Foster & Logan Hardware Co. (C. C.) 94 Fed. 592. In Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co. v. Union Pac. Ry. Co. (C. C.) 47 Fed. 16, Mr. Justice Brewer, referring to such a distinction, said: "But a milder rule applies when a corporation seeks to repudiate a contract into which it has formally entered. It is not seemly for a corporation, any more than for an individual, to make a contract and then break it; to abide by it so long as it is advantageous, and to repudiate it when it becomes onerous. The courts may well say to such corporation: 'As you have called it a contract, we will do the same. As you have enjoyed the benefits when it was beneficial, you must bear the burden when it becomes onerous.'"

The principal cases bearing upon the question of ultra vires are considered in Camden & Atlantic R. R. Co. v. Mays Landing, etc., R. R. Co., 48 N. J. Law, 530, 7 Atl. 523, and its application to quasi public and private corporations distinguished in an exhaustive opinion by Mr. Justice Van Syckel, who, speaking for the Court of Errors and Appeals, said: "The true rule is that when the transaction is complete, and the party seeking relief has performed on his part, the plea of ultra vires by the corporation, which has acquiesced in it, is inadmissible in an action brought against it for not performing its side of the contract, in all those instances where the party who has performed cannot, upon rescission, be restored to his former status." The right of a manufacturing company to loan its credit for the express purpose of fostering its legitimate business is sustained in Holmes et al. v. Willard, 125 N. Y. 75-81, 25 N. E. 1088, 11 L. R. A. 170, by Judge Earl, as follows: "A corporation dealing in manufactured goods, and needing them for sale, may, as a proper incident to its business, extend financial aid to a manufacturer by advancing him money to enable him to furnish the goods. This aid may be extended by a loan of its own money, or it may take his notes, and by its credit raise money thereon, and advance such money, looking for reimbursement out of goods to be manufactured and delivered to it." The rule thus laid down is properly applicable to this case, for here the defendant loaned its credit to a manufacturer in order to enable it to procure goods to be manufactured for the defendant's account, and the loan of its credit can be as well justified as the loan of its money, when used to advance its legitimate business. It has not been shown that either the directors or stockholders of this corporation were ignorant of the fact of the guaranty upon which the claimant relied, and it is therefore "the just inference" that the directors and stockholders had so far acquiesced in the action of its officers as to bring the act of indemnity within the business of the corporation. Holmes et al. v. Willard, supra.

The receiver will be advised to allow as a claim against this insolvent corporation so much of the indebtedness guarantied as arose during the year 1903, after August 1st, and only so much of the interest items as relate to that part of the account which falls within those dates. If the parties cannot agree as to the proper amount to which the claim should be reduced, a reference to a master may be taken. As the claimant has only succeeded in part, no costs will be allowed.

IN RE ACKER'S WILL.

(Prerogative Court of New Jersey. Dec. 29, 1905.)

1. APPEAL—RECORD—CONTENTS.

On an appeal from an order denying an application to appoint petitioner as the executor of an estate, it was improper for appellant to annex to the record the argument of counsel prior to the examination of the witnesses.

2. SAME—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where no appeal was taken from an order allowing probate of a will, it will be presumed, on appeal from an order denying appellant's application for his appointment as executor, that the court was satisfied by proof that the paper was testator's last will and was executed in due form.

3. EXECUTORS — APPOINTMENT — NONRESIDENCE.

That the person named in a will as executor was a nonresident was no ground for the court's refusal to grant letters testamentary to him.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 22, Cent. Dig. Executors and Administrators, § 33.]

4. EVIDENCE—RECORDS.

On an issue as to antagonism between a person named in a will as executor and the legatees, a final decree, in the absence of the record of the cause to which the decree related, was without evidential force.

5. EXECUTORS — APPOINTMENT — PROOF OF WILL—DELAY—WAIVER.

Pub. Laws 1898, p. 724, § 27, provides that if the executor named in a will neglects for the space of 40 days after testator's death to prove the testament, administration with the will annexed shall be granted to the next of kin or to such other person as will accept it. Held that, where testator's legatees and next of kin neglected to assert the executor's failure to probate the will within the time prescribed until after the executor had presented the will for probate and was endeavoring in due form to probate the same, they waived their right to have administration granted to the next of kin.

Appeal from Orphans' Court, Middlesex County.

Application for the probate of the last will and testament of Philip Acker, deceased. From an order denying the application of Joseph B. Acker to be appointed executor and appointing another to act in that behalf, he appeals. Reversed.

John A. Coan and George S. Silzer, for appellant. Theodore Strong, for appellee Sarah A. Breece. C. T. Cowenhoven, for appellees Catherine Decker and Margaret Martin.

BERGEN, Vice Ordinary. By the decree of the orphans' court of the county of Middlesex, bearing date the 25th day of July 1905, a paper writing alleged to be the last will and testament of Philip Acker, deceased, was admitted to probate, and in the same decree letters testamentary were refused to the appellant, although nominated in such last will and testament to be the executor thereof, and letters of administration with the will annexed were directed to be issued by the surrogate of the county of Middlesex, to a stranger, against the protest of the appellant, who had offered the will for probate and was present in court offering to qualify as executor when the decree was made. From so much of this decree as denied to the appellant the right to qualify as executor, and ordered the appointment of a stranger in his place and stead to administer the estate, this appeal is taken.

The record brought up, as certified by the clerk of the orphans' court, has annexed to it 12 printed pages containing the argument and discussion of counsel prior to the examination of the witnesses. It is proper that such a practice should be condemned. It forms no part of the record, and in no way aids the court or affects the merits of the case. So much of this record as it is proper the court should consider shows that a caveat was filed against the probate of this will; that the will was not probated by the executor until about one year after the death of the testator; that, as the result of litigation during that period between the legatees and this executor with regard to the property of the testator, a decree was made by the Court of Chancery, adjudging that a certain deed made by the testator to the executor should be set aside as a deed, but be allowed to stand as a mortgage to secure an indebtedness which that court adjudged to be due to the executor from the testator. The will was then offered for probate by the executor, upon an application made by him verified in due form, and citations were thereupon issued to all persons interested. The application was made on the 5th day of May, 1905, and the hearing of the controversy continued by order of the orphans' court from time to time, until the 25th day of July next following, when the decree complained of was made. There is no evidence showing how the caveat was disposed of; but as all presumptions should be in favor of the regularity of the decree, and no appeal being taken from the order for probate, it must be assumed that the court was satisfied by due proof that the paper admitted to probate was the last will and testament of the testator executed and published in due form.

The only witness sworn on the question of administration was Sarah A. Breece, one of the daughters of the testator, who testified that the executor named in the will resided in Brooklyn, N. Y., and that he had the possession of the property of the testator. She also testified that one of her sisters was feeble-minded, and not a fit person to whom the administration should be committed. There is not a particle of testimony to show that the executor named in the will, the appellant here, had changed in condition, financially or mentally, from the time he had been selected by the testator to act as the executor of his last will and testament, or had committed any act which would, in law, disqualify him from serving in that capacity. The fact that he is a nonresident is not sufficient, and the security which the statute requires from a nonresident executor was expressly waived by the testator in his last will. There is nothing in this record, beyond one point, to which I shall hereafter refer, which presents the slightest justifiable reason for refusing to this appellant the performance of the duties which this testator committed to him.

On the argument it was alleged, in support of this decree, that because of the litigation referred to the appellant had unfairly sought to secure the whole estate, and, being defeated in the attempt, occupied a position so antagonistic to the rights of the legatees that he would not fairly administer the estate. While the only proof presented was a copy of the final decree, and, in the absence of the record of the cause to which the decree related, has no evidential force, we may assume that such antagonism existed, and yet find that it worked no disqualification. In the Matter of the Application of John S. Maxwell, 3 N. J. Eq. 611, the executors named in the will of John Maxwell, deceased, were John S. Maxwell and William H. Sloan. A caveat was filed by several persons, John S. Maxwell being one of them. Upon appeal to the Prerogative Court, the paper writing against which Maxwell had filed a caveat was admitted to probate, and thereafter he claimed to be admitted as executor with Sloan. It was objected to because it was claimed he had disqualified himself by joining in the caveat. The Ordinary, in a well-considered opinion, determined "that, where a will is admitted to probate, an executor named therein, if capable in law, is not to be excluded, unless he has, by some act of his own, deprived himself of the executorship." He held that such an act did not amount to a renunciation, and that, until it was shown that there was a will, it did not appear that there was an executorship to renounce, and said: "It seems to me not difficult to reconcile the denial of the existence of a will with a willingness to serve as executor if a will exists and is established." The case just cited, so far as I have been able to discover, has never been questioned by the courts of this state.

The point most seriously relied upon by the appellees in support of this decree arises under the proper construction of section 27 of our orphans' court act (P. L. 1898, p. 724), which enacts, among other things, that, if the executor named in any testament neglects for the space of 40 days after the death of the testator to prove such testament, then administration with the will annexed shall be granted to the next of kin if they will accept it, and, if not, then to such other person as will. The appellees claim that, as this executor neglected for more than 40 days after the death of the testator to prove the will, he forfeited his right. If this contention was correct it would not support this decree, because it does not appear that the notice required by rule 2 of the orphans' court has been given to the persons in interest. But, aside from the question of notice, the statute in question has no application to the matter under review; for in my judgment it can only be called upon to aid a party who shall institute proceedings under it prior to the application of the executor. The act, if read literally, requires the executor to "prove" the will within 40 days. That he could not do in this case, because of the interposition of a caveat. The object of the law is to provide for a prompt administration of the estate of deceased persons, and when, as in this case, neither creditor, legatee, nor next of kin made any move until after the executor had filed in due form his petition for probate, the reason for committing administration to another—that is, promptness in the settlement of the estate—disappears; for, after the executor has instituted proceedings for probate, the presumption is that he will proceed with all necessary promptness to carry out the wishes of the testator. The next of kin and legatees, having neglected to promptly avail themselves of the alleged neglect and waited until this executor was endeavoring in due form to probate his testator's will, have waived any right they might have had to administration.

In my judgment, so much of this decree as refuses to the appellant the right to such letters testamentary as naturally followed the probate of the will is erroneous, and should be reversed, in order that the administration may be committed to him according to law.

SCHMIDT v. EITEL et al.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Jan. 2, 1906.)

MECHANICS' LIENS—CONTRACT—FAILURE TO FILE—OWNER'S LIABILITY.

Where an owner of land failed to file an improvement contract in the office of the clerk of the county in which the lands were situated, as provided by the mechanic's lien law of 1898 (Laws 1898, p. 538, c. 226), she was not entitled to limit the liability of the lands for liens of workmen and materialmen to the funds in her hands belonging to the contractor.

Action by Margaretha Schmidt against Frederick Eitel and others. On demurrer to the bill. Sustained.

J. P. Manning, for complainant. Frank Benjamin, for demurrants.

MAGIE, Ch. The bill demurred to appears to be one of strict interpleader. The relief it seeks is founded on the statements that complainant made a written contract with Eitel, one of the defendants, for the erection of a house upon her lands for $2,685, and that Eitel has been paid by her $2,285, and there is now due him on the contract $280.56, and that the Empire Sash & Door Company, James Huggan, Frank J. Brohm, and Fred Buhl (also made defendants) have at specified times served on complainant what the bill calls "lien claim notices," to the effect that Eitel was indebted to them, respectively, for materials furnished and used in the erection of the building, and that each of these defendants claims a prior lien on the funds in complainant's hands, which she is ready and willing to pay to any person lawfully entitled to receive them. The prayer is that defendants may interplead, and that complainant, on paying into court the amount she asserts to be due, may be discharged from any liability to the defendants. Eitel, the alleged contractor, and Brohm and Buhl, alleged claimants upon the fund, have severally demurred to the bill.

It is first claimed by both demurrants that the bill is defective, because it fails to show that the contract, which complainant avers she made with Eitel, was filed in the clerk's office of the county in which the lands were, so as to protect complainant's lands from the lien claims under the first and second sections of the mechanic's lien law of 1898. Laws 1898, p. 538, c. 226. If in fact the contract was not filed, obviously, upon the statements of the bill, each one of these defendants may file his lien upon the house and lands of complainant, and enforce that lien by the proceeding provided for by the mechanic's lien law. The lien claimants are entitled, in that proceeding, to recover the full amount of their respective claims, which are proved. They cannot be restricted to the amount due to the contractor on a contract not filed under section 2. When the contract is filed, workmen and materialmen are provided with a means to enforce their claims upon moneys due the contractor by the provisions of section 8. But to entitle complainant to limit the claims of workmen and materialmen to funds in her hands, and to seek relief of that character, she should have averred that the contract she made with Eitel had been duly filed. On this ground the demurrer must be sustained.

This result renders it unnecessary to consider other causes also assigned upon the demurrer.

McMASTER v. DREW et al

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Jan. 2, 1906.)

1. CORPORATIONS — INSOLVENCY — RECEIVERS — ACTIONS.

Where a petition by the receiver of an insolvent corporation showed that certain shares of stock of the corporation had been issued by it in payment for property conveyed to it, which conveyance was thereafter judicially declared void, so that the consideration for the shares of stock issued in payment wholly failed, and that the shares had been transferred to various persons, it was within the court's discretion to grant leave to file a bill in behalf of the parties interested to determine the rights of such stockholders.

2. SAME—BILL—SUFFICIENCY—DISCLOSURE OF ASSETS.

A bill by the receiver of an insolvent corporation to determine who the stockholders are need not disclose whether the assets the receiver has reached or may reach are sufficient to satisfy the creditors.

3. SAME—DEMURRER TO BILL.

On demurrer to a bill by the receiver of an insolvent corporation to determine who the stockholders of such corporation are, the court will not consider whether, by the proceedings in the original cause, it has been made to appear that there are no assets sufficient to satisfy creditors.

Bill by John S. McMaster, receiver, against Charles H. Drew and others. On demurrer to bill. Demurrer overruled.

Norman Grey, for complainant. Charles D. Thompson, for defendants.

MAGIE, Ch. The bill in this cause asserts that in a cause in this court wherein the Denver City Waterworks Company was complainant, and the American Waterworks Company was defendant, the last-named company was decreed to be insolvent, on the 20th day of July, 1892, and that by subsequent proceedings, John S. McMaster was appointed its receiver. It further asserts that, upon a petition of the complainant in said cause, an order was made on July 12, 1904, permitting the receiver to file the bill now before me, upon his being furnished security to protect him and the fund from the costs and expenses of the suit. The receiver thereafter filed the bill, and on the 3d day of October, 1905, an order to show cause why a preliminary injunction should not issue, was made. Defendant's counsel appeared in opposition to the allowance of the injunction, and also moved that an order be made requiring the receiver to show cause why the order permitting him to file the bill should not be set aside. The motion was denied and the preliminary injunction was allowed.

The petition on which leave to file the bill was granted showed that certain shares of stock of the insolvent corporation had been issued by it in payment for property conveyed to it, and that afterward a competent court had decreed that the conveyance of the property was absolutely void, and of no effect, so that the consideration for the shares of stock issued in payment therefor had wholly failed. It was also made to appear that the shares had been transferred by the company by which the conveyance had been made, and to which the shares had been issued, to various persons. Under those circumstances, leave to file the bill was asked in behalf of parties interested, to determine the rights of such stockholders. It does not admit of doubt that such a bill could have been filed by the corporation, but for the fact that it had become insolvent. By reason of its insolvency, no proceeding involving this matter could be taken by any one except the receiver, and by him only by leave of the court. I judged that it was proper to allow the receiver to act, although I required security to be given to protect him and the fund. The propriety of the course adopted has again been challenged upon this argument, and I have reviewed the question. I remain convinced that the order for leave to file the bill was within the discretion of the court. The bill filed by the receiver exhibits the same state of facts, and its prayer is for the return to him of the shares of stock, the consideration for which has wholly failed. This involves the same question presented by the petition for leave to file the bill.

The receiver of an insolvent corporation holds its property and franchises for the benefit of the creditors, and if a surplus after satisfying the creditors and the expenses of the receivership remains, then for the benefit of the stockholders. He may therefore seek to find out who are the stockholders to whom he may eventually be liable. It is not necessary that his bill seeking to have determined who the stockholders are, should disclose whether the assets he has reached or may reach are sufficient, or insufficient, to satisfy the creditors; nor can it be considered, upon a demurrer to the bill, whether, by the proceedings in the original cause, it has been made to appear that there are no assets sufficient to satisfy creditors.

The demurrer to the bill must therefore be overruled.

WHITE et al. v. SMITH et al.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Jan. 4, 1906.)

1. PARTITION — SALE OF PREMISES — WHEN ORDERED.

Where premises described in a bill for partition are so situated and of such character that they cannot be divided among the owners according to their several shares without great prejudice to the interests of such owners, the property will be ordered sold and the proceeds divided among the several owners according to their respective interests.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 38, Cent. Dig. Partition, §§ 216, 219, 220.]

2. SAME — ALLOWANCES — TAXES AND IMPROVEMENTS.

In a suit for partition, allowance from the gross proceeds of sale will be made to parties for taxes paid by them, for the value of permanent improvements of a necessary or suitable character placed by them upon the property at their own expense, and for lawful interest on the sums so expended.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 38, Cent. Dig. Partition, §§ 236-246, 253.]

3. SAME — ACCOUNTING FOR RENTS AND PROFITS.

In a suit for partition, complainants will not be required to account for rents or profits resulting from their possession of the premises, where it does not appear that they excluded their co-tenants from the enjoyment of the premises, nor that they received any rents or profits from letting the premises, nor that in occupying the same as a farm they actually made any profit.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 38, Cent. Dig. Partition, §§ 247-252.]

4. SAME—CLAIMS FOR DAMAGES.

Unliquidated claims for damages done to premises by complainants are not cognizable in a suit for partition of the premises.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 38, Cent. Dig. Partition, § 228.]

Bill for partition by Josiah White and others against Ella Etta Smith and others. Heard on bill, answer, cross-bill, and proofs. Decree advised.

See 60 Atl. 399.

C. L. Cole, for complainants. L. G. Morton, for defendants Ella Etta Smith and others. J. J. Crandall, for defendants Josephine Maud Lake and Frank Lake.

GREY, V. C. In this case the proofs satisfy me:

First. That the premises described in the bill of complaint are so situated, and of such character that they cannot be divided among the owners thereof, according to their several shares, without great prejudice to their interests resulting from such division, and that for this reason, the property must be sold and the proceeds divided among the several owners according to their respective interests.

Second. That a proper allowance should be made to the complainants for taxes by them paid, and for the value of permanent improvements by them placed upon the property at their own expense, which were of a character consistent with the nature of the property, and either necessary or entirely suitable and justifiable for its development, which allowance should be paid from the gross proceeds of sale, with lawful interest. That like allowance and payment should be made to such defendants as paid taxes on said property.

Third. That it has not been shown that the complainants received any rents or profits from the letting of the premises in question, and that it does not appear that they excluded their co-tenants from the enjoyment of the premises in common with themselves; the premises consisting of a small farm which the complainants occupied and conducted at their own expense. Nor is there any showing that in so doing they actually made a profit, and that therefore the complainants should not be required to account for rents or profits, etc., as prayed in the cross-bill. That there is no showing of damage done to the premises by complainants as alleged in the cross-bill, and that such unliquidated claims are not here cognizable.

Fourth. That the proofs show that the original complainants or their grantees are seised of and entitled to an equal undivided one-third part of the premises, that the defendant Ella Etta Smith is seised of and entitled to another equal undivided third part of said premises, and that George H. Weaver and Josephine Maud Lake, are each seised of and entitled to an equal undivided one-sixth part of the same.

A decree will be advised according to these conclusions.

In re HARTMAN'S ESTATE.

(Prerogative Court of New Jersey. Jan. 4, 1906.)

1. TAXATION — INHERITANCE TAX — WILLS — TRANSMISSION OF PERSONALTY.

Where a testatrix at the time of her death, was a resident of the state, her personal estate passed to collateral legatees under her will, subject to the assessment for succession taxes as personal property is transmitted or bequeathed by wills and descendible by inheritance according to the law of the domicile.

2. SAME—SITUS OF PROPERTY.

The situs of the personal property of a testatrix, for the purpose of assessing a legacy or succession tax, is the domicile of the testatrix at the time of her death; and this, regardless of the statutes of a foreign state subjecting to similar taxation such portions of the testatrix's personal estate as was located therein.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 45, Cent. Dig. Taxation, §§ 1685, 1686.]

3. DOMICILE—HUSBAND AND WIFE.

Where a husband and wife resided together most of the time at her house in New York City, but spent the week ends at the husband's domicile in New Jersey, where he was engaged as a clergyman, the wife's domicile was that of her husband in New Jersey.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 17, Cent. Dig. Domicile, § 25.]

4. WILLS—TRANSMISSION OF PROPERTY—PROBATE.

Legacies bequeathed to collateral relatives pass on the death of the testatrix, and are not postponed or suspended for want of probate of the will.

5. TAXATION — INHERITANCE TAX — ASSESSMENT.

Where testatrix was domiciled in New Jersey at the time of her death, the inheritance tax was properly assessed on legacies bequeathed to collateral relatives as of the date of testatrix's death, regardless of the fact that her will was not probated in New Jersey.

Application for the assessment of a collateral inheritance tax against legacies bequeathed by the will of Georgiana E. Hartman, deceased. From an order making such assessment, the executors appeal. Affirmed.

John R. Hardin, for appellants. E. D. Duffield, Asst. Atty. Gen., and Theodore Backes, for appellees.

BERGEN, Vice Ordinary. The decedent, Georgiana E. Hartman, was the wife of Charles Harvey Hartman; they having married on the 5th day of April, 1899, in New York City. At the time of the marriage the husband was the rector of the Episcopal Church in the city of Dover in this state, and occupied with his mother the rectory of his parish. The furniture in use belonged to the mother, who managed the house, had the entire charge thereof, and remained in the rectory after the marriage upon the same terms. It is admitted by the appellants that the legal residence of the husband never changed, and that he has, since his settlement in Dover, continued to be a resident there. The decedent was a wealthy woman, and at the time of her marriage owned and resided in a valuable property on Madison avenue, in New York City, and until her death maintained her establishment at that place, living in the liberal manner her wealth justified. It appeared in the cause that the wife had repeatedly declared that she would never remove to Dover for the purpose of establishing her home there; that after the marriage the husband lived with his wife in New York City during the week, she going with him to Dover at the end of each week, where they remained until the beginning of the next week, in order that the husband might officiate during the Sunday services; that the wife also went to Dover with her husband to attend occasional entertainments arranged for the benefit of the church; that it was her practice to spend about two weeks in the spring and a like period in the autumn of each year at the rectory in Dover; that these visits were a part of her summer vacation, the residue of which she usually spent with her husband at Long Branch, to which place she took her servants, horses, and carriages; that in the month of May, 1903, the decedent accompanied her husband to Dover for the purpose of attending a church entertainment, expecting to remain but a day or two, and while there was taken suddenly ill and died, and her remains were at once taken to her residence in New York City, the funeral services being held at the residence, and also at St. Thomas Church, in that city. It was further made to appear that the will of the decedent was admitted to probate by the surrogate of the county of New York, and that in the application for probate her residence was described as being in New York City; that the decedent had no property of any kind or description in the state of New Jersey, and never at any time obtained a residence therein, beyond such as the law imputes to a wife of one whose domicile is within this state; that her property consisted of real and personal estate, the personal remaining in the custody of the decedent in the state where she resided at the time of her marriage, and all of the real estate being located in the same place. The executors of the decedent proceeded to administer the estate under the laws of the state of New York, paying to the proper authorities of that state collateral inheritance taxes levied against legacies to collaterals upon $77,500. In January, 1905, one Elmer King, having been appointed appraiser by the surrogate of the county of Morris, proceeded to, and did, appraise so much of the estate of the decedent as would be liable to a tax under the laws of this state making subject to a tax "estates, gifts, legacies, devises and collateral inheritances in certain cases." The appraiser so appointed having made his report, the surrogate of such county assessed against the collateral legatees an inheritance tax of the precise character and amount levied and collected by the authorities in New York City, and it is from this order of the surrogate that this appeal has been taken.

The appellants insist that, although the domicile of the husband of the testatrix was in New Jersey at the time of the death of the decedent, the usual rule which makes the domicile of the husband the domicile of the wife does not apply in cases of this character, and that for the purpose of levying a succession tax, a decedent, being a wife, may have a residence for the purpose of taxation separate from the legal domicile of the husband. The appellants also insist that, as this will was probated in a foreign jurisdiction, within which all of the property which passed by the will was located, succession taxes were due and payable only to the authorities of the state within which all of the property was located, and, further, that the right to levy a tax of this character against collateral legatees is subject to the fact of administration, and that, if property within a foreign jurisdiction is not brought within the state for distribution among legatees, the surrogate is without authority to make the assessment complained of. That the personal property of this testatrix was subject to the law of New York regarding succession taxes has been so often determined as to place the question beyond useful argument. Matter of Houdayer, 150 N. Y. 41, 44 N. E. 718, 34 L. R. A. 235, 55 Am. St.

Rep. 642, where funds deposited in bank, subject to draft at will, were held liable; Matter of Estate of Romaine, 127 N. Y. 80, 27 N. E. 759, 12 L. R. A. 401, where securities kept in a safe deposit vault by a nonresident were, after his death, subjected to such a tax. It is thus apparent that, if this assessment be sustained, the result will be the requirement of the payment of two taxes of like character by the same legatees for the right of succession to the gifts of the testatrix; but this unfortunate situation cannot control the determination of the questions presented, for such a condition frequently arises, and, while its presence always induces most careful consideration on the part of the court to find some legal method to prevent it, it must be submitted to unless it can be avoided under settled rules relating to the subject. Golding v. Chambersburg, 37 N. J. Law, 258; Blackstone v. Miller, 188 U. S. 189, 23 Sup. Ct. 277, 47 L. Ed. 439. If this testatrix at the time of her death was a resident of this state, her personal estate passed to these collateral legatees under her will, subject to the assessment for succession taxes, the order for the assessment of which is here complained of; for "It is still the law that personal property is sold, transmitted, bequeathed by will, and is descendible by inheritance according to the law of the domicile. Eldman v. Martinez, 184 U. S. 578, 22 Sup. Ct. 515, 46 L. Ed. 697. The law of New York on this subject is for all practicable purposes identical with the law of this state, and in construing it Judge Gray, in Matter of the Estate of Swift, 137 N. Y. 77, 32 N. E. 1096, 18 L. R. A. 709, presents very strong and cogent reasons in support of his opinion that the tax provided for is only enforceable as to property which, at the time of its owner's death, was within the territorial limits of the domiciliary state; but the majority of the court were not convinced by his reasoning, and held that personal property of a resident decedent, wheresoever situated, whether within or without the state, was subject to the tax imposed by the act. The great weight of authority favors the principle adopted by the New York Court of Appeals, holding that the tax imposed is on the right of succession under a will, or by devolution in case of intestacy, and that as to personal property its situs, for the purpose of a legacy or succession tax, is the domicile of the decedent, and the right of its imposition is not affected by the statute of a foreign state which subjects to similar taxation such portion of the personal estate of any non-resident, testator, or intestate as he may take and leave there for safe-keeping, or until it should suit his convenience to carry it away. Thompson v. Advocate Gen., 12 O. & Fin. 1.

The remaining question relates to the residence of the testatrix. Her abiding place was undoubtedly in the city of New York, but the legal domicile of her husband was in this state, and it must be conceded that the established rule is that, where the husband and wife are living together as members of one family, the residence of the husband is considered, in law, as the residence of the wife. Baldwin v. Flagg, 43 N. J. Law, 496; Hunt v. Hunt, 72 N. Y. 217, 28 Am. Rep. 129; McPherson v. Housel, 13 N. J. Eq. 35. The exception in favor of a married woman in proceedings for divorce against her husband, he having abandoned her and acquired a residence in another state, is founded upon a rule which does not apply where the husband and wife are living together. The neglect to probate the will in this state was urged as depriving the surrogate of jurisdiction, but in my judgment the authority of the surrogate does not depend upon the probate of the will, which speaks from the death of the testatrix, and in my opinion the property passed to these collateral relatives by this will upon the death of the testatrix, and was not postponed or suspended for want of probate. The tax is to be assessed as of the date of the inheritance, and the amount of the assessment is not affected by the increase or depreciation of the estate between the death of the testatrix, and the probate of the will, which in cases of contest may cover a long period; for the act provides that all taxes imposed "shall be due and payable at the death of the testator." P. L. 1894, p. 320, c. 210, § 4.

The result is that this petition must be dismissed, with costs.

FEINBERG v. FEINBERG.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Jan. 4. 1906.)

1. EQUITY—PRACTICE—REHEARING.

An application for a rehearing before a vice chancellor is governed by principles applicable to motions for new trials after verdict in cases at law.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 19, Cent. Dig. Equity, §§ 884-851.]

2. SAME—GROUNDS—IMPEACHMENT OF WITNESSES.

A rehearing in an equity case will not be granted to enable the applicant to impeach the credit of witnesses who testified on the original hearing.

3. SAME—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

In order to justify a rehearing in an equity case for newly discovered evidence, the new matter must be of such a character that, if it had been heard on the trial, it would probably have altered the result.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 19, Cent. Dig. Equity, § 846.]

4. DIVORCE—DECREE—REHEARING—SUFFICIENCY OF AFFIDAVITS.

On petition for rehearing after final decree for divorce on the ground of adultery, affidavits containing alleged newly discovered evidence held insufficient to authorize the granting of the petition.

Suit for divorce by Hazer Feinberg against Anna Feinberg. On petition for rehearing. Denied.

For former opinion, see 59 Atl. 880.

A. J. King, for petitioner. J. W. Wescott, for defendant.

GREY, V. C. This cause was heard on January 9 and 18, 1905; the issue being the charge of the petitioner, Hazer Feinberg, that the defendant, his wife, Anna Feinberg, had committed adultery with one John Myers, for which reason the petitioner prayed a divorce. On January 23, 1905, a final decree was made, granting the prayer of the petitioner for divorce because of the adultery of the defendant with Myers, as charged in the petition. On July 24, 1905, the defendant, Anna Feinberg, filed her petition in this court, alleging that the vice chancellor, in ordering the decree for divorce, rested his conclusions upon the evidence of one Bertha Schindle, and that, since the hearing, the defendant has discovered "new and material evidence tending to discredit the evidence of the said Bertha Schindle," and praying "that the decree of divorce heretofore ordered against her may be opened, and that she may be permitted to offer before this court the witnesses and affidavits attached to her petition." The petition for a rehearing is supported by affidavits thereto annexed, which, it is contended, exhibit sufficient grounds to open the final decree and try the cause over again. The petitioner, Anna Feinberg, insists that they show newly discovered evidence, which, if presented to the court, is of sufficient weight and credibility to lead to a different conclusion.

The affidavits address themselves to several different phases of the case, in substance as follows: The first two affidavits recite parol statements said to have been casually made by the husband, Hazer Feinberg. One witness swears that in July, 1904, Feinberg said "he was going to try to get rid of his wife, and that he had a girl who would say anything that he wanted her to say; that he didn't care what it would cost him." The next witness declares that Feinberg, one day last summer (1904), told her that "he did not want his wife to leave him; that she went away because of the influence of her mother, who persuaded her to leave him; "that her mother took her away and made all the trouble between them." It will be noticed that the first affidavit imputes to Mr. Feinberg a purpose to be rid of his wife, the other a desire to keep her. Nothing identifies the girl mentioned by Feinberg, as one "who would say anything he wanted her to say," as the witness Bertha Schindle. These alleged statements, even if correctly understood and repeated in the affidavits, have neither that certainty or force as evidence which should affect the judgment of a court to open a decree for rehearing.

The next affidavits are given by John Myers, the paramour of the defendant, by Mrs. Annie Myers, his wife, and friends who visited at their home. These persons attempt to prove an alibi by showing that on Christmas Eve, 1903 (December 24th), the paramour, Myers, was not at the Feinberg house, as was proven on the hearing of the cause. Myers says in his affidavit that he had understood that the time of the alleged adultery was fixed as on Christmas night of 1903 (December 25th), and that the first he knew that it was claimed to have been on Christmas Eve (December 24th) was at the trial. Both Myers and his wife then testify that on December 24, 1903 (Christmas Eve), he was elsewhere. The petition for divorce expressly names December 24, 1903, as one of the days on which the adultery was committed. At the hearing of the cause the accusatory testimony of the witness Bertha Schindle was given on January 9, 1905, and was followed by an adjournment until January 18, 1905, on which day both Mr. and Mrs. Myers were called to the stand as witnesses for the defendant. Myers was shown by undisputed testimony to have discussed his relations with Mrs. Feinberg, long before the hearing, with the utmost freedom of speech. He knew before the trial that he was accused of adultery with Mrs. Feinberg. He went on the stand nearly 10 days after the testimony was given which accused him of adultery on Christmas Eve. The incriminating admissions of Mr. Myers, proven against him at the hearing despite his denials, while not forceful to show the guilt of the defendant Mrs. Feinberg, go far to impeach Myers' own veracity as a witness. He assiduously attended at the hearings. I cannot believe that he took so little interest in the cause that he mistook the date when he was charged to have committed the adultery.

Other affidavits annexed to the petition (Mrs. Vaughn's and Mrs. Naylor's) state that Mr. Feinberg several times visited Bertha Schindle at houses where the latter was a servant between December, 1903, and March, 1904; and this it is claimed contradicts Bertha's testimony at the hearing, when she was questioned, "Have you seen Mr. Feinberg since the suit commenced?" and she answered, "No, sir," and shows a conspiracy between Feinberg and Schindle to present a false case and to conceal it. I am unable to give such proof so great importance.

The last affidavit is that of David Wudlauskus, who signs with a Hebrew signature a manuscript written in English. This affidavit recites a conversation alleged to have taken place in September, 1904, between Wudlauskus and Feinberg. The affidavit states that Feinberg said "he had a girl in Hamonton who would tell of his wife's conduct with the policeman [meaning John Meyers]; that he had this girl fixed, and knew how she would testify; that Feinberg then and there told deponent that you could do anything with money, and that he (Feinberg) was sure to get his divorce." It is claimed that this must be held to be an admission that the petitioner corruptly suborned the witness Bertha Schindle to testify falsely. Although it is an ex parte affidavit, presumably expressed most favorably to the purpose for which it is presented—the securing of a rehearing—the words used do not justify the contention. Bertha Schindle is not named nor in any way identified by any other incident than the fact that she testified to the wife's adultery. It does not follow that the unnamed girl would testify falsely because Feinberg knew how she would testify. That he had her "fixed" does not necessarily mean that she was corruptly fixed to perjure herself; nor does the allusion of the power of money imply its wrongful use to suborn witnesses.

A verbal admission, alleged to have been made by a party to a suit, says Mr. Greenleaf, should be received with great caution. "Consisting, as it does, in the mere repetition of oral statements, it is subject to much imperfection and mistake. It frequently happens that the witness, by unintentionally altering a few of the expressions used, gives an effect to the statement completely at variance with what the party actually did say." 1 Greenl. Ev. § 200. The oral admissions ascribed to the husband in the affidavits annexed to the petition for rehearing are open to this criticism. The husband's alleged admissions which they present do not themselves show that he had contrived a plan to set up a false case. In order to give this effect to them, the existence of a criminal purpose on his part must be presumed.

It cannot, I think, be maintained that the testimony of the witness Bertha Schindle was a surprise to the defendant or her paramour, Myers, or that her testimony as to the date of the offense misled them, for the time when Bertha testified she saw the incriminating act accorded with that long before alleged in the petition for divorce. Nor can they say that they had no opportunity to refute Bertha's evidence, for there was a period of nine days after they heard it before they were themselves called as witnesses. They directly contradicted in every essential particular the evidence which she gave, but their testimony, in view of all the proofs, was deemed unworthy of belief, and hers to have accorded with the trend of that given by the other witnesses. It is not newly discovered evidence, introducing a new point which has come to light since the trial, but only new witnesses who attempt to discredit Miss Schindle. The position disclosed on the hearing of the cause directly prompted the impeachment of Miss Schindle's testimony by the defendant, if that were possible. The issue of her veracity was directly before the court.

A rehearing ought not to be granted to enable the defendant to impeach her credit. 2 Danl. Chan. Prac. 1120, note "b." The rule on application for a rehearing before a vice chancellor is governed by the principles which are recognized in the law courts in cases of motions for new trials after the verdict of a jury. Warner v. Warner, 31 N. J. Eq. 549; Burrows v. Wene (N. J. Ch.) 26 Atl. 890. Those courts declare it to be settled that "a new trial will not be granted upon the new discovery of witnesses who will swear against the credit of those sworn upon the trial." Price v. Ward (Sup. Ct.) 7 N. J. Law, 127; Den v. Geiger (Sup. Ct.) 9 N. J. Law, 240. The Court of Appeals has declared that, in order to justify a rehearing because of newly discovered evidence, it must be shown that the new matter offered must be of such a character that, if it had been heard on the trial, it would probably have altered the judgment. Watkinson v. Watkinson (N. J. Err. & App.) 60 Atl. 932, 69 L. R. R. 397; Richardson v. Hatch (N. J. Ch.) 60 Atl. 52, affirmed on appeal, June term, 1906, without opinion. The affidavits supporting the petition for a rehearing, setting forth the alleged admissions of the husband, are in no way forceful to show even a probable subornation of the witness Bertha Schindle. Those of Myers and his wife, attempting to prove an alibi for Myers, are in no proper sense newly discovered evidence, and, so far as that of Myers is concerned, cannot be accepted, because the evidence at the hearing entirely satisfied me that his denials were unworthy of belief.

In my view the defendant has had her day and full opportunity to present her defense. The supposed new evidence set forth in the affidavits annexed to her petition for a rehearing, had it been offered at the trial of the cause, would not have changed the result.

The petition for a rehearing should be dismissed.

BURNS v. JOHNSTOWN PASS. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

1. CARRIERS—INJURY TO PASSENGER—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

Where a passenger stands on the running board of a summer car when there is room inside, he assumes the risk.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Carriers, §§ 1375-1379.]

2. SAME—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Where a passenger, with knowledge that the running board of a summer car was in close proximity to the poles near the track, stood thereon after warning other passengers of the danger, and was subsequently hit by a pole and killed, he was guilty of contributory negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Carriers, §§ 1375-1379.]

Mestresat, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Cambria County.

Action by Margaret J. Burns against the Johnstown Passenger Railway Company. From an order refusing to take off a nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

Donald E. Dufton and Robert E. Creswell, for appellant. Percy Allen Rose, Forest Rose, and W. Horace Rose, for appellee.

ELKIN, J. Even if it be conceded that the defendant company was negligent in constructing and maintaining the poles supporting the trolley wires in too close proximity to the tracks, it does not necessarily follow that there can be a recovery in this case. The real question in dispute is whether the testimony shows such contributory negligence on the part of the deceased as will defeat plaintiff's claim in this action. The learned trial judge in the court below directed a compulsory nonsuit, which, on motion made, he refused to take off, from which rulings this appeal is taken.

The deceased was standing on the running board of an open summer car at the time the accident occurred. We have frequently said that the running board of a car is not intended for the use of passengers, except as a convenience in getting in and out of the car. A passenger who stands on the running board when there is room inside, or when it is reasonably practicable to go inside the car, assumes the risk of his position. Bard v. Pennsylvania Traction Co., 176 Pa. 97, 34 Atl. 953, 53 Am. St. Rep. 672; Thane v. Scranton Traction Co., 191 Pa. 249, 43 Atl. 136, 71 Am. St. Rep. 767; Bumbear v. United Traction Co., 198 Pa. 198, 47 Atl. 961. It follows, therefore, that a passenger who is injured while standing on the running board must show by affirmative testimony that it was not practicable for him to go inside the car before he can sustain an action for damages.

We have some doubt whether the evidence offered by appellant has met this standard of requirement, but, even conceding under the circumstances as disclosed by the testimony it was a question for the jury to determine whether it was practicable for the deceased to go inside the car, still there can be no recovery because of the negligence of the deceased in another respect. The danger, if any, from the poles could have been avoided by the exercise of reasonable care. Did he exercise the reasonable care required under the circumstances? The learned trial judge held that he did not. In this there was no error. The deceased had placed himself on the running board, where he assumed the risk of his position, unless he relieved himself by showing that it was not practicable for him to go inside, and, in addition, he knew of the close proximity of the poles to the tracks, and warned other passengers of the danger. Three or more passengers standing in front of him and one or more back of him passed the pole without being injured. These passengers were standing on the same running board, and were subject to the same danger, if such it was. They all avoided the danger of the poles about which the deceased had warned them, and it is clear he could have avoided it by the exercise of reasonable care. If he knew the danger, and he did, and could have avoided it by reasonable care, and of this there is no doubt, it was his duty to do so, and, having failed to perform his duty in this respect, he was guilty of contributory negligence, and there can be no recovery in this case.

Judgment affirmed.

MESTREZAT, J., dissents.

BRUNDRED et al. v. McLAUGHLIN et al.
(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Oct. 30, 1905.)

EVIDENCE—OPINIONS OF EXPERT—ADMISSIBILITY.

In ejectment, a surveyor who made investigations on the ground to determine the location of a boundary line was asked: "Where, in your opinion, is the line between Nos. 83 and 84?" Held, that the question was proper, the evidence not being an opinion of a witness but testimony as to a fact in view of his observations on the ground.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Venango County.

Action by Benjamin F. Brundred and Elizabeth L. Brundred against James E. McLaughlin and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

J. H. Osmer, A. R. Osmer, N. F. Osmer, and Trax & Parker, for appellants. C. I. Heydrick, F. A. Sayers, and J. L. Nesbit, for appellees.

PER CURIAM. The only question involved in this case was one of fact, to wit, the location of the boundary line between the plaintiffs' land and the adjoining land of the defendants. All of the evidence was relevant to that issue and it was correctly submitted to the jury. The only assignment of error that we need notice specially is the second, to the admission of the question to the surveyor Reed: "Where, in your opinion, is the line between Nos. 83 and 84?" To the objection the court said that the investigation made by the witness on the ground was for the purpose of ascertaining the boundary line, and, having given the facts as he learned them, he would be permitted to answer the question. The judge therefore admitted this, not as a mere opinion of the witness, but as a summary of his observations on the ground, and therefore as testimony to a fact. This is in accordance with the authorities. Jackson v. Lambert, 121 Pa. 182, 15 Atl. 502.

Judgment affirmed.

SAFE DEPOSIT & TITLE GUARANTY
CO. OF KITTANNING v.
LINTON et al.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Oct. 30, 1905.)

MORTGAGE — ABSOLUTE DEED — DEFEASANCE NOT RECORDED.

Where, after the execution of a deed absolute on its face, the grantee executed a paper agreeing to pay a mortgage, with interest, then due, and to pay the taxes on the land and a sum stated, and to reconvey the property to the grantors when the amount so paid was returned with interest, such paper is a defeasance, which, if not recorded within 60 days from its date, as provided by Act June 8, 1881 (P. L. 84), cannot be admitted to convert the deed into a mortgage.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 35, Cent. Dig. Mortgages, § 200.]

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Armstrong County.

Bill by the Safe Deposit & Title Guaranty Company of Kittanning against P. R. E. Elwina Linton and A. F. Linton. Decree for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Patton, P. J., filed the following opinion in the court below:

"On December 30, 1901, the defendants, by deed of general warranty, conveyed to the plaintiff two-thirds of a tract of land in Perry township, Armstrong county, containing 307 acres. On February 3, 1902, the plaintiff gave to the defendants the paper which is the foundation of the present controversy. It was acknowledged the same day, but was not recorded until June 5, 1903. It is not denied that the defendants are the owners of at least one-third of the real estate in controversy. The plaintiff claims to own the two-thirds by reason of the deed of December 30, 1901, which is a deed for the real estate, regular and absolute on its face. The defendants, while admitting this deed, allege that it is held subject to the paper of February 3, 1902, which they call a deed or declaration of trust. This is the issue before us, and must be determined upon the proper construction of the paper of February 3, 1902.

"This paper is out of the ordinary. It is in a class of its own, yet it has all the earmarks of a defeasance, and falls within every definition of a mortgage. The grantee agrees to pay a mortgage of $6,500, with interest from July 3, 1899, then due, to advance at least $20,000 more, and to pay the taxes assessed upon the land conveyed, and agrees to reconvey the property to the grantors when they refund the amount advanced by the grantee, with interest and costs. It is a pledge of the land described in the agreement by the grantor to the grantee, and is to revert to the grantor on the discharge of the obligation for the performance of which it is pledged. Hence it is a mortgage. Lance's Appeal, 112 Pa. 456, 4 Atl. 375; Moran v. Munhall, 204 Pa. 242, 53 Atl. 1094. The paper of February 3, 1902, contains conditions upon the performance of which the estate created would have been defeated or totally undone, and prior to the act of June 8, 1881, would have reduced the deed of December 30, 1901, to a mortgage. But it was not recorded within 60 days of its execution; hence it runs into the very jaws of the act of June 8, 1881 (P. L. 84), which provides: 'That no defeasance to any deed for real estate regular and absolute on its face, made after the passage of this act, shall have the effect of reducing it to a mortgage, unless the said defeasance * * * is recorded * * * within sixty days from the execution thereof.' The law is well settled that since the act of June 8, 1881, a written defeasance signed by the grantee, but unacknowledged and unrecorded, will not be admitted to convert such deed into a mortgage. Sankey v. Hawley, 118 Pa. 30, 13 Atl. 206; Molly v. Ulrich, 133 Pa. 41, 19 Atl. 305; Grove v. Kase, 195 Pa. 325, 45 Atl. 1054; Crotzer v. Bittenbender, 199 Pa. 504, 49 Atl. 266; Lohrer v. Russell, 207 Pa. 105, 56 Atl. 333. The question was forever set at rest by the decision of the Supreme Court in Sankey v. Hawley, 118 Pa. 30, 13 Atl. 206; that court saying, in words that cannot be misunderstood: 'There is now but one method left by which a deed absolute can be reduced to a mortgage, and that method in this case has not been pursued. * * * If we give effect to this act, an act in no wise ambiguous, it is certain the defeasance offered on part of the defense was properly rejected.' Feeling constrained by these authorities to reject the defeasance of February 3, 1903, the defense falls with it.

"The defendants further contend that their case falls within the rulings of Goodwin v. McMinn, 193 Pa. 646, 44 Atl. 1094, 74 Am. St. Rep. 703, and is controlled by it. But that case is clearly distinguishable from the one before us. There the allegation of the grantor was that the deed was procured by fraud, and that fraudulent use was being made of the conveyance. It is stated clearly in the opinion of the court: 'He did not set up an agreement as a defeasance to the deed, and which had the effect of changing its absolute character into a conditional one, for the security of a debt or a contingent future liability.' There is no allegation in the answer or proof offered to show fraud on the part of the grantee. The plaintiff offers a deed absolute on its face. The defendants offer to show a defeasance not recorded as required by the act of 1881, which we are required by the provisions of that act and the authorities under it to reject, and thereby the defense falls.

"And now, April 7, 1905, let a decree be drawn for the partition of the land described in the bill and the appointment of a master to make partition thereof."

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

R. A. McCullough and H. A. Hellman, for appellants. George B. Gordon, James H. McCain, and W. J. Christy, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. This judgment is affirmed, on the opinion of the court below.

In re WILKINSON'S ESTATE.

Appeal of SCOTT.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Nov. 4, 1905.)

WILLS—CONTEST—STANDING OF CONTESTANT—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

On a petition for an issue of devisavit vel non, evidence held insufficient to raise a question for the jury on the issue of petitioner's legitimacy as a daughter of testator, such as to entitle petitioner to contest the will.

Appeal from Orphans' Court, Beaver County.

Petition by Emma T. Scott to set aside the probate of the will of James Wilkinson, deceased. From a decree refusing an issue of devisavit vel non, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

S. L. Webb and W. A. McConnel, for appellant. Agnew Hice and J. Rankin Martin, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. It may be conceded that there was enough testimony to go to a jury that the petitioner was a daughter of the testator, but the weight of the evidence was against her legitimacy. The marriage of her mother and her putative father, was not only not proved, but was clearly disproved. The only direct evidence of the marriage was the testimony of a woman from the Old Woman's Home in Covington, Ky., who did not know how old she was nor when she came to this country, but who testified in 1902 to a marriage between the testator, Wilkinson and the appellant's mother, Sarah Taylor, at some time she could not remember, but assented to a suggested date of 1857, 1858 or 1859, at the house of Mr. Steele in Chester county. The testator she had not seen since that date, and she professed to identify him by a photograph taken 30 odd years after she last saw him. The alleged wife she had never seen before or since that one occasion, and she identified her from a photograph (when taken not shown) "only by the way her hair is fixed, and the earrings, and the ugly mouth." The witness could not remember the name of the squire who performed the marriage ceremony, and the only name about which she was positive was that of the owner of the house, John D. Steele. Some of his family were present at this wedding, she said, "some in the garret, some down in the cellar."

This flimsy story might well be turned out of court without more, but it was met by evidence from the records of the superintendent of charities of Philadelphia that the witness Sarah Nicholson, whose maiden name was Sarah Hamm, was indentured to Mr. Steele in 1833, and her time having expired in 1847 she was not at his home at any time within 10 or 11 years of the date of the alleged marriage of Wilkinson; and by convincing testimony from several members of the Steele family that they never knew either the testator or Sarah Taylor, and no such marriage ever took place in their house. There were declarations of the testator, and other collateral matters bearing on the principal fact, but it is a favorable view to the appellant to say that the inferences to be drawn from them lead both ways. Two facts, however, raise a presumption against the appellant that has great weight. The marriage was assumed to have taken place in 1857, 1858 or 1859, but it was shown that in 1864 the testator married another woman, and lived with her as his wife until her death; and in the same year Sarah Taylor married another man. There was no evidence of a divorce, and the presumption is strong against the commission of bigamy by both parties. On the question of testamentary capacity the testimony of the lawyer who drew the will is convincing. But, as the petition wholly failed to show any standing to contest, there is no need to discuss that branch of the case.

The decree is affirmed, with costs to be paid by appellant.

COMMONWEALTH ex rel. CARSON, Att'y Gen., v. COLLIER et al.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Nov. 4, 1905.)

1. TAXATION—BOARD OF ASSESSMENT—APPOINTMENT AND ELECTION—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

Act March 24, 1905 (P. L. 47), providing for the appointment by the courts of common pleas in certain counties of a board for the assessment and revision of taxes, is not repugnant to Const. art. 14, § 2, requiring county officers to be elected at the general elections, as the members of the board are not county officers within the meaning of the Constitution.

2. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—JUDICIAL POWERS—DUTIES—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

Const. art. 5, § 21, exempting judges from the imposition of nonjudicial duties, applies only to judges of the Supreme Court.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 10, Cent. Dig. Constitutional Law, §§ 123, 124.]

Petition for mandamus by the commonwealth, on the relation of Hampton L. Carson, Attorney General, to compel Frederick H. Collier and others, as judges of the several courts of common pleas of Allegheny county, to appoint three persons as a board for the assessment and revision of taxes in and for the county of Allegheny, as provided by section 1 of Act March 24, 1905 (P. L. 47). Writ denied.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

Hampton L. Carson, Atty. Gen., and R. H. Jackson, for petitioners. E. H. Stowe, for respondents.

BROWN, J. If the three persons to compose a board for the assessment and revision of taxes created by Act March 24, 1905 (P. L. 47), for counties containing a population of not less than 300,000 nor more than 1,000,000 are county officers, the direction of the act that they shall be appointed by the court or courts of common pleas of the proper county is invalid, for section 2 of article 14 of the Constitution declares that county officers shall be elected at the general elections. By the first section of the same article county officers consist of sheriffs, coroners, prothonotaries, registers of wills, recorders of deeds, commissioners, treasurers, surveyors, auditors or controllers, clerks of the courts, district attorneys, and such others as may from time to time be established by law. With authority thus clearly given to the law-making power to add to and increase the constitutional list of county officers, the first question to be considered in this proceeding is, has the Legislature done so in the act under consideration?

The members of the board created by the act are not declared to be county officers; on the contrary, by directing that they shall be appointed and not elected, the Legislature must manifestly be understood as not having intended to create new county officers. In passing the act the guide of its members was the Constitution, and with it as an open book before them its unmistakable words were that if new county officers were to be established they would have to be elected and could not be appointed. The Legislature further knew from section 3 of the same article that the Constitution contemplates the appointment of officers within a county who are not county officers. The members of the board are not designated in the act as county officers, and, strictly speaking, they could not be so designated. In Taggart v. Commonwealth, 102 Pa. 354, it is true it is said, "In determining what class of officials should be designated county officers, the convention manifestly had in view those whose duties were coextensive with the boundaries of the county;" but a surer test is the character of the duties to be performed by the officers. The duties of a state officer to be performed within a county may be coextensive with and limited to it, but for that reason he is no less a state officer if he acts for the state. The duties to be performed by the board created by the act of 1905 are not for the county alone, but for the state as well. Separate and distinct duties are imposed upon its members. That the commonwealth may receive the tax which it has imposed as a state tax, they are to assess and value a certain species of property, and the act provides that "in so far as respects state taxes, the valuations and assessments shall be made by the board annually, on or before December 31st"; that the county may receive the taxes due it and needed by it for strictly county purposes, they shall assess and value the real estate within it, and in so doing they perform no duty for the state. At times a county officer whose primary duties are to the county, is directed by the state to act for it by virtue of his office. A county treasurer, because he is the appropriate county officer for such a purpose, is designated to collect for the state certain taxes levied by it for state purposes, and so the register of wills by virtue of his office collects the collateral inheritance tax on decedents' estates; but not so here. The appointment of the board is primarily for the state as well as for the county, and though the former looks to the latter for the payment to it of a certain tax, the Legislature does not permit the county through its township and ward assessors to assess and value property upon which the state tax has been imposed, but directs that this board shall be appointed for that specific purpose. Being clearly of the opinion that the members of the board are not county officers, we pass to the next objection raised to the act, which is that it imposes on the court duties that are not judicial.

The executive, legislative and judicial branches of the state government are created by the people through their Constitution, and the powers and duties of each are such only as are expressly conferred or imposed, or are inherent by necessary implication. But there are no powers inherent in either of the branches nor duties to be evaded by either of them, if such powers have been expressly withheld from it by the people or duties have been imposed upon it by them; and therefore no duty can be evaded by the executive or judiciary if the people have authorized its imposition by the Legislature, their law-making power, on either of these branches. In the judiciary article the judges of but one court are exempt from the imposition of nonjudicial duties, and from them alone is the power of appointment withheld. "No duty shall be imposed by law upon the Supreme Court or any of the judges thereof, except such as are judicial, nor shall any of the judges thereof exercise any power of appointment except as herein provided." Const. § 21, art. 5. "Expressio unius est exclusio alterius" is no less true of this clause than of any statute; and it is therefore to be presumed that the people, with the knowledge that for years before they adopted the present Constitution judges of the common pleas had been directed by acts of assembly to appoint mercantile appraisers, boards of revision of taxes, and other officers, and were so appointing them, adopted the clause containing the limitation upon this court alone, and left the judges of the other courts to continue to appoint when directed to do so by the Legislature.

The real question is not as to the character of the duty to be performed by the courts under the act of 1905, but as to the constitutional power of the Legislature to impose it. If that power exists the duty imposed in this clear exercise of it must be performed. Under the conditions existing at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, the people were able to declare who at that time should be regarded as county officers, but, anticipating the requirements arising from new conditions, power was committed to the Legislature of establishing others from time to time, all, however, to be elected. In addition to new county officers to be elected, the necessity for others to be appointed was clearly contemplated in the adoption of the Constitution to meet requirements in the growth and development of the state. What those new officers should be could not have been anticipated, and therefore their selection is not provided for in the Constitution; but when new offices are needed the Legislature may admittedly create them, and, when created, they may be filled by appointment. They are to be "appointed as may be directed by law." Const. § 1, art. 12. The direction of the law is that the board created by the act of 1905 shall be appointed by the court or courts of common pleas of the proper county, and this direction having been made in pursuance of constitutional authority, a constitutional duty arises which cannot be disregarded. This duty having been imposed upon the courts of common pleas of the county of Allegheny, must be performed by the judges composing them. In all matters a court acts through its judge or judges, and when the combined courts of a county are directed to act, they are to act through a majority of their judges forming one body. In the absence of statutory direction as to the manner in which they shall so act, their good judgment will be their guide.

From the answer of the respondents we deem nothing more necessary than this brief expression of our views on the questions raised by them, and, assuming that the duty imposed upon them will be performed, the order asked for by the commonwealth will not now be made.

SEWARD v. JOHNSON et al.

(Supreme Court of Rhode Island. Dec. 4, 1905.)

1. JUDGMENT—SETTING ASIDE—PERSONS ENTITLED TO RELIEF.

A creditor, who attached the interest in land descending to the debtor on his ancestor dying intestate, knew of proceedings in the probate court and in the common pleas division for the probate of the will of the ancestor, disinheriting the debtor, but did not apply to become a party to the proceedings, as authorized by Gen. Laws 1896, c. 248, § 7. A compromise in the proceedings for the probate of the will was made without notice to him. Held, that he was not a party to the proceedings, within chapter 251, § 2, providing that, when it shall be made to appear by "any party" that by reason of mistake judgment has been rendered, a new trial may be granted, and was not entitled to relief.

2. SAME—DEFAULT—WHAT CONSTITUTES DEFAULT—STATUTES.

In proceedings for the probate of a will, evidence showing the execution of the will, its contents, and the capacity of the testator was given. The contestants offered no evidence, and the court admitted the will to probate. Held, that the decree was not entered by default as against the contestants represented in court, or as against a person who could have become a party, but did not, within Gen. Laws 1896, c. 251, § 2, authorizing the granting of a new trial when the judgment has been rendered by default, by reason of accident, mistake, etc.

3. SAME—ACCIDENT—MISTAKE—WHAT CONSTITUTE.

A creditor, who attached the interest in land descending to the debtor on the ancestor dying intestate, knew of proceedings in the probate court and in the common pleas division for the probate of the ancestor's will, which disinherited the debtor, but took no steps to become a party thereto. The will was admitted to probate. Held, that the creditor's failure to contest the probate of the will was not the result of "accident, mistake, or any unforeseen cause," within Gen. Laws 1896, c. 251, § 2, authorizing the court to grant a new trial on the ground that by reason of "accident, mistake, or any unforeseen cause" judgment has been rendered against the party applying for a new trial.

4. SAME—RIGHT TO REPRESENT ABSENT PARTY IN INTEREST.

An heir, disinherited by a will, had not been heard from for several years by any one in interest, and it was not known whether he was alive or dead. A creditor of the heir, petitioning for a new trial after judgment admitting the will to probate, stated that the heir was without the jurisdiction of the state and that his whereabouts were unknown. Held, that the creditor could not represent the heir in a petition to procure a new trial.

Appeal from Probate Court.

Application by Mary E. Seward for the probate of the will of Charles E. Johnson, deceased. The judge of probate decided in favor of the contestants, Emma N. Johnson and others, and on the appeal of the proponent the common pleas division admitted the will to probate. Petition by William A. Lester for a new trial under Gen. Laws 1896, c. 251, § 2. Petition denied.

Argued before DOUGLAS, C. J., and DU-BOIS, BLODGETT, JOHNSON, and PARK-HURST, JJ.

Arthur M. Allen, for petitioner. Littlefield & Barrows, for Mary E. Seward.

PARKHURST, J. This is a petition for a trial or a new trial under chapter 251, § 2, Gen. Laws R. I. 1896, viz.: "Whenever it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the appellate division of the Supreme Court, by any party or garnishee in a suit which shall have been tried or decided in the common pleas division of the Supreme Court, or in any district court, within one year previous to such application, that by reason of accident, mistake, or any unforeseen cause, or for lack of newly discovered evidence, judgment has been rendered in such suit on discontinuance, nonsuit, default, or report of referees, or that such party or garnishee had not a full, fair, and impartial trial in such suit, or, in case a trial has been had in such case, that a new trial therein should be had, such division may grant such trial or new trial upon such terms and conditions as it shall prescribe."

The petitioner, William A. Lester, by affidavit sets forth that he was, on December 25, 1903, and still is, a creditor of one Walter H. Johnson, son of Charles E. Johnson, deceased, late of Warwick, R. I., and that his claim amounts to $1,988.65, with accrued interest, and that Charles E. Johnson died December 25, 1903. At his death the petitioner attached the interest of Walter H. Johnson in certain real estate belonging to Charles E. Johnson in his lifetime, and which descended to said Walter H. Johnson, if the deceased died without a will. It appears that said Charles E. Johnson did have a will, which he destroyed sometime prior to his decease. An administrator was appointed on his estate by the probate court of the town of Warwick, and at or about the time of the application for the appointment of an administrator application was made to admit to probate an alleged copy of Charles E. Johnson's will, which left Walter H. Johnson only $50, and made Mary E. Seward residuary devisee. Mary E. Seward, the proponent, attempted to show that the deceased was of unsound mind at the time he destroyed the will, and that the paper she presented was a true copy. Both of these alleged facts were disputed. The judge of said probate court refused to admit the will to probate. Mary E. Seward appealed, claimed jury trial, and the appeal was entered in the common pleas division for the county of Kent. It further appears that Lester, the petitioner, was fully aware of all these proceedings; that he had an attorney through whom he made the attachment above referred to; that he was in communication, either personally or through his attorney, with at least one party to the record and her attorney, and was watching the progress of the case; but that he did not enter his appearance, or ask to be made a party either in the probate court or in the common pleas division. He now complains that the parties of record in said probate appeal, without notice to him, entered into a compromise, and that pursuant thereto a formal proceeding was had in the common pleas division for the county of Kent on the 17th day of March, A. D. 1905, when a mere formal presentation of the alleged will of Charles E. Johnson was made by the appellant, and no evidence against its validity was presented by the appellee, and that the jury returned its verdict sustaining the will, and that on the 11th day of May, 1905, the formal decree of the common pleas division was entered probating said will. The petitioner further claims that he was a "party" in interest in said proceedings, by reason of his said attachment, and by reason of his rights as a creditor of one of the heirs of said Charles E. Johnson, and that the proceedings in said common pleas division were in the nature of a "default" "by reason of accident, mistake or unforeseen cause," so far as he was concerned, and asks for a trial under section 2 of chapter 251, above quoted.

The petitioner was, by reason of his attachment in the suit against Walter H. Johnson, so far peculiarly interested in the lands formerly belonging to Charles E. Johnson, deceased, that he was entitled to appear and be heard either in the probate court in the original proceedings there, or in the common pleas division on the appeal, provided it should be made to appear to either court that he was interested, in accordance with the provisions of chapter 248, § 7, Gen. Laws R. I. 1896, viz.: "Whenever it shall be made to appear in any matter or cause pending in any probate court, or upon appeal from any such court in either division of the Supreme Court, that any person made a party thereto, or interested therein, has not been duly notified that the same has been brought before the court, the jurisdiction of the court where the same is, over such cause, shall not be defeated thereby, but the probate court, if such matter or cause is therein, or if the same is on appeal in either division of the Supreme Court, such court or any justice thereof may order such notice to be given to such person interested, of the said matter or cause, as in the discretion of said court or justice will afford such party a reasonable opportunity to appear in said court and be heard in reference to said matter or cause. Said notice to be served on such person or party not less than fourteen days before the return-day thereof, and from and after such service and return all orders and proceedings of such court in such cause shall be as effective in binding the person named in such notice as if the proper notice of the bringing of such matter or cause had been duly issued and served upon the commencement of such matter or cause in the court of probate." Such pecuniary interest has been frequently held sufficient to give a person a standing in court as a party interested in matters of probate or probate appeal. Smith v. Bradstreet, 16 Pick. 264; In re Langevin, 45 Minn. 429, 47 N. W. 1183; Shepard's Estate, 11 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 133. See, also, Pierce v. Gould, 143 Mass. 234, 235, 9 N. E. 568; Yeaw v. Searle, 2 R. I. 164; O'Rourke v. Elsbree, 11 R. I. 430; Stebbins v. Lathrop, 4 Pick. 33. It is to be noted that in all these cases which are cited by the petitioner the persons interested had actually appeared and made themselves parties, and the court in each case decided that they had the right so to do. See, also, as to Lester's right to become a party to the appeal, although he did not appear in the probate court, McArthur v. Allen (C. C.) 3 Fed. 313, 319; Wells v. Wells, 4 T. B. Mon. 152, 153, 16 Am. Dec. 150; Patton v. Allison, 7 Humph. 320, 328; Onachita Baptist College v. Scott, 64 Ark. 349, 42 S. W. 536; Lischy v. Schrader (Ky.) 47 S. W. 611; Meyer v. Henderson (Md.) 41 Atl. 1073; Bonnemort v. Gill, 167 Mass. 338, 340, 45 N. E. 768.

But Lester did not see fit to avail himself of the opportunity to become a party to these proceedings. If he had done so, he would then have been properly before the court and entitled to be heard and to produce such evidence as he saw fit in opposition to the probate of said will. If, then, he had not had notice of the proceedings complained of, and a compromise had been made without notice to him, he would have had a proper standing to apply to this court for relief. The statute (section 2, c. 251) contemplates relief to a "party" to a suit. Lester might have made himself a party within its terms had he seen fit to do so. He has not done so, and is not entitled to relief. See Bonnemort v. Gill, 167 Mass. 338, 340, 45 N. E. 768, and other cases cited, supra. Furthermore, we think there was no "default" in the common pleas division such as the statute above quoted contemplates. The affidavit of the appellant, Mary E. Seward, shows that the copy of the will alleged to be the will of Charles E. Johnson was not merely formally presented, but evidence at some length was introduced to show both its execution and contents, and also that Charles E. Johnson was of unsound mind at the time of his attempted revocation of the will by its destruction. A proceeding of this kind cannot be said to be a "default" as against a party to the record who is represented in court and does not see fit to offer testimony; neither can it be said to be a "default" as against a person who could have become a party to the record, but has not seen fit to do so. Nor was there any such "accident," "mistake," or "unforeseen cause" as the statute contemplates. It was either an instance of mistake of law as to the proper legal steps necessary to be taken to preserve the petitioner's interest, as in Howard v. Capron, 3 R. I. 182, or else it was an instance of opinion in Haggelund v. Oasdale Mfg. Co., 26 R. I. 520, 60 Atl. 106.

We fail to find any evidence in the papers before us that the petitioner ever intended to become a party to the proceedings in question; but it seems, on the contrary, that he has purposely kept out of them, taking chances that persons who owed him no legal duty and whose interests were or might become adverse to his, would in some way do something which would be of service to him without expense on his part. In some vague and shadowy way the petitioner appears to attempt to represent Walter H. Johnson in this proceeding, although he does not in exact terms claim to represent him, nor does he petition in Johnson's name. Johnson has not been heard from for several years by any one in interest, and it is not known whether he is alive or dead; and the petitioner himself states under oath that he is without the jurisdiction of this state and his whereabouts are unknown to the petitioner. The petitioner can have no standing to represent Johnson in this matter, as it is evident he can have no authority from Johnson.

The petition for a trial or new trial is denied and dismissed.

MCGOWAN v. COURT OF PROBATE OF CITY OF NEWPORT.

(Supreme Court of Rhode Island. Nov. 29, 1905.)

TRIAL — INSTRUCTIONS — MANNER OF GIVING REQUESTED INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction correctly stating the law on a certain point is not erroneous, because not in the exact language of a requested instruction correctly stating the law on that point.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trial, §§ 668, 674.]

Judicial proceedings on the probate of the will of Ann McGowan, deceased. Petition for a new trial after a verdict approving the will. New trial denied.

Argued before DOUGLAS, C. J., and DUBOIS, BLODGETT, and PARKHURST, JJ.

William P. Sheffield, Jr., and Max Levy, for appellant. Frank F. Nolan and Gardiner, Pirce & Thornley, for appellees.

PER CURIAM. This is a petition for a new trial of a probate appeal in which the jury have found a verdict approving the will of Ann McGowan, deceased. The petition is based upon exceptions to the refusal of the court to charge as requested by the appellants, and also on the ground that the verdict is against the law and the evidence.

Two requests to charge were made, which were modified by the presiding justice. The first request is as follows: "Where a person writes or prepares a will for another under which the wife of the writer takes a benefit, it is a suspicious circumstance, requiring the court to be vigilant and zealous in examining the evidence in support of the instrument, and is sufficient to exclude the will from probate unless the suspicion is removed." The modification of this request which was granted is as follows: "That where a person writes or prepares a will for another, under which the wife of the writer takes a benefit, it is a circumstance to be considered by you, requiring the court and the jury to be vigilant and zealous in examining the evidence in support of the instrument, and that, unless it appears clearly that no advantage was taken by the person so writing a will, it would be sufficient to exclude the will from probate." The charge given by the court was a substantial compliance with the request. It is not the privilege of counsel to dictate the words that shall be given in a charge to the jury. If the law applicable to the case is correctly stated, it is all that can be required. McGarrity v. N. Y., N. H. & H. R. Co., 25 R. L. 269, 55 Atl. 718.

The second request to charge, as it was worded, was inapplicable to any evidence in the case, as was admitted by counsel at the argument before us. The evidence in the record was, in our opinion, amply sufficient to support the verdict. Indeed, it was so strong in favor of the will that a contrary verdict would have been unreasonable.

The petition for a new trial is denied, and the cause will be remanded to the superior court sitting in the county of Newport, with direction to enter a decree sustaining the will, with costs for the proponents.

DAVIS v. BALTIMORE & O. R. CO. et al.
(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Dec. 7, 1905.)

1. INJUNCTION — PRIMARY RELIEF — BILL — DISMISSAL.

Where an injunction asked for is the primary relief demanded, and not merely ancillary, and on hearing an application to dissolve a temporary injunction it is determined that plaintiff is not entitled to injunctive relief, it is proper for the court to dismiss the bill on the merits.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 27, Cent. Dig. Injunction, §§ 279-281.]

2. NUISANCE—INJUNCTION—BILL.

Where a bill sought to restrain the construction of a switch track along a county road in front of plaintiff's premises, charging that the construction, use, and operation of the siding would greatly depreciate the value of plaintiff's property as a residence by reason of the noise and danger incident to the operation of steam cars, and alleged that the smoke, noise, and dust arising from the use of locomotives would constitute a nuisance to plaintiff individually, as well as to the public, and would inflict irreparable injury on plaintiff, but failed to allege the proximity of the railroad to plaintiff's dwelling house, or in what way the value of the latter could or would be affected by the construction of the switch, or how the comfort and enjoyment thereof would be interfered with, or any facts showing how the use of the railroad, the smoke, and noise would operate injuriously thereon, the bill was insufficient to justify an injunction.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. Nuisance, §§ 77, 181.]

3. SAME—RAILROAD SWITCHES.

A railroad switch or siding is not a nuisance per se, and can only become such by circumstances connected with its construction, location, or the manner of its use.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. Nuisance, §§ 23, 24, 159.]

4. SAME—PUBLIC NUISANCE—PRIVATE INJURY.

Where complainant sought to enjoin the construction of a railroad switch along a county road, alleging that the maintenance of the switch would interfere with and endanger the use of the road, which was her only exit from her premises, but it was not contended that there was any actual obstruction of the road by the switch, complainant's safety and comfort in using the road only being impaired, her injury, if any, was not different in kind from that suffered by the general public having occasion to use the road, and hence she was not entitled to sue to enjoin the maintenance of the switch.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. Nuisance, §§ 164-169.]

5. SAME—PARTIES.

Where a railroad company agreed to construct a switch at the expense of a gravel company, the latter being the party having the substantial interest involved and most responsible for the construction of the switch, and being the directing agency in such construction, the railroad company, though a proper party to a suit by an adjoining property owner to restrain such construction, was not a necessary party.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. Nuisance, §§ 71, 112, 180.]

6. PLEADING—VERIFICATION OF ANSWER.

Where, in a suit to restrain the construction of a switch by a railroad company for the benefit of a certain sand and gravel company, the latter was the substantial agency having the matter of construction in charge, it was no objection to the answer of the railroad company that the facts therein were verified by one of the officers of the gravel company who had knowledge thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 39, Cent. Dig. Pleading, §§ 887-890.]

7. SAME—EVIDENCE.

Where, in a suit by an adjoining property owner to restrain the construction of a railroad switch along a county road near her property as a nuisance, there was no evidence showing any diminution in value of plaintiff's property because of the switch, nor to show how noise and smoke from locomotives using the switch could affect the enjoyment of plaintiff's property, nor the probable quantity of such noise and smoke, or what inconvenience would be occasioned thereby, the evidence was insufficient to justify an injunction.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Prince George's County, in Equity; Geo. C. Merrick, Judge.

Action by Nannie E. Davis against the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company and others. From a decree dissolving an injunction and dismissing the bill, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BRISCOE, BOYD, PAGE, PEARCE, SCHMUCKER, JONES, and BURKE, JJ.

Clayton E. Emig, for appellant. Robert W. Wells and Marion Duckett, for appellees. Jas. A. C. Bond, for the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company.

JONES, J. This is an appeal from a decree of the circuit court for Prince George's county dissolving an injunction which had been granted in the cause and dismissing the bill of complaint upon which the suit had been instituted. The bill alleges that the plaintiff is the owner of a tract of land at or near Contee Station, on the main line of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, upon which she has expended more than the sum of $20,000 "for improvements upon the dwelling erected on said premises, and was about to erect yet larger improvements thereon, all of which enures to the benefit of said county and the taxes collectible therefrom, * * * that she is the owner of valuable horses which she uses daily on said premises and on the county road bordering on said premises, and that she has no exit to drive from said premises other than by said county road; that the defendants [appellants here] Charles Hillers and Albert Taylor are the reputed owners of a tract of land adjoining the said premises along the center of the said county road, running northerly from the intersection of said railroad." Then, after alleging that the plaintiff "is informed and believes" that the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company "is about to construct, for the use and benefit of said Charles Hillers and Albert Taylor, a railroad track or siding intersecting with the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad track extending northerly immediately along the county road and along the premises" of the plaintiff (appellant here) "for the purpose of operating steam cars" thereon, the bill charges "that the construction, use, and operation of said railroad track or siding will greatly depreciate the value of her property as a resident, by reason of the noise and danger incident to the operation of said steam cars and locomotives passing immediately in front of her residence"; that the use aforesaid will imperil the life of "the plaintiff" and other members of her family while lawfully engaged in driving upon said county road; that the smoke, noise, and dust arising from the use of locomotives on said railroad in transporting sand and other materials from and to its terminus will constitute a nuisance to "the plaintiff" individually, as well as to the public using said county road, and inflict an irreparable injury; that the construction, use, and operation of said siding and said steam cars constitute a public, as well as a private, nuisance in frightening horses belonging to users of said county road; that the said siding has been graded by the defendants Hillers and Taylor "under a contract with the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, which" agrees to lay the ties and tracks upon said roadbed; that "all of said grading is now ready" for the laying of the tracks upon said roadbed; "that the use and operation of said steam cars on said siding will greatly endanger the use of said county road by those who reside in the immediate vicinity and the public at large; that it will tend to inflict injury by continuously frightening horses and decrease the travel of said county road and greatly depreciate the value" of the plaintiff's "property and premises." Upon these allegations the bill prayed that the defendants therein named be enjoined from constructing the railroad or siding of which complaint was made, and from laying tracks on the roadbed graded as set out in the bill, "adjoining the county road or elsewhere in the near vicinity of said county road or the property" of the plaintiff (appellant), and "from operating or in any manner constructing said railroad or siding along said county road or the premises" of the plaintiff. A preliminary injunction was granted upon the filing of the bill. The defendants filed their answers. The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company its separate answer, and Charles Hillers and Albert Taylor their joint answer (in which the Contee Sand & Gravel Company united and asked to be allowed to intervene in the suit), and accompanied their answers with a motion to dissolve the injunction. A hearing of this motion upon the bill, answers, and testimony resulted in the decree dissolving the injunction and dismissing the bill, from which this appeal was taken.

The appellant contends that the injunction should have been continued; and further insists that, whether the injunction was continued or not, the bill should not have been dismissed at that stage of the proceedings. In this case no other relief was sought by the bill than the injunction to restrain the defendants from the acts complained of; and no other relief, under the general prayer for relief, could have been granted consistently with that specifically prayed for. It is now well settled in our practice that "where the injunction asked for is not ancillary, but the primary and principal relief prayed for, there is no reason for retaining the bill, if upon hearing, upon bill and answer, or bill, answer, and depositions, it appears to the court, there is no ground for issuing or granting the injunction upon the merits." Kelly, Plet & Co. v. Baltimore, 53 Md. 134. Upon the case presented to the court below we are of opinion that the injunction which had been granted therein ought to have been dissolved, and that it was proper to dismiss the bill. That court in its opinion, filed with the decree, said the injunction had been improvidently granted, and with this we agree. The allegations of the bill were altogether too general and indefinite to authorize the granting of the injunction. The suit of the appellant was designed to restrain what was charged in the bill to be a threatened nuisance. In Adams v. Michael, 38 Md. 123, 17 Am. Rep. 516, this court said, through Judge Alvey: "To justify an injunction to restrain an existing or threatened nuisance to a dwelling house, the injury must be shown to be of such a character as to diminish materially the value of the property as a dwelling, and seriously interfere with the ordinary comfort and enjoyment of it. Unless such a case is presented, a court of chancery does not interfere. It must appear to be a case of real injury, and where a court of law would award substantial damages." The principle applied in the case referred to is clearly applicable here, where the gravamen of the bill is that the acts of the defendants complained of will interfere with the use and enjoyment of the premises occupied and owned by the appellant, and will greatly depreciate the value thereof. The bill in the case just referred to was brought to restrain the erection of a factory designed for a use which it was charged would be a nuisance to the plaintiffs, in that it would destroy the comfort and enjoyment of their property and result in irreparable and continuing injury thereto and to the value thereof. The court further said, after referring to the allegations of the bill as being very strong as to what would be the consequences to result from the erection of the factory: "It is not enough for the parties complaining simply to allege that particular consequences will follow the erection of the factory, that may be their opinion or apprehension, but facts must be stated so that the court can see and determine whether the allegation is well founded." The court then points out the defects in the bill there under review, and the same defects are manifest in the bill in the case at bar. The proximity of the railroad, the alleged nuisance in this case, to the dwelling and improvements referred to in the bill, is not shown; nor does it appear in what way the value of these can be, or will be, affected by its construction or the comfort and enjoyment of them will be interfered with. There is nothing but the broad assertion that the results mentioned will follow its construction. There is no allegation of whether the use of the railroad will be frequent or otherwise, nor what smoke and noise it is likely to occasion in its use, nor in what way such smoke and noise will operate injuriously upon the value of the appellant's property or seriously diminish or interfere with the comfort and enjoyment of its use. The nearest approach to determining the character of the railroad as a nuisance, when it shall be constructed and put into operation, is its alleged proximity to the public road mentioned in the bill. If this circumstance makes it a nuisance at all, it is or will become a public nuisance from which the appellant must suffer some peculiar and special injury, different in kind from that which will be occasioned to the general public to entitle her to maintain a private action. Houck v. Wachter, 34 Md. 285, 6 Am. Rep. 332; Schall v. Nusbaum, 56 Md. 512; Garitte v. Baltimore, 53 Md. 422; Crook v. Pitcher, 61 Md. 510. The bill alleges the appellant has no exit to drive from her premises other than over the county road, the use of which will be interfered with and endangered by the construction of the railroad in question. Be this as it may, there is no actual obstruction of this county road. It is not pretended it cannot be used at all, but only that the safety and comfort of using it will be impaired, and in the use of it the appellant will encounter the same inconvenience in kind that will be suffered by others of the general public having occasion to use it. A railroad switch or siding is not a nuisance per se. It can only become such by circumstances connected with its construction or location, or the manner of its use after being constructed. It comes, therefore, within the "general rule that where the thing complained of is not a nuisance per se, but may become so according to circumstances, and the injury apprehended is eventual or contingent, equity will not interfere. The presumption is that a person entering into a legitimate business will conduct it in a proper way so that it will not constitute a nuisance" 14 Encyc. of Plead. & Prac. 1128, 1129. Accordingly, to have entitled the appellant here to the preliminary injunction to restrain what was alleged to be a threatened nuisance, the bill in its allegations should have set out the facts and circumstances, if any existed, which, when supported by proof, would constitute substantial grounds for the charges in the bill of a threatened nuisance. The appellant filed exceptions to the answers of the appellee in the court below, which that court could properly have heard and considered at the time of hearing the motion to dissolve the injunction. Alex. Ch. Prac. 87; Keighler et al. v. Savage Manfg. Co., 12 Md. 383, 71 Am. Dec. 600. It does not appear from the record that these exceptions were there noticed.

It was urged as grounds for the exceptions that the answers of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company and Charles Hillers were not accompanied with affidavits, and therefore could not be considered, that the answers were not responsive to the bill, and that they were evasive and insufficient. We do not find that the answers are obnoxious to the objections of not being responsive to the bill and of being vague and insufficient. They in terms deny that the appellant would be interfered with in the use of her property and premises by the proposed switch or siding. Explain how the said switch or siding is to be constructed and operated, and the objects of its construction. They are responsive to the allegations of the bill, and contain a sufficient denial of the equity it attempts to set up. In respect to the want of affidavits to the answers, there is no doubt that as a general rule to authorize the dissolution of an injunction when the same is heard upon a motion to dissolve that all of the defendants must have answered the bill; and, to authorize effect to be given to the answers of the defendants, the same must be under oath. There are, however, well-recognized exceptions to the rule requiring the answers of all who may have been made parties defendant to be filed before entertaining the motion to dissolve. In Heck v. Vollmer et al., 29 Md. 507, it was held that this rule was "subject to discretion and modification, according to the circumstances of the case, as, where those not answering are mere formal parties, or are infants or nonresidents, and whose answers cannot be material in regard to the facts on which the injunction is founded, there the answers of such parties will not be required as a prerequisite to hearing the motion." Now in this case, though it was not improper to make the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company a party to the appellant's bill, such company was not an indispensable party. The object of the suit could have been accomplished by a proceeding against the other parties without making that corporation a party defendant. The party having the substantial interest involved and the party most responsible for the acts complained of in appellant's bill was the Contee Sand & Gravel Company, acting through its agents and employees, Taylor and Hillers. Taylor was its president and the directing agency in the matter of the construction of the switch or siding in question. He was the one most familiar with all the facts. He swore to the answer filed by himself and Hillers, and in so doing virtually made oath to the facts stated in the answer of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, which in substance and effect was identical with that to which his affidavit was appended. It was requisite, if an affidavit was to be appended to the answer of the railroad company that some one should make the affidavit on its behalf, and no one could have done this with better knowledge of the truth of the facts and averments it set out and contained than Taylor, who swore to the practically identical answer of himself and Hillers. We think under the circumstances of this case the answers of Hillers and the railroad company may well be brought within the exceptions to the rule, invoked against their being allowed effect, which have been recognized in practice, as we have seen.

Coming, now, to the consideration of the testimony upon which the motion to dissolve was heard, this was equally as vague and indefinite as the allegations of the appellant's bill. There is no testimony at all showing any diminution in value, present or prospective, of appellant's property. There is none as to how the noise and smoke will or can affect the appellant in the enjoyment of her property. None to show the probable quantity of such noise and smoke or what inconvenience is to be occasioned by it. As to the danger to result from the operation of the switch or siding in question, there is no evidence, except the expression of opinion, in a general way, by two of the witnesses that there will be danger at certain points on the public road likely to be encountered by persons using the road, a danger or inconvenience, if it results as indicated, not peculiar to the appellant, but which will be suffered by the public generally. There is testimony going to show some flooding upon one occasion of the lands of the appellant by reason of obstruction to the flow of the water by the partly constructed switch. This consequence of the acts complained of was not alluded to in appellant's bill, and is not shown to be a continuing or recurring condition, nor any thing more than an exceptional and extraordinary occurrence readily susceptible of being compensated for in damages in an action at law, if actionable injury was suffered therefrom.

Upon the whole case we find the injunction was properly dissolved and that there was no reason shown for retaining the bill, and the decree in the case will be affirmed, with costs.

Decree affirmed, with costs to the appellees.

EAST BALTIMORE LUMBER CO. v. WALDEMAN et al.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. April 12, 1905.)

1. APPEAL — REVERSAL — JOINT DEFENDANTS.

Where defendants were jointly sued as original promisors, and the appeal record failed to show that they raised the question of misjoinder of parties in the trial court, a judgment based on a single verdict in favor of all of the defendants could not be reversed, in so far as it affected some of them, and affirmed as to the others.

2. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF—COLLATERAL PROMISE.

Where materials are delivered to a contractor on his sole credit, a subsequent oral promise of the owner of the building to see that the materialman was paid was within the statute of frauds.

3. SAME—JOINT ORIGINAL PROMISE.

A joint promise by a contractor and the owners of a building to pay for materials furnished, credit being given partly to both, is not within the statute of frauds.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 23, Cent. Dig. Frauds, Statute of, §§ 35-39.]

On rehearing. Overruled.

For former opinion, see 59 Atl. 180.

SCHMUCKER, J. The appellees, who were defendants below, have asked for a rehearing of this appeal, and they urge in the brief, filed in support of their motion, in addition to the grounds relied on in the argument of the appeal, first, that we should not have reversed the judgment as to all three of the defendants, when we held that the plaintiff had practically abandoned its case against the defendant Silberman and that the record contained no legally sufficient evidence to hold the Hebrew congregation; and, secondly, that we should have held in our opinion that, if any credit at all had been given to the contractor, McCall, for the lumber for the price of which the suit was brought, the undertaking of the defendants was collateral to that of the contractor, and void under the statute of frauds because not in writing. The appellees were sued jointly as original promisors, and the record fails to show that they raised the question of misjoinder in the court below. There was but one verdict and judgment, and, having been rendered by a court of law, it would have been improper to affirm it in part and reverse it in part. In Hanley v. Donoghue, 59 Md. 239, 43 Am. Rep. 554, this court said: "At common law a judgment was regarded as an entire thing, and, being an entirety, it has been repeatedly held that it could not be affirmed as to one or more defendants and reversed as to the others. It must either be affirmed as a whole or reversed as a whole. Cutting v. Williams, 1 Salk. 24; Parker v. Harris, 1 Ld. Raym. 825; Lloyd v. Pearse, Cro. Jac. 425; Jaques v. Cesar, 2 Saund. 101; 2 Bac. Abr. 221 marg." Hanley v. Donoghue was reversed in 116 U. S. 1, 6 Sup. Ct. 242, 29 L. Ed. 535, upon the ground that an allegation in the declaration, that a judgment recovered in Pennsylvania against two defendants, only one of whom had been served with process, was binding upon that defendant in Pennsylvania, was admitted to be true by a demurrer to the declaration, but the proposition to which we have referred was not passed upon or reversed by the Supreme Court.

As to the second proposition of the brief, in holding, in our opinion already filed, that the question whether the defendants' undertaking was an original or a collateral one must be solved by determining to whom the credit was given at the time of the sale and delivery of the lumber, we used the precise language employed under similar circumstances by our predecessors, in Myer v. Grafflin, 31 Md. 350, 100 Am. Dec. 66, in stating the law as clearly settled by the earlier cases of Elder v. Warfield, 7 Har. & J. 391, Conolly v. Kettlewell, 1 Gill, 260, and Cropper v. Pittman, 13 Md. 190. The same expression was employed by the appellee Waldeman himself in the present case to state the proper rule by which to test his liability in the defendants' fourth prayer, which asks the court to rule that the jury must find in his favor because there is no legally sufficient evidence that the lumber in question was sold and delivered "upon the credit of the said defendant." No allusion is made in the prayer to the effect of giving some credit to the contractor. In a case like the present one, where parties claiming to be only collaterally bound are sued by themselves as original promisors, and not jointly with the person alleged by them to be originally bound for the debt in suit, the expression "the credit," used in the connection in which we have used it in our opinion, means the sole credit, and, as was held in Norris v. Graham, 33 Md. 58, if it appear that credit was also given to the party to whom the goods were delivered, the undertaking of the defendants must be regarded as collateral, and within the statute. In cases where the person to whom the goods were sold and delivered and the one who orally undertook to be bound for their price are sued together as joint original promisors, the action will not be defeated as to the latter by showing that credit for the goods was given partly to one and partly to the other defendant, as the statute of frauds does not extend to a joint promise by two persons for the benefit of one of them. A. & E. Encycl. (2d Ed.) vol. 29, pp. 923, 924, and cases there cited.

The appellees also insist in their motion that there is no legally sufficient evidence to hold any of the defendants, but we still think that the case should have gone to the jury for the reasons stated in our opinion, and we will overrule the motion.

Motion overruled.

OLDENBURG & KELLEY v. DORSEY.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Nov. 16, 1905.)

1. APPEAL—JOINT JUDGMENT—PARTIES—SEVERANCE.

Where a judgment at law was rendered against three persons jointly, two of them could not prosecute an appeal therefrom without the issuance of a summons to the third by the Supreme Court and the granting of a severance.

2. SAME—RECORD—QUESTIONS PRESENTED FOR REVIEW.

Where, in an action for the price of certain lumber alleged to have been sold to three defendants jointly, an objection to certain instructions submitting the liability of two of the defendants according to plaintiffs' theory, in that such instructions ignored a "paper writing" which passed between plaintiff and the other defendant and was the foundation of the contract between them, could not be reviewed, where such "paper writing" was not in the appeal record.

3. SALES—CONTRACT—OBLIGATION TO DELIVER.

Where submission of an estimate by a contractor to a materialman for materials desired for a building, and the latter's acceptance thereof, was insufficient to constitute a contract binding such materialman to deliver the material to the contractor, regardless of his ability to pay for it, or of the liability of the owners of the building therefor.

4. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF—JOINT PROMISORS—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where a materialman sued the contractor and owners of a building for materials as joint original promisors, alleging a joint contract to pay, an instruction that plaintiff could not recover against the owners, unless the materials were sold and delivered to them "upon their special and exclusive credit," was properly refused.

5. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF—ORIGINAL OR COLLATERAL PROMISE.

Where a materialman, on being applied to by a contractor for materials for a building, went to the owners and asked that they give the order for the materials, whereupon one of them told the materialman to deliver the materials and they would pay for them, that they would pay for everything that went into the buildings, and for the materialman to charge the materials to the contractor and hold him, as well as the owners, their contract was an original promise and was not within the statute of frauds.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 23, Cent. Dig. Frauds, Statute of, §§ 35-39.]

6. TRIAL — INSTRUCTIONS — APPLICATION TO FACTS.

Where, in an action for the price of certain building materials, it was proved that plaintiff contracted to furnish materials to the "contractor" as rapidly as wanted, and that all the defendants, including the contractor, were to be liable for the amount, a requested instruction that, if plaintiff contracted to furnish the materials to the "owners" as rapidly as wanted and failed to do so, then the owners were entitled to offset against plaintiff's claim such sum as the jury found "the defendants" lost by reason of such delay, was properly refused.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Baltimore County; David Fowler and Geo. L. Van Bibber, Judges.

Action by William O. Dorsey against Oldenburg & Kelley and George Billings. From a joint judgment against all the defendants, defendants Oldenburg & Kelley appeal. Dismissed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BRISCOE, BOYD, PAGE, PEARCE, SOHMUCKER, and JONES, JJ.

John H. Richardson, for appellants. John S. Ensor, for appellee.

BOYD, J. This action was brought by the appellee against the appellants and George Billings. Judgment was rendered against all the defendants, but Mr. Billings did not appeal. It is well settled in this state that, when a judgment is rendered against several persons jointly, all must unite in an appeal. Poe's Practice, § 825, and cases there cited. The rule was applied in Lovejoy v. Irelan, 17 Md. 525, 79 Am. Dec. 667, to an appeal from a decree of a court of equity, but that was subsequently changed by statute. The rule, however, remains unchanged as to cases at law, as the statute only embraced appeals from final decrees, and orders in the nature of final decrees, passed by courts of equity. The proper practice for the appellants was to apply to this court for a writ of summons and severance (Mottu v. Primrose, 23 Md. 482), but no such application was made. Upon service of that writ Billings could have come into this court and united in the appeal, or, upon his refusal to do so, a judgment of severance could have been passed by this court. Cumberland C. & I. Co. v. Jeffries, 27 Md. 535. The appellee did not make a motion to dismiss the appeal, and the attention of the appellants was not called to this difficulty at the hearing. In passing on a motion to dismiss in Mottu v. Primrose, supra, our predecessors overruled it and ordered a writ of summons and severance to issue, and, as the case was fully argued, we concluded to consider it on its merits, as, under the circumstances, injustice might have been done the appellants if we dismissed their appeal without giving them an opportunity to move for a severance, although we do not mean this to be taken as a precedent which must be followed in all similar cases. As we have reached the conclusion that there were no reversible errors in the rulings of the court below, no injury will be done either side by dismissing the appeal, but, if we had determined otherwise, the appellants could not have gotten the benefit of it unless we had postponed a decision of the case on the merits until after the writ of summons and severance had been issued, and the proceedings thereunder disposed of; for, inasmuch as the judgment is against Billings and the appellants jointly, he would have the right to determine whether he would unite in the appeal and thus have the judgment of this court for or against the three defendants jointly, or whether he would refuse to do so, and thereby enable this court to order a severance. It is clear, therefore, that before we could properly enter up a judgment of affirmance or reversal of the judgment below it would be necessary to issue a summons for Billings, unless he voluntarily appeared, to determine whether there should be a severance. Having sufficiently referred to this question to explain the reasons for the action we will take, we will now consider the rulings of the court below.

The appellee was engaged in the lumber business, and George Billings, who was a carpenter and builder, was employed in the erection of some houses for the appellants, Oldenburg & Kelley, who were partners. According to the appellee's testimony he sent to Billings an estimate of the cost of the lumber wanted, and Billings agreed to the price, but the appellee refused to deliver the lumber unless he knew where the money was to come from. Billings told him that Oldenburg & Kelley would attend to that, whereupon the appellee saw Mr. Oldenburg and told him what Billings said. The most important part of the testimony is thus stated in the record: "I said, 'Now, Mr. Oldenburg, will you give me an order for these goods?' And he [Oldenburg] said: 'Mr. Dorsey, you deliver these, and I will pay for them, or we will pay for them. Everything that goes in those buildings we will pay for.' 'You mean to say you will pay me?' 'Yes; I will.' 'I understand you will pay me for the goods when delivered?' Oldenburg replies: 'Yes; you charge them to Billings. We are responsible for them, and I give you an order for it. Therefore you will hold me, as well as Billings, for the amount.'" That was denied by Billings and Oldenburg, but the lumber was furnished and charged to "George Billings, for Oldenburg and Kelley, Highland Ave., near Gough St." A verdict was rendered in favor of the appellee. During the trial exceptions were taken to granting the second and sixth prayers of the plaintiff, and to the rejection of the defendants' third, fifth, sixth, and eighth. The plaintiff's two prayers related to the liability of Oldenburg & Kelley and properly submitted the question to the jury, according to the theory of the plaintiff. It was contended by the appellants that a "paper writing" which passed between Dorsey and Billings was the foundation of the contract between them, and, as these prayers ignored that contract, they were liable to mislead the jury. A sufficient reply to that suggestion is that this "paper writing" is not in the record, and hence we cannot determine its effect. So far as the record discloses, the only writing between them was an estimate for the lumber, and, if there was anything in that which showed the terms of the proposed sale, who was to be responsible for payments, whether the sale was to be made without security, or anything else that the appellants supposed material, it should have been included in the record. The mere statement that the appellee submitted an estimate to Billings, and he accepted it, is manifestly insufficient to show a binding contract on Dorsey to deliver the lumber to him, regardless of his ability to pay for it, or the liability of the owners of the building for it, if, as the plaintiff claimed, they obligated themselves for it.

The defendants' third prayer asked the court to instruct the jury that the plaintiff could not recover from Oldenburg & Kelley, unless the jury found that the materials were sold and delivered to them "upon their special and exclusive credit." It must not be forgotten that this was an action against the three defendants as joint original promisors. The declaration contains the common counts against "George Billings, individually, and August J. Oldenburg and John B. Kelley, copartners, trading as Oldenburg & Kelley." The theory of the plaintiff was that Billings and this firm were jointly liable, and his testimony tended to establish that fact, as will be seen by that already quoted and other portions of it in the record. We said in the opinion delivered on a motion for reargument, in the case of East Baltimore Lumber Company v. Waldeman et al., 62 Atl. 575, filed April 12, 1905, but not yet officially reported, that "in cases where the person to whom the goods were sold and delivered and the one who orally undertook to be bound for their price are sued together, as joint original promisors, the action will not be defeated as to the latter by showing that credit for the goods was given partly to one and partly to the other defendant, as the statute of frauds does not extend to a joint promise by two persons for the benefit of one of them." We cited 29 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) 923, 924. If it was a joint promise of both for the benefit of the two, as to which there was some evidence from which that could be inferred, the plaintiff's case was still stronger. The distinction is made on those pages of the Encyclopædia between the liability on an oral promise in respect of a transaction for the benefit of a third person and that on a joint understanding by two persons for the benefit of one of them. See, also, Browne on Stat. of Frauds, § 197. In addition to what we have said above, it was held in Small v. Schaefer, 24 Md. 143, that "wherever the main purpose and object of the promisor is not to answer for another, but to subserve some purpose of his own, his promise is not within the statute, although it may be in form a promise to pay the debt of another." That was followed in Little v. Edwards, 69 Md. 499, 16 Atl. 154. Manifestly, if the plaintiff's evidence was correct, the main purpose and object of Oldenburg & Kelley was not to answer for Billings, but to obtain the lumber for their own buildings, and hence was not within the statute. The third prayer was properly rejected.

The fifth was likewise properly rejected. In addition to what we have said above, much of which might be repeated as to this prayer, it is objectionable on other grounds. The evidence does not show "that credit was given the defendant Billings at the time of the acceptance of the estimate offered in evidence," and "that the defendants Oldenburg & Kelley guaranteed the payment of the sum mentioned in said agreement." On the contrary, the plaintiff's testimony tended to show that they were original promisors, and not merely guarantors of the debt of Billings, while the defendants' evidence denied any promise or understanding on their part. Then, again, inasmuch as the law is as stated above, this prayer would have been altogether misleading, as it may be that credit was given to Billings, but also to Oldenburg & Kelley.

It is only necessary to say in reference to the sixth that the "agreement in writing" and the "supplement to said agreement," therein referred to, are not in the record, and the presumption is that there was nothing in them to justify the granting of the prayer, as the ruling of the court is presumed to have been correct, unless there is something in the record to show the contrary.

The eighth was also properly rejected. The seventh, which was granted, instructed the jury that Billings was entitled to recoup against the plaintiff's claim such sum as they found the defendant lost by reason of the delay in furnishing the materials. The evidence tended to show that the plaintiff contracted to furnish the materials to Billings as rapidly as wanted, and that all of the defendants were to be liable for the amount. This eighth prayer asked the court to instruct the jury that if they found the plaintiff contracted to furnish them to Oldenburg & Kelley as rapidly as wanted, and failed to do so, etc., then the defendants Oldenburg & Kelley are entitled to offset or recoup against the plaintiff's claim such sum as the jury may find "the defendants" lost by reason of such delay, etc. In addition to the objection that there was no evidence of an agreement to furnish the material to those parties as rapidly as wanted, this would have been very misleading after granting the seventh prayer. They had already been told that Billings could recoup for such sum as the defendant lost by reason of the delay in furnishing him the materials, and the court was asked to instruct them that Oldenburg & Kelley could recoup for such sum as they found "the defendants" lost. If the jury found for the plaintiff against the three defendants, whatever they allowed by way of recoupment against the plaintiff's claim was to reduce the verdict against the three, and not against Billings, of the firm separately. If there was any error, it was in granting the seventh prayer; but the defendants cannot complain of that.

So, without further discussion of them, we are of the opinion that there was no reversible error in the rulings of the court; but for the reason stated above we will dismiss the appeal, instead of affirming the judgment.

Appeal dismissed, the appellants to pay the costs.

MAYOR, ETC., OF BALTIMORE v. ROSENTHAL.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Dec. 6, 1905.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—TAXATION—ANNEXED TERRITORY.

Acts 1888, p. 113, c. 98, annexing certain territory to the city of Baltimore, by section 19 (page 127) provided that till 1900 the rate of taxation on all landed property so annexed should not exceed the rate at that time of Baltimore county, and that after 1900 the then Baltimore county rate should not be increased for city purposes on such property till avenues, streets, or alleys should have been opened and constructed through the same, nor till there should be on every block of ground so formed at least six dwelling or store houses. Acts 1902, p. 199, c. 180, provided that the above provision, relating to avenues, etc., should mean "until avenues, streets or alleys shall have been opened, graded, kerbed and otherwise improved from kerb to kerb by pavement, macadam, gravel, or other substantial material," and that "block of ground" should mean an area not exceeding 200,000 square feet, bounded on all sides by intersecting avenues, streets, or alleys, improved as above provided. Held, that an alley, 25 feet wide, paved with cobblestone its entire width, though not on the same grade throughout, and though the paving was in bad repair, was graded as required by the statutes.

2. SAME.

An alley graded and paved is sufficient to form a boundary of a block as described in the statute, though it is not kerbed.

Appeal from Circuit Court of Baltimore City; Pere L. Wickes, Judge.

Suit for injunction by Jacob S. Rosenthal against the mayor and city council of Baltimore. From a decree granting the injunction, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BRISCOE, BOYD, PAGE, SCHMUCKER, JONES, and BURKE, JJ.

Edgar Allan Poe, for appellant. Isaac Lobe Straus, for appellee.

BOYD, J. This is an appeal from a decree which perpetually enjoined the appellant from levying taxes for municipal purposes against the appellee, as the owner of certain property in the city of Baltimore, at a rate in excess of 60 cents per $100 of its assessed value, for the year 1903. The property in question is in what is commonly known as "The Belt," being within the limits of the territory annexed to the city of Baltimore under and by virtue of Acts 1888, p. 113, c. 98. It is in the block bounded on the north by Whitelock street, on the south by North avenue, on the east by Eutaw Place, and on the west by Madison avenue. There is an alley called "Morris Alley," running from North avenue to Whitelock street, about midway between Eutaw Place and Madison avenue. Section 19 (page 127) of the act of 1888 provided that until the year 1900 the rate of taxation upon all "landed property" and upon all personal property liable to taxation in the territory so annexed to the city should not "exceed the present tax rate of Baltimore county." After making certain provisions about assessments, expenditures of the amount of revenue, etc., that section concluded as follows: "Provided, however, that after the year 1900 the present Baltimore county rate of taxation shall not be increased for city purposes on any landed property within the said territory until avenues, streets or alleys shall have been opened and constructed through the same, nor until there shall be upon every block of ground so to be formed at least six (6) dwelling or store-houses ready for occupation." By Acts 1902, p. 200, c. 180, section 4a was added to article 4 of the Code of Public Local Laws, and by it "landed property" was declared to mean "real estate, whether in fee simple or leasehold, and whether improved or unimproved." It further enacted that the reference to avenues, etc., should be construed to mean "until avenues, streets or alleys shall have been opened, graded, kerbed and otherwise improved from kerb to kerb by pavement, macadam, gravel, or other substantial material; the words 'avenues,' 'streets,' and 'alleys,' being herein used interchangeably," and that "block of ground" should mean "an area of ground not exceeding two hundred thousand superficial square feet, formed and bounded on all sides by intersecting avenues, streets or alleys, opened, graded, kerbed, and otherwise improved from kerb to kerb by pavement, macadam, gravel or other substantial material as above provided." This entire block between the streets and avenues mentioned above contains 338,826 superficial square feet, and therefore considerably more than the 200,000 feet mentioned in the act of 1902, but to the east of Morris alley the area of ground contains only 161,342 square feet, and to the west of that alley there are 145,296 square feet. The important question, therefore, is whether that alley can be used as a boundary within the meaning of this statute.

It is admitted that the streets and avenues above mentioned are so improved that they comply with all the requirements of the statute, as, indeed, they were for some time before the act of 1902 was passed. Mr. Payne, chief assessor of the appeal tax court, testified that on the 1st day of January, 1901, there were 118 houses on the block bounded by them, and that Morris alley was opened by the city under an ordinance of 1889. It is 25 feet wide, and there can be no doubt from the testimony that it was paved with cobblestones as far back as 1897, and probably earlier. It is paved to the fence line on the east side, and is likewise paved to what Mr. Payne testified he understood to be the west line of the alley, but there is an unpaved space between that west line and the fence line of the lots fronting on Madison avenue. There are two blocks of small houses on the west side, and in front of them there are sidewalks about four feet wide; the space referred to above as unpaved being between the sidewalks in front of the houses. Mr. Coonaw, a surveyor, called by the plaintiff, testified that there was granite kerbing extending from White-lock street about 70 or 75 feet, another granite kerb about 30 feet in front of some of the small houses on the alley, and about 100 feet of wooden kerb in front of the houses further down the alley. In the center of the alley there is a gutter for surface drainage. It must be admitted that the paving in the alley is in bad repair, although Mr. Payne said "It would compare with the average 20 or 25 foot alley in the city paved with cobblestones, subject to the ordinary wear and tear of that class of pavement." Mr. Rosenthal, the plaintiff, said: "It is in a condition generally of filth, stable refuse, garbage boxes, and, in fact, all the evidences, the physical evidences, that generally characterize a badly paved alley in a large city." And Mr. Records, who lives on Eutaw Place and was called by the plaintiff, also said it was paved with cobblestones, "just as they are ordinarily put down in an ordinary street." He also said it was, as to cleanliness, "about in keeping with all other alleys," and he only saw garbage carts, ice wagons, milk wagons, "and things of that kind," but no carriages there.

The fact that the paving in the alley is in bad condition would not justify the court in declaring it not to be embraced within the meaning of this statute. Nor can the contention that it is not graded be sustained. It is true Mr. Coonaw testified that "there are possibly about four changes in the grade there. It seems as though the alley was just laid right on the surface, and possibly, from the looks of things, it looks as though it was not paved all at once." But it is manifest that the grading was sufficient to comply with the requirements of the statute in that respect, and merely because "they didn't make a straight grade all the way through," to use Mr. Coonaw's expression, would not be ground for exemption from the city tax rate under this law. There are doubtless some streets in the heart of the city that might be subject to the same criticism. We are satisfied that the evidence abundantly shows that the alley was opened, paved, and graded within the meaning of this act, and therefore we only have to determine whether the fact that it is not kerbed throughout is to relieve the appellee, and others similarly situated, from the payment of taxes at the ordinary city rate. If it be true that this alley was paved with cobblestones from its eastern to its western lines, it would be remarkable if the Legislature intended that the mere failure to place kerb stones, either along the outside limits or within those limits, should have the effect contended for in this case. Mr. Payne testified that it was so paved according to his understanding of the lines of the alley, and we do not understand that to be contradicted. It may be true that some portions of the ground between the fences are not paved; but there is nothing to show that any part of the alley, as laid out by the city for a public alley, was not originally paved. The plaintiff himself testified that it "is paved in a sense with cobblestones, but unkerbed, having no kerb in either side; the paving being directly from the fence line to fence line." There is not a word in the statute requiring sidewalks to be laid; but the avenues, streets, and alleys are to be "opened, graded, kerbed and otherwise improved from kerb to kerb by pavement, macadam, gravel or other substantial material," and, if it be essential, for the purposes of this statute, that there be kerbs in all avenues, streets, and alleys, what is there in the statute to prevent them from being placed 10 or 15 feet apart and simply paving between them? That would comply with the letter of the statute.

There are doubtless many alleys in the city of Baltimore, as there are in all cities, which have no sidewalks on them, and the fact that they are not paved with cobblestones from one side to the other does not make them any the less public highways. Whatever be the law on the subject of alleys elsewhere, those that are obtained by dedication or condemnation in the city of Baltimore are public highways (Van Witsen v. Gutman, 79 Md. 405, 29 Atl. 608, 24 L. R. A. 403; Code Pub. Loc. Laws, art. 4, § 806), and, of course, one conveyed to the city by deed would be, unless there be restrictions in it to the contrary. This alley was paved by the city, and undoubtedly some discretion must be allowed the city as to how it should be paved. To hold that all alleys must be kerbed in the way streets usually are—that is to say, that there must be sidewalks on them, and kerbs separating them from the driveways—would in many instances destroy the usefulness of alleys. The proof in this case shows that alleys in Baltimore City are from 8 to 30 feet in width, and it would be impossible to have parts of some of them reserved for sidewalks and other parts for roadways without materially affecting their usefulness. Some are intended for foot passengers only; others merely for vehicles. When, then, an alley in this annexed territory is opened, graded, and paved from one side to the other, and there is no necessity for kerbing, we cannot admit that it is nevertheless necessary to kerb it in order to use it as a boundary in compliance with the requirements of this statute. Ordinarily it is necessary to kerb a street or avenue when it is to be paved, at least it is usually done, but it is neither necessary nor usual to kerb an alley used for such purposes as this one is. Streets are sometimes paved from building line to building line with vitrified brick, or other material, without any kerbstones, and yet it cannot be possible that the mere absence of kerbstones was intended to result in exempting property in the territory annexed to Baltimore City from the paying of taxes at the regular rates, simply because there were no kerbstones, although the street in all other respects was improved as required by the statute. And a fortiori it must be so of alleys which were opened, graded, and paved, but not kerbed.

In some of the cases in this court affecting the territory annexed to Baltimore City under the act of 1888 we stated the objects and purposes of the exemption in the statute. In Daly v. Morgan; 69 Md. 460, 16 Atl. 287, 1 L. R. A. 757, which sustained the validity of that act, Judge Robinson said: "The larger part of the territory annexed under the act of 1888 embraces vacant outlying lots and farming lands, and the plainest principles of justice would seem to require a qualified exemption of such property, for a limited period at least, from the heavy burden of city taxation. It must be some time before such property can be available for building or business purposes, or can enjoy the full benefits and privileges of the city government." In Sindall v. Baltimore, 93 Md. 533, 49 Atl. 647, the present Chief Judge says: "It must be borne in mind that at the date of the adoption of the annexation act a large part of the added territory was unimproved, outlying, rural land. It would have been manifestly unjust to have subjected such property to the same valuation and to the same rate of taxation as then obtained in the city with respect to distinctively urban property." We there said that "landed property," as used in the act, meant rural unimproved land, as distinguished from real estate compactly built on as in a city, and that the full city tax rate could be imposed on the annexed property under two conditions: "First. When the 'landed property' has been divided into lots and compactly built on with a view to fronting on a street not yet constructed, but contemplated by the persons who project it or build with reference to it, though the municipality has not opened such street or accepted a dedication of it. Secondly. When though still 'landed property'—that is, rural property—in the sense that it has not been divided into lots and has not been compactly built on, it is intersected by open and constructed streets, opened and constructed by or in conformity with municipal authority, which streets form blocks and upon which blocks there are at least six houses. In the second instance, though the residue of the block be unimproved or be not laid out in lots, the whole block will be liable to be taxed at the current city rate, as soon as six houses are erected on it." That decision was rendered in June, 1901, and the act of 1902 was then passed, which act was held to be constitutional and valid in case of Joesting v. Baltimore, 97 Md. 589, 55 Atl. 456.

We see, then, that the Legislature, by the original act of annexation, provided that the rate of taxation fixed for the year 1887 in Baltimore county should continue until after the year 1900, for the reason, as interpreted by this court, that it would have been unjust to impose taxes at the ordinary city rates upon property situated as that in this belt was. The owners of such property did not have the advantages of urban property, such as water, lights, fire and police protection, etc., and therefore the Legislature wisely and justly postponed the time when the ordinary city rate should be levied. When that time had arrived, some of the annexed territory was still in a condition that the Legislature deemed entitled to relief by way of partial exemption. But, as was said in Sindall's Case, "like every other exemption from taxation, it must be strictly construed. The taxing power is never presumed to be surrendered, and therefore every assertion that it has been relinquished must, to be efficacious, be distinctly supported by a clear and unambiguous legislative enactment. To doubt is to deny an exemption." When the Legislature, in determining what properties should be exempt from the city rate, declared that section 19 of the act of 1888 should mean what is stated above, it would be an exceedingly liberal construction to hold that it intended to exempt property, which, so far as can be gathered from the record, is improved in the same way and has all the advantages of other city property, merely because an alley, which could otherwise be taken as one of the boundaries under this act, is not kerbed, although it was opened, graded, and paved throughout. There could be no possible reason for making the exemption dependent upon kerbing alone. There can be no doubt that under the act an alley can be taken as a boundary in determining the question as to whether the number of superficial square feet in the block exceeds 200,000. Some alleys may be kerbed, and others not. Morris alley is one where this seems to have been thought unnecessary by the municipal authorities, and, if its uses are correctly stated by the witnesses produced by the appellee, for drainage, ice wagons, milk wagons, garbage carts, etc., there could be no possible necessity for the city to kerb it. As we have seen, it is a public highway and the public has the right to use it for the purposes for which it was intended, but the public could not expect an alley situated as this one to be kept in all respects in the same condition as a street. The intention of the Legislature was to exempt property in this territory from the city rate of taxation until it was improved as city property is ordinarily improved. When the act spoke of "opened, graded, kerbed," etc., and declared that the words "avenues," "streets," and "alleys" were used interchangeably, it did not necessarily mean to exclude all alleys which were not kerbed, especially such as were never intended to be kerbed, and it would be adding a new ground for exemption to hold that only such a one as is kerbed can be used as a boundary in determining the area of ground in a block. This court having in effect said in Sindall's Case that under the act of 1888 it was not necessary that the beds of the avenues, streets, or alleys be improved in order to make the houses and lots fronting thereon liable to the city rate of taxation, the act of 1902 was intended to so amend the statute as to require the avenue, street, or alley to be improved as mentioned in the act; but, as what we may call improved alleys in contradistinction to those not graded and paved are frequently, if not usually, not kerbed, the Legislature could not have intended that they must in all cases be kerbed. It is a matter of common knowledge that some alleys in the city of Baltimore are kerbed, while others are not, although regularly opened by the municipal authorities and graded and paved. The description given by the witnesses of this block, between the four streets named, shows that it does not differ from other blocks in the original limits of the city. Morris alley is said to be like other city alleys, and we are of the opinion that it does sufficiently comply with the terms of the act of 1902 to make the properties between it and Eutaw Place, and between it and Madison avenue, from North avenue to Whitelock street, subject to the ordinary city rate of taxation.

There is much force in the contention of the city that the act of 1902 was not intended to apply to property situated and improved, as this was, when the act was passed. The improvements to the streets and Morris alley had then been made, and it is scarcely possible that the Legislature could have intended to exempt property which was in most, if not all, respects already improved just as many of the blocks within the old limits of the city were. But as it is not necessary to now determine that question, and we prefer to rest our decision on what we have said above, we will not further discuss it. The decree of the lower court will be reversed, and the bill dismissed.

Decree reversed, and bill dismissed; the appellee to pay the costs.

MOWEN et al. v. NITSCH.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Dec. 7, 1905.)

1. CORPORATIONS—INSOLVENCY—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

Where a corporation owed over $32,000, having assets amounting to $26,000, and it was unable to pay its obligations as they matured and had not sufficient credit to borrow money, it was insolvent.

2. SAME—FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—MORTGAGE—CONSIDERATION.

On an issue as to the validity of a mortgage given by a corporation as against creditors, evidence held to show that the mortgage was given, not to secure an indebtedness of the corporation, but to secure the individual indebtedness of an officer thereof.

3. SAME.

The loaning of money to an individual, the same being used by him in the business of a corporation, did not render it the lender's debtor, so as to render a mortgage by the corporation securing the loan valid against creditors.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Baltimore County, in Equity; N. Charles Burke, Judge.

Suit by George L. Mowen and another, as receivers of the Arthur B. Nitsch Brick Company, against Josephine Nitsch. From a decree dismissing the bill, the receivers appeal. Reversed.

Argued before McSHERRY, BRISCOE, BOYD, PAGE, PEARCE, SCHMUCKER, and JONES, JJ.

William Colton and John P. Poe, for appellants. Francis I. Mooney and Myer Rosenbush, for appellee.

McSHERRY, C. J. On December 31, 1904, the appellants, who are receivers of the Arthur B. Nitsch Brick Company, filed a bill on the equity side of the circuit court for Baltimore county against Josephine Nitsch wherein they assailed as invalid and fraudulent a certain mortgage executed by the brick company to Mrs. Nitsch on the 10th day of July, 1902, to secure the payment of the sum of $15,000 alleged to be due by the mortgagor to the mortgagee. The bill charged that the brick company, which was a body corporate, was indebted to sundry persons between the date of its incorporation on February 8, 1900, and the date of the execution of the mortgage; that at the time the mortgage in question was given the company was insolvent; that "the giving of the said mortgage was a fraudulent contrivance on the part of the said Arthur B. Nitsch Brick Company and the said Josephine Nitsch to defraud, hinder, and delay the creditors of the said Arthur B. Nitsch Brick Company in the collection of their just claims against it then existing"; and that the mortgage conveyed all the property of which the corporation was possessed. The bill further sets forth that on September 23, 1902, certain creditors of the brick company filed a bill on the equity side of the circuit court for Baltimore county alleging, among other things, that the company was unable to pay its obligations at maturity, and was hopelessly insolvent; and that upon the same day a decree was passed appointing the appellants receivers, with power and authority to take charge of all the property and assets of the company which, after filing their bond, they proceeded to do. It is also alleged that on December 31, 1904, the circuit court for Baltimore county, sitting in equity, authorized and directed the receivers to institute such proceedings in equity in that court as they might be advised would be proper and right for the purpose of having the aforementioned mortgage set aside, and declared illegal and void, for the benefit of the creditors of the brick company. The relief asked was a decree setting aside the mortgage, and declaring it fraudulent and void. There was also a prayer for general relief included in the bill. By the seventh paragraph of the bill it was charged that the mortgage for $15,000 included as a part of the sum just named an indebtedness of $9,000 due by Arthur B. Nitsch personally to the appellee and secured to her by a mortgage from him upon his individual interest in the estate of his deceased father. The appellee, who was the defendant below, first answered the bill, then withdrew her answer and demurred. Upon the demurrer being overruled she refiled her answer. In replying to the seventh paragraph of the bill, the appellee admitted its averments to be true, and therefore admitted that the $15,000 mortgage included the $9,000 indebtedness due by Arthur B. Nitsch personally to the appellee and secured by a mortgage on his interest in his father's estate. At the final hearing, however, in the lower court that admission of the answer was amended. The material allegations of the bill were denied by the answer, and after a replication had been filed quite a large volume of testimony was taken. The circuit court denied the relief sought, and dismissed the bill.

The receivers thereupon obtained leave to enter an appeal to this court, and pursuant to that leave they have brought the record here, so that the decree dismissing their bill of complaint may be reviewed. There are two grounds upon which the validity of the assailed mortgage is questioned, and they are, first, that it was a preference which, inasmuch as it was executed within four months prior to the filing of the creditors' bill on September 23, 1902, was invalid under the provisions of the Code; and, secondly, that it was fraudulent and void under St. 18 Eliz. c. 5.

First, then, as to whether the mortgage is void as a prohibited preference under the provisions of the Code to which reference will be made in a moment. Prior to Acts 1896, p. 643, c. 849, now forming section 377, art. 23, Code Pub. Gen. Laws 1904, a corporation was not in any respect within the scope of the state insolvent laws, nor is it yet amenable to that system; but since the adoption of the act and on the terms therein prescribed, all corporations, other than railroad companies, upon appropriate proceedings against them in a court of equity, are brought within the operation of a provision of that system (but not under the system itself), in so far forth only as respects the preference of one creditor over another when the corporation is insolvent. That provision of the insolvent law is ingrafted on the jurisdiction of a court of equity precisely as though the same provision had been independently enacted in identically the same words without any allusion whatever to the insolvent laws. It is under the above section and the preceding one (section 376), and under section 22, art. 47, that proceedings must be had against a corporation to avoid and set aside a prohibited preference. The questions arising under those sections of the statutes, whilst interesting and important, are not necessarily involved in the decision of this case, if the second of the grounds upon which the mortgage now being attacked is assailed is a tenable one under the evidence contained in the record. It may be appropriate to remark, before proceeding to discuss the second of the two grounds above alluded to, that the evidence in the record is ample and abundant to establish beyond any doubt or dispute the hopeless insolvency of the brick company at the time the mortgage was executed; and whilst apart from the provisions of the insolvent laws and the terms of section 377, art. 23, Code Pub. Gen. Laws, the mere fact that a corporation debtor is insolvent will not prevent it from securing a pre-existing creditor by giving to the latter a priority over other creditors, if the transaction be made in good faith, upon a valid consideration, and without a fraudulent intent; yet if the security given was without consideration, or was created with a view to hinder and delay creditors it will not be permitted to stand when properly assailed. This has been so often ruled that it has become axiomatic, and needs no reference to adjudged cases to support it. But a few words will be required altogether apart from the concessions of the answer to the creditors' bill, which, whilst protesting that the company was solvent, admitted the existence of facts, which in law constitute insolvency, to show that it was when it executed the mortgage in a condition of hopeless insolvency. It owed apart from the mortgage over $32,500, and its assets amounted to $26,200, and it was wholly unable to meet and pay its obligations as they matured, besides being without sufficient credit to borrow money with which to continue its business. No one can doubt in the teeth of these facts that the company was insolvent.

Coming, now, to the second ground of attack, without further allusion to the first, we are of opinion that the mortgage should have been pronounced null and void under the statute of Elizabeth in view of the evidence by which its bona fides and the verity of its consideration are impeached. It will not be necessary to recite that evidence at any length, because, first, no useful purpose would be subserved thereby, and because, secondly, a brief reference to a few salient facts will be quite sufficient to expose the falsity of the consideration and reveal the bad faith of the transaction. On July 1, 1902, the board of directors of the company adopted a resolution whereby the company was authorized to give a mortgage to Mrs. Josephine Nitsch for the sum of $15,000 "in payment for $9,000 due upon the brick plant turned into the company, and intended to be subject to a mortgage for said amount, and for cash heretofore loaned to the company, and the balance thereof to secure the repayment of cash to be advanced the company at the time of the execution of said mortgage." According to this resolution there were three items which made up the amount of the consideration of the mortgage, viz., a $9,000 mortgage, cash previously loaned to the company, and cash to be advanced the company when the mortgage should be given. In the testimony we find no trace of a $9,000 mortgage due to Mrs. Nitsch by the brick company, though it appears that Arthur B. Nitsch owed to his mother that sum of money which was secured by a mortgage, not upon the property of the brick company, but upon the individual interest of Arthur B. Nitsch in the estate of his father. If there was no mortgage for $9,000 due to the appellee, and which was a lien on the company's property, the statement in the resolution that the amount of such a mortgage was to form part of the $15,000 to be secured by the mortgage now assailed, was groundless and untrue. A false statement as to what constituted the major portion of the consideration stamps the transaction in its very inception as fraudulent; because if an honest and genuine indebtedness to the extent of the expressed consideration had really existed on the part of the company to Mrs. Nitsch, there would have been neither an occasion nor an inducement to assert or to rely on one which was fictitious or spurious. The admission made by Arthur B. Nitsch to the receivers to the effect that the $9,000 mortgage which was included in the $15,000 consideration was the identical mortgage which he had given to his mother upon his individual interest in his father's estate, affirmatively shows that more than half of the indebtedness which the assailed mortgage purports to secure was an indebtedness of Arthur B. Nitsch himself, and not of the company at all. But there is another circumstance which conclusively proves that the $9,000, as well as the residue of the $15,000, not only represented the personal indebtedness of Arthur B. Nitsch to his mother, but further that Mrs. Nitsch knew the whole $15,000 were due to her by her son, and not by the company; and that she in the most formal and deliberate manner acted upon that knowledge in a way wholly inconsistent with the pretense that it was the company's and not the son's indebtedness which the impeached mortgage was given to secure.

The record shows that on October 17, 1902, involuntary proceedings in bankruptcy against Arthur B. Nitsch were begun in the District Court of the United States for the District of Maryland and that in December following he was adjudicated a bankrupt. It further appears that amongst the claims filed by his creditors was a large one presented by Mrs. Nitsch, the appellee, and to her claim is annexed her affidavit that the debt had not been paid and that she had not received any manner of security for the same. Fourteen items of that claim aggregating about $5,000 are precisely the same items which are included in a statement produced in evidence in this case, and purporting to set forth the item making up a part of the consideration of the assailed mortgage. Of course if the 14 items just alluded to represented the individual debts of Arthur B. Nitsch, as Mrs. Nitsch unqualifiedly swore in her affidavit that they did, they could not also be due by the brick company, and the actual inclusion of them in the mortgage, and the attempt to charge them against the assets of the company tainted the mortgage with the bad faith which such an effort necessarily indicated. Here, then, we have first, a purely mythical mortgage indebtedness of $9,000 asserted to be a part of the $15,000 consideration, when no such mortgage or lien or debt in fact existed; and, secondly, an alleged indebtedness of about $5,000 for advances made to the company, when the creditor herself has made oath that the precise items making up that sum are due to her, not by the mortgagor company, but individually by Arthur B. Nitsch; and finally the fact that no advances were made when the mortgage was executed. It surely needs no citations from adjudged cases to sustain the proposition that a mortgage founded on such a pretended consideration is null and void as respects subsisting creditors whose confessedly just claims would go unsatisfied if the mortgage were permitted to prevail.

There is no doubt that Mrs. Nitsch advanced to her son Arthur B. Nitsch considerable sums of money which he unquestionably used in conducting the business of the company, but that did not make the company her debtor. Two references to the testimony will show how the borrowing and lending transactions were conducted, and that the result was, in the final development, not that Mrs. Nitsch was a creditor of the company by reason of the loans, but was a creditor of her son, in whose bankruptcy proceedings she filed her properly verified claim. In the testimony of Roman C. Nitsch the following question and answer will be found: "Isn't it a fact that your mother, in advancing this money, I will ask you, if you know, isn't it a fact when your mother loaned the money, you say you and your sister drew the checks, she loaned the money to Arthur B. Nitsch upon the theory that he controlled the property at Lansdowne, and owned nine-tenths of the stock, and he was practically the company, wasn't that the theory, is that a fact? Answer. She loaned him the money that way, yes, sir." Upon cross-examination, Arthur B. Nitsch was asked: "Not having enough of your own funds you borrowed from time to time large sums from your mother? Answer. Yes, sir. Question. She loaned it to you, and you used it for the company, isn't that it? Answer. Yes, sir." It is obvious, then, that whatever relation was created between Mrs. Nitsch and Arthur B. Nitsch by these loans, they did not cause the company to become her debtor on account of them; and the mortgage which undertook to bind the property of the corporation for their payment, to the exclusion of the actual creditors of the corporation, must be stricken down and annulled as fraudulent and void so far as these last-named creditors are concerned.

It follows from the views we have expressed that upon the second of the two grounds on which the mortgage has been questioned it must be set aside; and accordingly the decree appealed against will be reversed, with costs; and the cause will be remanded that a new decree conforming to the conclusion just announced may be passed.

Decree reversed, with costs above and below, and cause remanded.

ROBERTS BROS. v. CONSUMERS' CAN CO.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Dec. 6, 1905.)

1. ARBITRATION AND AWARD—CONSTRUCTION OF AWARD.

Where the parties to an arbitration have had a full and fair hearing, the award of the arbitrators will be expounded favorably, and every reasonable intendment will be made in its support.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 4, Cent. Dig. Arbitration and Award, §§ 333, 422.]

2. SAME—CONCLUSIVENESS OF AWARD.

Where the parties to an arbitration have had a full and fair hearing, the court will not consider the merits of their dispute and review the findings of law or fact made by the arbitrators, nor substitute its opinion or judgment for theirs, but will require the parties to abide by the award.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 4, Cent. Dig. Arbitration and Award, §§ 440-442.]

3. SAME—PROCEEDINGS BEFORE ARBITRATORS—DEPOSITIONS—UNAUTHORIZED REJECTION.

Where a submission to arbitration did not provide for the issuance of formal commissions to take testimony, but authorized the taking of depositions before a notary, to be returned to the arbitrators under the hand and seal of the notary, the fact that a deposition was mailed, through mistake of the notary, to one of the parties, instead of directly to the arbitrators, did not authorize the arbitrators to refuse to receive it on its being placed in their hands by the party to whom it was sent, unopened and unaltered, within the time prescribed for the return of the depositions.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 16, Cent. Dig. Depositions, §§ 207, 266, 267.]

4. SAME—MISCONDUCT OF ARBITRATORS—WAIVER OF OBJECTION.

A party to an arbitration does not waive his right to assail the award by not withdrawing his submission on refusal of the arbitrators to receive or consider depositions on his behalf, where, by positive and timely protest against their action, he makes plain his intention not to waive his rights in the premises.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 4, Cent. Dig. Arbitration and Award, §§ 342-348.]

5. SAME—VACATION OF AWARD—MISTAKE.

The unauthorized refusal of arbitrators to consider depositions which constitute the only evidence in behalf of one party on a vital point of the question in dispute constitutes such a mistake on their part as to authorize the setting aside of the award.

Appeal from Circuit Court of Baltimore City; Henry D. Harlan, Judge.

Suit by the Consumers' Can Company against Roberts Bros. From a decree in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BRISCOE, BOYD, PAGE, SCHMUCKER, JONES, and BURKE, JJ.

William A. Wheatley, for appellants.
Joseph C. France, for appellee.

SCHMUCKER, J. This is an appeal from a decree of the circuit court of Baltimore City, which set aside an award rendered by arbitrators. The subject of the award was a dispute between the appellants and the appellee growing out of the sale of a quantity of tin cans intended for packers' use. The entire dispute was submitted for decision to three arbitrators, who heard evidence upon the subject, and made an award in writing, which was subsequently, upon a bill filed for that purpose, set aside by the decree now appealed from. The merits of the controversy covered by the arbitration are not before us on this appeal, and we express no opinion thereon pro or con, but it will be necessary for us to notice the nature and subject-matter of that controversy, in order to clearly discuss the issue presented by the record before us.

Both the appellants and the appellee are dealers in tin cans in Baltimore City. In the summer of the year 1903 the appellee purchased a large quantity of cans intended for shipment to its western customers. The cans were sold to the appellee f. o. b. at Baltimore, but in the course of dealing between the parties they were loaded by the appellants into the cars of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company at Baltimore, and consigned directly to the parties who had purchased them from the appellee, which supplied the names and residences of the consignees for that purpose. Sample cans were submitted for approval to the appellee, but the cans themselves, which were consigned to the purchasers, were never seen by the appellee. Whenever sales of the cans were made by the appellee, they were loaded into the cars, and the bills of lading therefor were taken out in its name, and it drew drafts against the bills for the price at which it had sold the cans, and the drafts, with the bills of lading attached, were placed in the hands of the appellants as collateral and for collection. As the appellee made a profit on the cans sold by it, the proceeds of the drafts would slightly exceed the amount due on them to the appellants, who would account to the appellee for the excess. In this course of dealing a car, said to be No. 91,106, loaded with cans, was shipped by the appellants to the appellee's purchaser, the Westfield Packing Company, located in the state of Indiana, which paid the draft drawn against the bill of lading for the car, in order to get possession of the cans. After that company had gotten possession of the cans it examined and rejected them as being unmerchantable and defective in quality, and, to recover the damages which it had thereby sustained, it sued out an attachment against the appellee of Indiana, and levied the writ on several other car loads of the appellee's cans which had come within that jurisdiction. The Westfield Company recovered a judgment in rem in the attachment suit for over $1,200, which the appellee had to pay, in order to release the cars seized under the attachment. Other car loads of the cans purchased from the appellants by the appellee, and sold by it to the western packing companies, affiliated with the Westfield Company under a common management, were rejected by the purchasers and returned to Baltimore to the appellants, who held the bills of lading therefor. When the appellants demanded payment for the cans from the appellee, it claimed the right to deduct from the price thereof the losses which it had sustained by reason of their alleged defective quality and unmerchantable condition. Litigation, both at law and in equity, between the appellants and the appellee resulted from this state of affairs, and the arbitration was resorted to for the adjustment of the differences between them.

The parties, on April 28, 1904, entered into a written agreement briefly reciting their conflicting claims, and submitting for determination to three arbitrators "the whole dispute between them, claim and counterclaim." The submission provided that "said arbitrators shall by reasonable notice from time to time give to said parties the opportunity of producing evidence before them, they shall determine all questions of law and fact, they shall make their final award in writing not later than the 6th day of June, 1904, unless said time is extended by the written assent of both parties, and such final award shall determine what amount of cash, if any, is due by either party to the other, and what, if anything, either party shall do as a condition of being entitled to payment of the amount awarded. * * * The evidence of any witness not residing in the state of Maryland may be taken before a notary public by either party upon five days' notice to the other of the time and place. The evidence, as taken, shall be returned to the arbitrators under the hand and seal of the notary." It was further provided in the submission that the award of the majority of the arbitrators, in case of a failure of the entire number to agree, should be binding on both parties. The arbitrators held a number of sessions between May 5th and 17th, and heard testimony, oral and documentary, produced before them by the parties to the submission, and on the 19th day of May they rendered their unanimous award in writing, finding that the appellee was indebted to the appellants in the sum of $5,101.99; that upon the payment thereof they execute and deliver to it a release of all demands of every kind to date. On the 27th of May the appellee filed the bill in the present case, alleging the dealings in tin cans between it and the defendants, the dispute arising therefrom, the arbitration, and the award, all of which we have briefly mentioned. It also alleged the following facts: On May 6th, while the arbitration was in progress, it was agreed between the parties and the arbitrators that the appellee should have until May 17th to take and return the depositions of witnesses from Noblesville, Ind., touching the condition of the cans in car No. 91,106, upon which depended the substantial question at issue before the arbitrators whether the said cans were of such quality and in such condition as to constitute a good delivery under the contracts between the parties. The depositions were taken before a notary at Noblesville on May 13th, after notice to the appellants, and certified under the hand and seal of the notary as having been taken in the arbitration, but, through mistake and contrary to the directions of the appellee's attorney, they were mailed by the notary in a box to the address of the appellee, instead of that of the arbitrators. The box containing the depositions was delivered on Sunday, May 15th, at the office of the appellee, which was on that day in charge of a watchman, who handed the box unopened to the president of the appellee on his arrival at the office at about 8 o'clock on Monday morning. He promptly took it to the office of one of the arbitrators, and left it with him, still unopened. On May 17th, the day fixed for the final session of the arbitrators, the package containing the depositions was produced by the one of the arbitrators having it in his possession, but by a vote of two to one the arbitrators decided not to open the package or consider the depositions, upon the ground that it was addressed to the appellee instead of the arbitrators. Thereupon the appellee's counsel urged the arbitrators to open the package and satisfy themselves that its contents had not been disturbed, or at least to permit the depositions to be returned to Noblesville and recertified and redirected, but the arbitrators, although they had until June 6th to return their award, refused to adopt either suggestion, and made their award without inspecting or considering the depositions, which constituted the only evidence of the appellee upon the vital point of the question in dispute. Upon the refusal of the arbitrators to examine or consider the depositions, the appellee filed with them a written protest against their conduct in that respect. The bill further charged that the award was invalid for the reason that it did not dispose of the entire controversy submitted, in that it failed to require the appellants, upon the payment of the sum awarded to them, to return to the appellee sundry collaterals which the evidence showed were held by them as security for any balance which might be due them from the appellee on account of the sales of tin cans under consideration by the arbitrators.

The answer denies many of the allegations of the bill, and charges the appellee with a purpose to procrastinate and evade the payment of its obligations, but it admits the extensive transactions in cans between the parties, the shipment of them as directed by the appellee, the occurrence of disputes over the transactions and their submission to arbitration, and the award of the arbitrators. It also admits the agreement for taking depositions at Noblesville, and their rejection by the arbitrators, but avers that the rejection was proper because they were not taken and returned in accordance with the arbitration agreement. It further charges that the failure to have the depositions properly returned was part of a studied plan for further delay, concocted and persisted in by the appellee. The answer insists that the award does fully cover all points submitted to the arbitrators, and that it makes allegations explanatory of the dealing of the appellants and arbitrators with the collaterals referred to in the bill, and insists that the appellee is indebted to the appellants, after the allowance of all credits to which it is justly entitled, in the full sum found by the award.

Much testimony was taken in the present case, the greater portion of which related to the merits of the original controversy between the parties over the transactions with the tin cans. The remaining portion of the testimony had reference to the transmission to Baltimore of the box containing the depositions taken at Noblesville, Ind., and its receipt and rejection by the arbitrators. That testimony convinces us that the box was mailed by the notary, before whom the depositions had been taken, to the appellee, instead of to the arbitrators, purely through the mistake of the notary, without the suggestion or procurement of the appellee. We are also convinced by the testimony that the box, upon its receipt by the appellee, was promptly delivered to the arbitrators by the president of the appellee, without having been opened or tampered with.

The cardinal question, therefore, now before us for decision is whether the rejection by the arbitrators of the depositions under these circumstances constituted such a mistake on their part as to justify the circuit court in setting aside the award by the decree appealed from. It has been settled by a long line of decisions that, as arbitrations are intended to compose disputes in a simple and inexpensive manner, whenever the parties to one have had a full and fair hearing the award of the arbitrators will be expounded favorably, and every reasonable intentment made in its support. Lewis v. Burgess, 5 Gill, 129; Caton v. McTavish, 10 Gill & J. 192; Ebert v. Ebert, 5 Md. 353; Garitee v. Carter, 16 Md. 312; Bullock v. Bergman, 46 Md. 278; Witz v. Tregallas, 82 Md. 369, 33 Atl. 718. In such cases it is conceded that the court will not look into the merits of the matter and review the findings of law or fact made by the arbitrators, nor substitute its opinion or judgment for theirs, but will require the parties to submit to the judgment of the tribunal of their own selection, and abide by the award. The favor which the courts accord to awards of arbitrators is, however, predicated upon the assumption that in the conduct of the arbitration the parties to the controversy had a full and fair hearing, and that the award is the honest decision of the arbitrators, and involves no mistake so gross as to work manifest injustice or furnish evidence of misconduct on their part. 8 Cyc. 743; Rolason v. Carson, 8 Md. 221, 222; Wilson v. Boor, 40 Md. 483; Burchell v. Marsh, 17 How. 344, 15 L. Ed. 96. It is not denied in the present case that the arbitrators refused to receive or consider the depositions on behalf of the appellee, taken in Indiana, in reference to the condition of the cans in car No. 91,106. The award must, therefore, have been made without reference to that testimony.

The bill of complaint alleges most positively that the substantial question between the parties to the arbitration was whether the cans in that car were in fact unmerchantable, as that fact, if true, formed the basis of the appellee's claim, and that the rejected depositions constituted its only evidence on that subject. It is apparent from the nature of the controversy submitted to the arbitrators that this evidence was vital to the appellee's side of that controversy. The avowed reason of the arbitrators for rejecting it was that the box containing it was mailed by the notary to the appellee instead of to the arbitrators. In view of the fact that the appellee's president, upon the receipt of the box containing the depositions, promptly carried it unopened to one of the arbitrators and left it with him, we are of the opinion that the arbitrators should have received the depositions and considered them in arriving at their decision of the case submitted to them. In courts of law, where the right to issue commissions to take testimony rests entirely upon statute, it is held to be in derogation of the common law, and a strict compliance with the requirements of the statute as to the execution and return of the commission is usually required. Elliott on Evidence, vol. 2, § 1180; Poe, Practice, § 223a; Williams v. Banks, 5 Md. 201; Quynn v. Carroll's Adm'r, 22 Md. 297. It has, therefore, been held by those courts that where the statute required the return of the commission to be made to the clerk of the court, or to the court from which it issued, a return to one of the litigants would be bad.

Arbitrations are, however, not governed by the strict rules as to the admissibility of evidence in force in courts of law. An attempt to require the application of those rules by lay arbitrators, who cannot be expected to know them, would often result in defeating the very purpose of the arbitration. Moreover, in the present case no formal commission to take testimony was contemplated or provided for by the submission. The simple plan of taking depositions before a notary was resorted to. The depositions were, by the terms of the submission, to be returned to the arbitrators by a certain day, and that was substantially done, as it appears that the package containing the depositions reached their hands unopened within the prescribed time. It has been held in a number of cases that a return of depositions to the clerk of a court having no rule to the contrary, through one of the parties to the case, is sufficient if the depositions are in the condition in which they left the hands of the official before whom they were taken and due proof of that fact is made. Logan v. Hodges, 7 Ala. 66; Veach v. Bailiff, 5 Har. (Del.) 379; Homer v. Martin, 6 Cow. 156; Doty v. Strong, 1 Pin. 313, 40 Am. Dec. 773; 13 Cyc. 962. The submission, unlike our statute and rules of court, prescribed no particular channel of transmission to the arbitrators of the depositions when taken, and as it appears from the record that they were in fact taken before a notary public after five days' notice, and returned under the hand and seal of the notary, and reached the arbitrators in an unaltered condition within the prescribed time, there was a sufficient compliance with the terms of the submission to serve the substantial ends of justice, and the arbitrators should have received and considered them.

The appellee did not waive its right to assail the award by not withdrawing its submission when the arbitrators refused to receive or consider the depositions on its behalf. Waiver is a matter of intention, and the positive and timely protest against their action in that respect made plain its intention not to waive its right in the premises. Morse on Arb. & Award, p. 173; Haigh v. Haigh, 31 L. J. Ch. 420; Davis v. Price, 10 W. R. 865.

As the decree of the court below setting aside the award must be affirmed for the reasons already stated, we deem it unnecessary to consider the further objection that it failed to cover the entire ground of the submission. The decree appealed from will be affirmed.

Decree affirmed, with costs.

UNITED RAILWAYS & ELECTRIC CO. OF BALTIMORE v. WEIR.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Dec. 6, 1905.)

1. CARRIERS—DUTY TOWARDS PASSENGERS.

While carriers of passengers are not insurers of absolute safety, yet they are bound to exercise the highest degree of care which is consistent with the nature of their undertaking.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Carriers, § 1087.]

2. SAME—DISCHARGE OF PASSENGERS—DURATION OF STOP.

Where a railroad stops its cars to allow a passenger to alight, it is bound to stop a sufficient length of time to enable him to alight in safety, and is liable for an injury to a passenger occasioned by reason of its failure so to do.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Carriers, §§ 1224, 1228.]

3. SAME—ACTION—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action against a street railroad for injuries to a passenger, evidence held sufficient to show negligence on the part of the railroad in suddenly starting the car while plaintiff was alighting.

4. TRIAL—DIRECTED VERDICTS.

The court, in passing upon defendant's prayers for a directed verdict, must assume the truth of plaintiff's testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trial, §§ 399-402.]

5. NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION OF FACT OR LAW.

The question of negligence is ordinarily one of fact and not of law, but the court may hold plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence when some prominent and decisive act of negligence has been committed by him, in regard to the character and effect of which no room is left for ordinary minds to differ.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. Negligence, §§ 279-286, 295.]

6. CARRIERS—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

A passenger was not guilty of contributory negligence per se in attempting to alight from a street car while it was moving very slowly and smoothly, but whether her act in so doing was negligent was a question for the jury under all the facts in the case.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Carriers, §§ 1391-1393, 1402.]

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, George M. Sharp, Judge.

Action by Sarah A. Weir against the United Railways & Electric Company of Baltimore. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BRISCOE, BOYD, PAGE, PEARCE, JONES, SCHMUCKER, and BURKE, JJ.

Albert E. Donaldson, for appellant. Howard Bryant, for appellee.

BURKE, J. The appellee sued the appellant company for personal injuries sustained by her when alighting from one of its cars. The narr. avers that on the 7th day of August, 1903, while the plaintiff was a passenger on one of the cars of the defendant company at or near the corner of Baltimore and Paca streets, in the city of Baltimore, and after the car had come to a full stop, the plaintiff desired to alight from said car, and proceeded to do so; but before the plaintiff could get off of the car, and while she was exercising due care and caution, the said car was negligently and prematurely started by the agents and servants of the defendant while the said plaintiff was in the act of alighting from the car, and that by such negligence and premature starting of the car the plaintiff was thrown to the ground, and thereby sustained serious and permanent injuries. The accounts given by the witnesses as to the happening of the accident are conflicting, but it is sufficient to say that, so far as the plaintiff's case is concerned, she offered evidence tending to show the following facts: That on the morning of the accident, about the hour of 11 o'clock, she was a passenger on one of the cars of the defendant company coming east on Baltimore street; that when the car reached the corner of Baltimore and Paca streets it stopped, and that she attempted to alight therefrom; that she arose from her seat, and caught hold of the handle bar, and stepped down on the footboard of the car, and was in the act of getting down from the footboard to the street, and whilst in this position the conductor rang the bell, and the car started; that the sudden starting of the car broke her hold on the handle bar, and threw her into the street; and that in consequence of being thus thrown she sustained serious injuries. The defendant offered evidence tending to prove that the car stopped at the corner of Baltimore and Paca streets, and that the plaintiff made no effort to leave the car until after it had started; that the car was in motion when she got upon the footboard, and that she was thrown when in the act of stepping to the ground from the footboard of the moving car; that the car stopped at the corner of Baltimore and Paca streets, and had just started when the accident occurred, and had hardly time to move off at any speed when the injury occurred; that it had gone a very short distance after it had started, one witness fixing the distance at 10 feet, and another at 3 or 4 feet, and all of the defendant's witnesses concurring in the statement that at the time the plaintiff stepped from the footboard and was injured the car was running smoothly and very slowly. At the conclusion of the case the appellee offered three prayers which were granted by the court, and the defendant offered five, the fourth was granted, the fifth was granted as modified by the court, and its first, second, and third prayers were refused. To the action of the court granting the plaintiff's prayers and in refusing its first, second, and third prayers, and in amending its fifth prayer the defendant excepted, and the verdict and judgment being against the defendant, it was appealed.

The bill of exceptions brings up for review only the rulings of the court on the prayers. In the argument before this court no question was made by the counsel for the appellant as to the correctness of the ruling of the court on the plaintiff's prayers. We find no error in the granting of these prayers. They announced the correct principles for the guidance of the jury in fixing the defendant's responsibility for the injury complained of, and also the correct rule for estimating the damages in case the jury should find for the plaintiff. The defendant's first and second prayers were properly refused. The first prayer asked the court to direct a verdict for the defendant, because there was no evidence in the case legally sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to recover, and the second prayer asked the court to say that the undisputed evidence in the case showed that the negligence of the plaintiff contributed to the injury of which she complained, and therefore the verdict must be for the defendant. In view of the evidence offered by the plaintiff it is clear that the court could not grant either of these prayers.

It is settled that while the carriers of passengers are not insurers of absolute safety, yet they are bound to exercise reasonable care according to the nature of their contract; and as their employment involves the safety of the lives and limbs of passengers, the law requires the highest degree of care which is consistent with the nature of their undertaking. Baltimore & Ohio R. R. v. State, Use of Hauer, 60 Md. 449. A railroad company undertaking the carriage of passengers for hire, which stops its cars for the purpose of allowing a passenger to alight therefrom is under an obligation to stop a sufficient length of time to enable him to alight in safety, and if a passenger is injured by reason of the failure of the company to observe this obligation it is liable for the injury. Cumberland Valley R. R. Co. v. Maugans, 61 Md. 53, 48 Am. Rep. 88;

United Railways Company v. Hertel, 97 Md. 382, 55 Atl. 428. Assuming the testimony of the plaintiff as to the happening of the accident to be true, and the court in passing upon these prayers was bound to assume its truth, there appears to have been, under the principles stated, a clear act of culpable negligence on the part of the defendant company.

The action of the court in rejecting the defendant's third prayer constitutes the main ground upon which it relies for the reversal of the judgment. This prayer asked the court to instruct the jury that if they found that the plaintiff "attempted to alight from the car while it was in motion, and before it came to a full stop," their verdict should be for the defendant. Under the authority of repeated decisions of this court it would have been manifest error for the trial court, under the facts as testified to by the defendant's witnesses, to have declared the plaintiff guilty, as matter of law, of negligence and want of ordinary care under the facts stated in the prayer. The question of negligence is ordinarily one of fact, and not of law. This is the general rule, but cases frequently occur in which the court will say that the plaintiff is guilty of contributory negligence when some prominent and decisive act of negligence is found to have been committed by him in regard to the character and effect of which no room is left for ordinary minds to differ. Whether it be negligence per se for one to attempt to alight from a moving car must depend always upon the circumstances of the particular case. In the case of the Cumberland Valley Railroad Company v. Maugans, supra, where a passenger on the appellant's cars was injured in alighting therefrom while the car was in motion, this court said that the weight of authority is against the proposition that it is always, as matter of law, negligence and want of ordinary care for a person to attempt to get off from a car while it is in motion; that in every case where the facts and circumstances are such that reasonable men may honestly entertain different views as to the nature and character of the act of the plaintiff, it is error in the court to pronounce the act negligence in law, but that the question should be left to the consideration of the jury. To the same effect are the cases of B. & O. R. R. v. Kane, 69 Md. 27, 13 Atl. 387, 9 Am. St. Rep. 387; New York, Phila. & Norfolk R. R. Co. v. Coubourn, 69 Md. 360, 16 Atl. 208, 1 L. R. A. 541, 9 Am. St. Rep. 430; Western Md. R. R. Co. v. Herold, 74 Md. 510, 22 Atl. 323, 14 L. R. A. 75.

It will be noticed that the prayer excludes from the consideration of the jury the question of the physical condition and activity of the plaintiff, and also all the facts and circumstances of the case as testified to by the defendant's witnesses as to the speed of the car, except the two facts that she attempted to alight from the car while it was in motion and before it came to a full stop; and if the jury should find these two segregated facts then the court was asked to say, as matter of law, there was such negligence on the part of the plaintiff as would preclude her right to recover, without regard to the other facts of the case. We are of opinion that the question of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff was properly left to the jury to determine under the instructions granted by the court upon all the facts and circumstances of the case, and that under the authority of the cases cited the prayer was properly refused. Finding no error in the ruling of the court, we affirm the judgment.

Judgment affirmed, the appellant to pay the costs.

BROWN et al. v. GRENIER.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire. Hillsborough. Dec. 5, 1905.)

1. PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS — LICENSES — VALIDITY.

Pub. St. 1901, c. 134, § 1, creates a state dentistry board consisting of three members. Section 2 provides that two members constitute a quorum for the performance of the duties of the board, and requires the board to hold at least one session a year to examine persons desiring to enter the profession of dentistry. Section 3 provides that any person may apply at a regular session of the board and be examined with reference to his knowledge of dentistry, and further provides for the issuance of licenses to such persons as upon examination are found to be qualified by the board. Held, that the powers vested in the board are of a judicial nature and can only be exercised in the presence of two of the members of the board, and an examination held by one member alone and a license issued by him, without the knowledge or approval of any other member, are void.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 10, Cent. Dig. Constitutional Law, §§ 144, 145; vol. 39, Cent. Dig. Physicians and Surgeons, §§ 3, 5.]

2. SAME — REVOCATION OF LICENSE — PROCEEDINGS.

Under Pub. St. 1901, c. 204, § 2, giving the Supreme Court general superintendence of all courts of inferior jurisdiction to prevent and correct errors and abuses, that court has jurisdiction to entertain a bill in equity to cancel a license to practice dentistry unlawfully issued by a single member of the state dental board without the knowledge and approval of the other members.

3. SAME — PARTIES.

A proceeding on behalf of the state to cancel a certificate to practice dentistry unauthorizedly issued by a single member of the state dental board can be brought only by the Attorney General, and cannot be brought by the state dental board; but such board is a necessary party defendant to the proceedings.

Transferred from Superior Court; Peaslee, Judge.

Bill in equity by Frederick H. Brown and another against Wilfred Grenier to cancel a certificate or license issued to defendant entitling him to practice dentistry. A decree was entered for plaintiffs, and defendant excepted. Transferred from the superior court upon an agreed statement of facts. Case discharged.

During the year 1902 Frederick H. Brown, George A. Bowers, and William R. Blackstone, residing and having offices, respectively, at Lebanon, Nashua, and Manchester, were the duly constituted members of the state board of registration in dentistry; Blackstone being clerk of the board. In the latter part of February, 1902, Grenier wrote Blackstone from Brockton, Mass., where he was employed in dentistry, inquiring whether the board would permit him to take examinations in French, and, if so, when. Blackstone replied that the board would allow him to take such an examination at any time, upon one week's notice to allow the board an opportunity to prepare questions. Four or five weeks afterward Grenier notified Blackstone that he would come to Manchester to be examined one week later, and at the time appointed came to Blackstone's office for that purpose. He paid a fee of $10, and at this time inquired of Blackstone where the other examiners were. Blackstone said that he superintended all examinations; that examination papers were sent to the other members to be reviewed and were afterward returned to him with their findings; and that Grenier would be advised later as to the result, and a certificate would be issued to him if he passed a successful examination. Grenier then used the English language with difficulty and was unable to take the examination in that tongue, but was duly examined by Blackstone through an interpreter. The examination consumed several days. In addition to the written examination as to his knowledge of the theory of dentistry, Grenier gave a demonstration of his ability to do practical and operative work, according to the requirement of the board. About four weeks after the examination he wrote Blackstone from Brockton, inquiring as to the result, and was informed by mail that he had passed a satisfactory examination. No certificate was sent to him. A few days later he came to Manchester to get his certificate, or to learn why one had not been sent to him. Blackstone then told him that the answers in the examination papers being in French, there was an additional expense of $50 for the review of the same by the examiners. Grenier thereupon paid $50 to Blackstone and received the certificate in question, signed by all the members of the board. According to the practice and understanding of the board, the written examination papers were submitted to and passed upon by each member, and applicants were required to present themselves at the office of each member. Brown and Bowers, for the convenience of Blackstone, had signed diplomas or certificates in blank, for issuance to such applicants as passed the examinations. Grenier's examination papers were never submitted to Brown and Bowers for approval, nor did he ever present himself at the office of either of them for examination. The examination was taken by Grenier in good faith. He is a graduate of Laval University of Montreal, at which institution he took the course in dentistry, and he also served three years as an apprentice to a well-known dentist in Montreal. Upon receipt of his diploma or certificate, he at once fitted up dental parlors in Manchester, where he has since engaged in the practice of his profession.

Branch & Branch and David W. Perkins, for plaintiffs. Aime E. Boisvert, for defendant.

BINGHAM, J. In 1891 the Legislature created the commission known as the "State Board of Registration in Dentistry." Laws 1891, p. 341, c. 43; Pub. St. 1901, c. 134. Three dentists constitute the board (chapter 134, § 1), and two members of the board constitute a quorum for the performance of its duties (section 2). It is required to hold at least one session a year for the purpose of giving examinations to persons desiring to enter the profession (section 2). Any person can apply at a regular session and be examined "with reference to his knowledge and skill in dentistry and dental surgery" (section 3). Certificates or licenses are to be issued to such persons as, upon examination, the board find to be qualified (section 3). The practice of dentistry without a license from the board, by any person other than a practicing physician who is a graduate from the medical department of an incorporated college, is made a misdemeanor punishable by a fine not exceeding $100 (sections 6, 7). It seems clear that the powers vested in the board by the act are of a judicial nature. The subject-matter which it is to pass upon is the qualification of applicants to practice dentistry. While all three of the members may hear and pass upon the question, only two are required to constitute a valid tribunal. An attempted exercise of jurisdiction by a less number is coram non iudice and void. State v. Richmond, 28 N. H. 232, 234. It is agreed that the examination of the defendant was had before a single member of the board, and that the license which he holds was issued to him without the knowledge and approval of any other member. The decision of that member, not being authorized by the statute, is void, and the same is true of the license.

The Supreme Court, as a court of general superintendence to prevent and correct errors and abuses of inferior tribunals, has jurisdiction to entertain a proceeding to correct the error disclosed by the case. Pub. St. 1901, c. 204, § 2. The objection taken by the defendant that the plaintiffs are not authorized to bring such a proceeding for the state is well founded. It can be brought only by the Attorney General, and the state board of registration in dentistry is a necessary party defendant, because it is the official action of that board as a judicial tribunal which is attacked. In its present form, the proceeding cannot be maintained, and the decree for the plaintiffs is erroneous. Should the Attorney General see fit to adopt the proceeding, the state and the state board of registration can be made parties by amendment, and the proceeding will then be a direct attack by the state upon the judgment. If this is done, it is not probable any further hearing of the facts will be required. Upon the facts found, the state will be entitled to the decree asked for by the present plaintiffs.

Case discharged. All concurred.

HAMEL v. NEWMARKET MFG. CO.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire. Rockingham. Nov. 7, 1905.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURY TO SERVANT—PROOF OF ACTIONABLE NEGLIGENCE.

A servant, suing for injuries, must show that the master failed to perform a legal duty and that the failure was the legal cause of the injuries.

2. SAME—INJURY TO SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE—FAILURE TO WARN—EVIDENCE.

Evidence in an action for injuries to an employé while assisting in repairing a broken shafting, in consequence of the shafting falling out of the boxes in which it was held by reason of the removal of the caps from the boxes by a co-employé for the purpose of enabling plaintiff and the co-employé to separate the pieces of the shafting, examined, and held to warrant a finding that the employer should have anticipated that the co-employé would remove the caps, so that the employer was negligent in failing to warn plaintiff, unskilled in the work, of the dangers arising from the removal of the caps.

3. SAME—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Whether plaintiff assumed the risk held, under the evidence, for the jury.

4. SAME—KNOWLEDGE OF SERVANT.

An employé who was not aware of the danger to which he was exposed did not assume the risk incident to the work, unless it clearly appeared that he would have known of the danger and appreciated the risk if he had used ordinary care.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 34, Cent. Dig. Master and Servant, §§ 574-581.]

5. SAME—NEGLIGENCE OF FELLOW SERVANT CONCURRENCE WITH MASTER'S NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Whether the negligence of an employé resulting in injury to a co-employé was the sole cause of the injury, or only a cause concurring with the negligence of the employer, held, under the evidence, a question for the jury.

6. SAME.

Where the evidence in an action for injuries received by an employé warranted a finding that the employer was negligent in failing to warn plaintiff of the danger, and that if that had been done the accident could not have occurred, there was evidence justifying a verdict for plaintiff, though a co-employé's negligence contributed to the injuries.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 34, Cent. Dig. Master and Servant, § 525.]

Transferred from Superior Court.

Case for personal injuries by Fred Hamel against the Newmarket Manufacturing Company. There was a verdict for plaintiff. Case transferred on defendant's exception to the denial of its motions for nonsuit and the direction of a verdict in its favor. Exceptions overruled.

The evidence tended to prove the following facts: The plaintiff, a man of ordinary intelligence, was employed as a helper in the defendants' machine shop, but was without experience in repairing shafting. January 28, 1904, a line of shafting in the defendants' boiler house broke about 4 feet from one end. The line was about 40 feet long and was suspended about 6 feet above the boilers by J hangers bolted to the roof. The defendants' master mechanic, who had charge of all machinery and the men employed to repair it, directed Kelley, a machinist, to take the plaintiff as helper and repair the break after the mill had shut down. In order to make the repairs, it was necessary to separate the broken ends of the shafting and join them with a coupling. Kelley and the plaintiff were unable to push the long piece through the boxes, because it was worn with turning and was gummed with oil. They cleaned the shafting, and being still unable to move it, they removed the caps that held it in the boxes. They then separated the broken ends, screwed a coupling to the short piece, pushed the long piece back, and inserted its end in the coupling. By Kelley's direction, the plaintiff proceeded to screw the long piece into the coupling with pipe tongs, while Kelley held a light; and at about the third turn, the shafting rolled out of the boxes and fell upon the plaintiff, causing the injuries complained of. If the caps had been replaced after the end of the long piece was inserted in the coupling, or if they had been merely loosened, the accident could not have happened. They were not replaced because Kelley thought the shafting could be safely turned without them. The shafting fell because it was out of line, or because there was some trouble with the box in the hanger farthest from the point where the men were at work. The plaintiff was free from fault at the time he was injured. Neither he nor Kelley supposed there was danger in their method of doing the work. Some one should have been ordered to watch the shafting while the others worked upon it, or enough men should have been employed to push it through the boxes without removing the caps; and if either of these precautions had been taken, the accident would not have happened.

Eastman, Scammon & Gardner and Arthur L. Churchill, for plaintiff. John Kivel and George T. Hughes, for defendants.

PARSONS, C. J. When a servant brings an action against his employer upon the ground of negligence to recover for an injury sustained in the course of his employment, he must show, to maintain such an action, that his master failed to perform a duty the law imposed on him for his benefit, and that the failure to perform it was the legal cause of his injury. One particular in which the plaintiff says the defendants failed to perform their duty toward him was their failure to inform him of the danger to which he was subjected in attempting to turn the shaft while it laid in the boxes of the hangers with the caps removed - a danger which he says he did not appreciate, and the risks attending which he consequently did not assume as a matter of law by his contract of service. If there was evidence from which the jury might find the facts thus alleged, the defendants' motions were properly denied, whether the defendants were negligent in other respects or not. Whether or not the defendants, in the exercise of ordinary care, ought to have informed the plaintiff of the danger to which he was subjected, depends in part upon the question whether they ought to have anticipated that Kelley would remove the caps; and that is a question of fact to be established, like other facts, by evidence. The fact that the shafting could have been repaired with the caps in place is evidence from which it could be found that the defendants were not bound to anticipate their removal; but it is not conclusive of that question. It cannot be said from that fact alone, when the location and condition of the shafting are considered, that an ordinary man who was familiar with it would not have anticipated that Kelley would remove the caps. So it cannot be said that it conclusively appears that the defendants ought not to have anticipated that he would remove them. It might be found, therefore, that the defendants ought to have anticipated that Kelley would remove the caps; consequently, it might be found that they should have notified the plaintiff of the danger incident to turning the shafting after their removal. But the defendants contend that, even if it could be found that the ordinary man would have notified the plaintiff of that danger, it cannot be found they were in fault, because it conclusively appears that the plaintiff would have known of the danger if he had used ordinary care to inform himself in respect to it. If he ought to have known of that danger, the law imposed no duty in respect to it upon the defendants for his benefit. Notwithstanding the plaintiff knew he would be injured if the shafting fell when he was at work, it does not follow that he ought to have known it was liable to fall if he turned it in the way he did after the caps were removed. It was lying in the boxes in which it was designed to turn. The plaintiff was unskilled in that kind of work, he was turning the shafting slowly, and there was nothing about the work or the way of doing it calculated to call the attention of such a man to the fact that the shafting was liable to roll out of the hangers if he continued to turn it. Upon these facts it does not conclusively appear that he was in fault for not knowing of the danger to which he was exposed, or, in other words, that he assumed the risk of his injury; for when, as in this case, it appears that the plaintiff was not in fact aware of the danger to which he was exposed, he will not be held to have assumed the risk incident thereto unless it clearly appears that he would have known of the danger and appreciated the risk if he had used ordinary care to inform himself in relation to it. *Miller v. The defendants contend that Kelley was negligent when he removed the caps, and that it conclusively appears that his negligence in that respect was the legal cause of the plaintiff's injury. Whether that was the sole cause, one of the concurring causes, or only the occasion, of the plaintiff's injury, is a question of fact. Ela v. Cable Co., 71 N. H. 1, 51 Atl. 281. Since it could be found that the plaintiff should have been instructed in respect to the danger, and that, if that had been done, the accident would not have happened, there was evidence to sustain the verdict, even if it is conceded that Kelley was negligent and that his negligence contributed to cause the plaintiff's injury. A servant who is injured by the concurrent negligence of his master and a fellow servant may recover from either, provided he was himself without fault. Matthews v. Clough, 70 N. H. 600, 49 Atl. 637. As there was evidence of a breach of the master's nondelegable duty to instruct the plaintiff as to the danger of the work, as a cause of the accident sufficient to authorize the submission of the case to the jury, it is not material to inquire, in the absence of any exceptions raising the question, whether the alleged negligence of the master mechanic in assigning so small a number of men to the work was the negligence of a fellow servant, as argued by the defendants, or a breach of the master's duty to furnish sufficient instrumentalities, as claimed by the plaintiff. If the defendants were found to be right in their contention on the point, the exceptions to the denial of the motions for a nonsuit and to direct a verdict could not be sustained.

Although there was evidence from which it could be found that the defendants made a settlement with the plaintiff before he brought this suit, the jury have found that no settlement was made, and there was evidence to sustain their finding. As the plaintiff had not settled with the defendants, there was no contract to be rescinded, and there could be nothing in his hands which had been paid to him in pursuance of it, and which it was incumbent upon him to return before a rescission.

Exceptions overruled. All concurred.

HANSON v. MANCHESTER ST. RY.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire. Hillsborough. Nov. 7, 1905.)

1. APPEAL—REVIEW—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where, in an action for injuries, the jury were not directed to pass on certain evidence, it would be presumed on appeal that such evidence was true, and would have established in the hands of the jury everything it tended to prove.

2. NEGLIGENCE—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE INJURIES—LAST CLEAR CHANCE—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

If a person is injured, in part by the negligence of another and in part by the insufficiency of the driver, horse, or carriage by which the person injured was being conveyed, which insufficiency was due to his own want of care in selecting them, no recovery could be had, not because the driver's negligence, or the defect in the horse, harness, or carriage, was imputable to the person injured, but because his own fault in selecting them was the proximate cause of the injury.

3. STREET RAILROADS—PERSONS IN STREET—INJURIES—LAST CLEAR CHANCE—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

Where, in spite of plaintiff's negligence in selecting an incompetent driver, defendant street car company by the exercise of care could have prevented injury to plaintiff in the position he occupied in the care of such driver, defendant's failure to do so constituted the sole cause of the injury, for which plaintiff was entitled to recover, notwithstanding his prior negligence in selecting such driver or the driver's negligence at the time of the accident.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 44, Cent. Dig. Street Railroads, § 219.]

4. SAME—INSTRUCTIONS.

Plaintiff was injured in a collision with a street car while he was being driven in a carriage by a driver claimed to have been negligent and intoxicated. There was evidence that, notwithstanding the driver's negligence and condition, the accident could have been prevented by defendant's motorman by the exercise of ordinary care, but the court charged that plaintiff's previous negligence in riding with such driver, or his misconduct in getting drunk, were not matters which would excuse defendant, if at the time of the accident plaintiff was doing all that prudence required of a person in his situation, and that in law plaintiff's prior negligence merely furnished an occasion for defendant to negligently injure him, and that its fault would be the legal cause of the accident, and the fact that the driver was drunk and was grossly negligent would be no defense; the question being, could plaintiff, at the time of the accident, have avoided the effect of the driver's fault by the use of ordinary care? Held, that such instruction was objectionable, as tending to mislead the jury in determining whether the insufficiency or negligence of the driver or defendant's failure to prevent the accident was the proximate cause thereof.

Transferred from Superior Court; Peaslee, Judge.

Action by Henry Hanson against the Manchester Street Railway. A verdict was rendered in favor of plaintiff, and the case was transferred from the superior court. Verdict set aside.

On Labor Day, 1900, the plaintiff was injured in a collision between a car of the defendant corporation and a team driven by one Reagan, with whom the plaintiff had ridden from place to place for some time prior to the accident. The plaintiff's evidence tended to show that his injury resulted from the motorman's negligent failure to stop the car. The defendant's evidence tended to show that Reagan was intoxicated, and incapable of properly driving a horse; that the plaintiff got into the wagon while Reagan was in that condition, and continued to ride with him after he had an opportunity to quit his company; that at the time of the accident Reagan was guilty of a negligent act, which contributed to cause the accident, and which might reasonably have been expected of one in his condition; and that Reagan's drunken condition was known to the plaintiff during all the time they rode together. The jury were instructed in part as follows; the defendants excepting to the portions of the charge enclosed in brackets: "In this case the road's representative was the motorman. So far as this case is concerned, if he acted with reasonable care, the defendants are free from fault; and, if he was careless, the defendants were negligent. Considering, then, all the surrounding circumstances—the nature of the vehicle being operated, the means at hand for stopping it, the amount and nature of the travel at this place, all the general surroundings, and all the special circumstances you shall find to exist in this particular case—considering all these things, ought the motorman to have done something he failed to do, and so have avoided the accident? Of course, the general rule would be that the cars should go on their way without interruption; but this does not give the road the right to wantonly or carelessly run upon persons or teams upon the track. In a case like that, or in any emergency, they are required to refrain from an exercise of their ordinary rights to such an extent as due or ordinary care requires to avoid doing injury; that is, they are bound to act with an average degree of prudence, in view of the special facts, when the emergency arises. And the sole question as to the defendants' fault is whether the car should have been stopped after the motorman saw, or ought to have seen, the horse upon the track. * * * [The plaintiff was bound to use such a degree of care as a man of average prudence would have used, situated just as the plaintiff was. It is his conduct at the time the accident happened, and while it was imminent, which is decisive. His previous negligence (if he was negligent in riding with Reagan), or his misconduct in getting drunk (if he was in that condition), are not matters which will excuse the defendants, if at the time of the accident he was doing all that prudence required of a person in his situation. So you will inquire how the average man, riding along that street in that wagon driven by Reagan, would have acted at and just before the time of the collision. Was there anything which a fair degree of prudence called upon him to then do to escape the danger? If there was not, his previous fault (if there was such fault) is of no consequence. In law such prior negligence merely furnished an occasion for the defendants to negligently injure him, and their fault would be the legal cause of the accident.] It would be a negligent act for a man to drive a nervous horse with an insecure pair of reins; but if, while so doing, and controlling the horse the best he could with the insufficient harness, he was carelessly run upon by a person who could, by due care at the time, avoid the collision, the carelessness of the man who could at the time avoid the trouble is the cause of the accident, and he is legally responsible for its results. It is for you to say whether there is anything in the facts in this case to which this rule applies. [The fact (if it is a fact) that Reagan was drunk and was grossly careless is no defense. The question still would be: Could the plaintiff at the time of the accident have avoided the effect of Reagan's fault by the use of ordinary care?] To sum up, then: The plaintiff must have proved that at the time of the accident the defendants could, and he could not, prevent the collision by the exercise of ordinary care; and if Reagan was violating the speed law, and by such act caused the collision, it must appear that the plaintiff was not a party to that crime."

Burnham, Brown, Jones & Warren, for plaintiff. Streeter & Hollis and Taggart, Tuttle, Burroughs & Wyman, for defendants.

PARSONS, C. J. The defendants' complaint is that the jury were not instructed as to the case made by their evidence. The evidence to which this complaint relates was that the plaintiff was knowingly and without necessity riding with a drunken driver, and that at the time of the accident the driver, Reagan, was guilty of a negligent act, which contributed to cause the injury, and which might reasonably have been expected of one in the condition in which Hanson knew Reagan to be. If the jury were not directed to pass upon this evidence, it must be taken, for the purposes of the case here, that this evidence was true, and would have established in the minds of the jury everything it tended to prove. That a jury might find that a man of ordinary prudence would not have continued to ride with a drunken, incompetent driver after he ascertained the fact, and that therefore such conduct was negligent, is not open to argument. They might, also, on the evidence, have found, not only that Hanson ought to have anticipated what was reasonably to be expected of one in Reagan's condition, but that in fact he did anticipate it. What this act was, or in what way it was connected with the injury, the case does not disclose. Whether it was or not a contributing cause of the injury upon the facts proved may be a question of law, but that question is not presented by the record, which states as a fact that the act did contribute to cause the injury. It is plain from the case that the distinction between negligence as the cause of the danger and negligence as the cause of the injury was present in the minds of counsel and court throughout the trial. The language of the case must have been used in its strict legal signification. In this sense Reagan's negligent act could not have been an act that "contributed to cause the injury," unless it was a proximate cause thereof; i. e., legally a part of the cause—one without which there might have been no injury.

For his own protection Hanson was bound to exercise ordinary care in the selection of a driver, horse, harness, and carriage. Plummer v. Ossipee, 59 N. H. 55, 59; Tucker v. Henniker, 41 N. H. 317; Clark v. Barrington, 41 N. H. 44. For an injury to himself, in part from the negligence of another and in part from the insufficiency of the driver, horse, or carriage, due to his own want of care, he could not recover; not because the negligence of the driver or the defect in the horse, harness, or carriage is imputed to him, but because, under such circumstances, his own fault would be a proximate cause of the injury. The doctrine of imputed negligence, and of the identification of an innocent passenger with his driver, set up in Thorogood v. Bryan, 8 C. B. 115, had the effect of preventing a recovery by a faultless plaintiff, injured by the fault of another, in disregard of the fundamental law of negligence; that he whose wrongful act has injured one without fault must pay the damage so occasioned. The authority of the case is now almost universally denied in England and in this country. Noyes v. Boscawen, 64 N. H. 361, 370, 10 Atl. 690, 10 Am. St. Rep. 410; Mills v. Armstrong, 13 App. Cas. 1. But the refusal to follow Thorogood v. Bryan in depriving an innocent plaintiff of his action has nowhere been construed to give an action to a plaintiff whose fault caused the injury. If the suit had been against the city, or against the defendants, for an injury from a previous negligent obstruction of the street, the defendants' evidence would have constituted a defense. The plaintiff's negligence in riding with an unskillful driver, whose incompetency contributed to cause the injury, would have been its sole legal cause.

The law is not affected by the presence or the absence of the parties, or by the difficulty of applying it to a complicated state of facts. But the cases present different aspects, according to the facts in proof; and a statement of the law, correct as applied to one state of facts, may be erroneous in another. He who cannot at the time prevent an injury to himself by the fault of another present and acting is legally without fault, whether his inability to protect himself is due to his absence, prior negligence, or other cause. The fault of the one who can at the time, but who does not, prevent an injury, is its sole legal cause, however the dangerous situation was created (Nashua Iron and Steel Co. v. Railroad, 62 N. H. 159, 163, 164; Parkinson v. Railway, 71 N. H. 28, 51 Atl. 268; Little v. Railroad, 72 N. H. 61, 55 Atl. 190; s. c., 72 N. H. 502, 57 Atl. 920; Yeaton v. Railroad, 73 N. H. 285, 61 Atl. 522); or, as is sometimes said, although the plaintiff is in some degree negligent, he can nevertheless recover, if the defendant, by reasonable care, could have avoided the consequences of the plaintiff's negligence (Grand Trunk Ry. v. Ives, 144 U. S. 408, 12 Sup. Ct. 679, 36 L. Ed. 485; Inland, etc., Co. v. Tolson, 139 U. S. 551, 11 Sup. Ct. 653, 35 L. Ed. 270; The Bernina, 12 P. D. 58, 61, 89). The principle is the same, whatever the language used: The plaintiff can or cannot recover, accordingly as his negligence is or is not a proximate cause of his injury. In a highway or other case, in the absence of the defendants at the time, the negligence of the plaintiff in selecting an incompetent driver, whose incompetency contributed to the injury, would be, as matter of law, a proximate cause of the injury. If the defendants were present at the time of the accident, the plaintiff could no more recover for an injury to which his negligence in the selection of a driver, through the incompetency of the driver, contributed, than if they were absent. If, in spite of the negligence of the plaintiff in selecting a driver, the defendants by care could have prevented injury to the plaintiff in the position he occupied in the care of an incompetent driver, their failure to do so would be the sole cause of an injury which the plaintiff at the time could not prevent. Whatever the driver may have done would be immaterial, because care on the part of the defendants would have prevented the injury. Their negligence would have been its sole cause, to which neither the prior negligence of the plaintiff nor the recklessness of the driver would have contributed in a legal sense. Such was the theory of the instructions to the effect that the negligence of the plaintiff furnished merely the occasion of the injury, and that the reckless conduct of Reagan was no defense. These instructions, which were excepted to, amount to a ruling that, as matter of law, the act of Reagan, of which the defendants offered proof, was not a proximate cause of the injury. Such ruling may be correct, and generally would be so. It would plainly be incorrect if Reagan's act was in fact a proximate cause of the injury. The instructions given as to the defendants' care were correct.

If it were found that the defendants were in fault because the motorman did not stop the car as soon as he ought, under all the circumstances of the case, and thereby failed to avoid the injury, the instructions as to the plaintiff's fault were also correct, because in such case a negligent act of Reagan's, which the defendants ought to have foreseen, or in spite of which the motorman ought to have prevented the injury, could not have been its proximate cause. But, while the instructions as a whole were technically correct, the plain tendency of those above recited (to which exception was taken), together with the omission to refer to Reagan's conduct on the question of the defendants' care, was to cause the jury to understand that the plaintiff's negligence in being with a drunken driver, and the latter's careless conduct at the time, were entirely immaterial, and were not to be considered by them at all in the case. They were told that the fact that Reagan was grossly careless was no defense. His acts at the time were competent for consideration on the question of the motorman's care, might be entirely decisive, and could in ordinary language be spoken of as a complete defense.

Upon the whole case the tendency of the instructions to mislead the jury appears so plain that it is probable justice may not have been done, and that there ought to be a new trial.

Verdict set aside.

BINGHAM, J., did not sit. The others concurred.

WHEELER v. TOWN OF GILSUM.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire. Cheshire. Dec. 5, 1905.)

1. TOWNS—LIABILITY FOR ACT OF HIGHWAY AGENT.

A town is not liable for injury to property through the negligence of its highway agent in blowing up ice in a river, under the direction of a selectman, for the purpose of draining water from a highway; his act being that of a public officer in the performance of his duty.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 25, Cent. Dig. Highways, § 315; vol. 45, Cent. Dig. Towns, § 79.]

2. SAME—NUISANCE CREATED BY HIGHWAY AGENT—DUTY TO REMOVE.

Where a highway agent of a town, under the direction of a selectman, for the purpose of draining water from a highway, negligently blows up ice in a river, creating a nuisance, threatening destruction of a mill, the town is under no duty to remove the nuisance, so as to make it liable for its failure to do so for destruction of the mill therefrom.

Exceptions from Superior Court; Peaslee, Judge.

Action by Lester R. Wheeler against the town of Gilsom. A nonsuit was ordered, and plaintiff excepted. Exceptions overruled.

Case, for negligence. March 2, 1902, the plaintiff owned and occupied a sawmill on the bank of the Ashuelot river. On that day an ice jam in the river above the mill caused the water of the stream, increased by surface water accumulating from rain and melted snow, to overflow a highway in the town of Gilsom, preventing travel thereon. A highway agent of the town, under the direction and control of one of the selectmen, went upon the river outside the highway and attempted to break up the ice with dynamite, so that the water might drain off from the highway. The work was negligently done, with the result of increasing the water in the highway above the jam and of weakening the ice, so that it subsequently broke up, and the water and ice flooded, crushed, carried away, and practically destroyed, the plaintiff's mill. The town, through its officers and citizens, had notice of, and could have removed, the danger to the plaintiff's property created by the negligent attempt to break up the ice. The expense of what was done was borne by the town. The plaintiff was without fault. After the opening statement by plaintiff's counsel of the grounds upon which recovery was claimed, in substance as above set forth, a nonsuit was ordered, and the plaintiff excepted.

Arthur J. Holden and Robert A. Ray, for plaintiff. Charles H. Hersey and Cain & Benton, for defendant.

PARSONS, C. J. In repairing the highway under the direction of the selectmen (Laws 1897, p. 59, c. 67, § 1), the highway agent was a public officer, for whose negligent acts in the performance of his duty the town is not liable. O'Brien v. Derry, 73 N. H. 198, 60 Atl. 843; Hall v. Concord, 71 N. H. 367, 52 Atl. 864, 58 L. R. A. 455; Downes v. Hopkinton, 67 N. H. 456, 40 Atl. 433; Wakefield v. Newport, 62 N. H. 624; Grimes v. Keene, 52 N. H. 330. The principle under which a town may be liable for an injury to private property rights by an abuse of its possessory right in the highway, permitting an unreasonable use of the land to the injury of another (Clair v. Manchester, 72 N. H. 231, 55 Atl. 935; Flanders v. Franklin, 70 N. H. 168, 47 Atl. 88; Gilman v. Laconia, 55 N. H. 130, 20 Am. Rep. 175), has no application. The plaintiff's injury was not occasioned by an unreasonable use of the town's property right, made or permitted by the town. The dangerous condition in the river was due to natural causes, or to their action combined with the negligence of public officers. These causes created a nuisance which threatened alike the property of the town and that of the plaintiff. The nuisance was not within the highway, nor was it connected therewith in any way. It did not consist in anything appurtenant to the highway, which the town used for the benefit of its highway property, though without the limits of the highway. If the town could rightfully go without the limits of the highway to abate the nuisance created by the elements and the action of the highway agent, which threatened injury to its highway property, and would be liable to the plaintiff for an injury resulting from a negligent exercise of such right by the town, the power to abate such nuisance was merely a right which the town had for its own benefit, not a duty imposed upon it for the benefit of the plaintiff. As no duty rested with the town to act for the protection of the plaintiff, its failure merely to take action is not actionable negligence. Buch v. Manufacturing Co., 69 N. H. 257, 44 Atl. 809, 76 Am. St. Rep. 163; McGill v. Granite Co., 70 N. H. 125, 46 Atl. 684, 85 Am. St. Rep. 618.

Exception overruled. All concurred.

ASH et al. v. McLELLAN.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. Dec. 23, 1905.)

1. PAYMENT—VOLUNTARY PAYMENT—RECOVERY BACK.

When one with a full knowledge of all the facts, or with means of knowledge, voluntarily pays money under a claim of right, he cannot maintain an action to recover it back.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 39, Cent. Dig. Payment, §§ 253-266.]

2. SAME—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

When one demands money under a claim of right, and uses no other means to obtain it than importunity, or a threat, expressed or implied, of resort to litigation to obtain it if it is not voluntarily paid, and the one of whom the money is demanded has time for consideration and deliberation, and to obtain the advice of counsel or friends, and the money is then voluntarily paid to settle the demand, it cannot be recovered back, though the demand is illegal and unjust.

3. SAME.

Held, that in the case at bar the payment by the plaintiffs was a voluntary payment and cannot be recovered back.

(Official.)

Exceptions from Supreme Judicial Court, Hancock County, at Law.

Action by Nathan Ash and others against William H. McLellan. On exceptions by plaintiff. Overruled.

Money had and received to recover back money paid by the plaintiffs to the defendant. Previous to this action, the plaintiffs were sureties on a "poor debtor's" bond, dated August 30, 1902, given by one George R. Robinson, a judgment debtor, who had been arrested on execution, and on the 20th day of June, 1903, they as sureties on said bond, paid to the defendant, who was then the legal owner of the judgment on which the execution was issued, $190 in settlement of bond and execution. September 29, 1903, the plaintiffs demanded of the defendant the return of the $190 so paid to him, and upon his refusal to return the money this action was brought to recover it back. The action was heard at the October term, 1903, of the Supreme Judicial Court, Hancock county, before the presiding justice, with the right to except. The presiding justice ruled that the defendant was entitled to judgment, and ordered judgment accordingly. Thereupon the plaintiffs excepted.

Argued before WISWELL, C. J., and WHITEHOUSE, STROUT, and SPEAR, JJ.

E. S. Clark, for plaintiffs. Wm. H. McLellan and A. W. King, for defendant.

STROUT, J. Carter recovered a judgment against George R. Robinson. This judgment was duly assigned to the defendant McLellan, who became its legal owner. McLellan sued the judgment, and recovered a new judgment in Carter's name for $145.82 debt and $9.93 costs at the April term, Supreme Judicial Court, 1896. Upon an execution upon this judgment, dated August 30, 1902, McLellan caused the debtor Robinson to be arrested, and the debtor gave bond to take the poor debtor's oath as provided by statute. The plaintiffs were sureties on that bond. Upon notice to Carter, Robinson did in fact take the poor debtor's oath on January 24, 1903, and thus performed the condition of his bond, but McLellan had no knowledge of this fact from any source. After expiration of the time limited in Robinson's bond, McLellan, believing the condition had not been performed and that the sureties were liable, called upon them for payment. Robinson at that time was in the employment of the plaintiffs, and they saw him daily, and were indebted to him to some amount, which at the end of the season amounted to something over $200.

Upon the call for payment by McLellan of the plaintiffs, Mr. Ash, one of the sureties, and one of the plaintiffs, wrote him asking for his best terms, to which McLellan replied that he "would send the execution and bond fully discharged for $190, the sureties paying the deputy sheriff." This was less than the amount due. Thereupon plaintiffs sent McLellan check for $190, and received back the bond and execution against Robinson fully discharged.

September 29, 1903, the plaintiffs demanded of McLellan the return of the money paid him, but made no offer to return the bond and execution at any time until after the hearing of this suit to recover the money. They obtained what they paid for, not only their discharge from the bond but the discharge of the judgment against Robinson. If for any cause they had the right to rescind or recover back the money paid, it was indispensable that they should have returned or offered to return the bond and execution before suit brought. But instead of that they retained the discharged execution and sued to recover the money paid therefor. Failing to do this, this action cannot be maintained.

But, waiving this technical defense, and treating the case as one of a voluntary payment upon an honest claim of right by Mc-

Lellan, though in fact unfounded, it would be expected that when the plaintiffs were asked to respond for the default of Robinson, the principal in a bond on which they were sureties, they would have called his attention to it, and asked him to make payment, or at least for authority to apply to that purpose the amount in their hands due to him, but instead of this the case finds that "neither Mr. Ash nor Mr. Marcyes made any inquiry of Mr. Robinson about the matter, and sent the check without consulting him and without his knowledge, fearing he would leave if told of the matter, and they desired to have his wages accumulate to that amount." The payment was in no sense compulsory. Plaintiffs knew all the facts that McLellan knew, and had excellent opportunity to learn that Robinson had taken the oath provided for in the condition of his bond. They intentionally refrained from consulting him, though he was in their employ and they saw him daily, for the purpose "to have his wages accumulate" to the amount. Both parties believed there was a legal liability of plaintiffs. The true principle applicable in such cases is stated by Walton, J., in Parker v. Lancaster, 84 Me. 515, 24 Atl. 952, to be that "when one demands money under a claim of right, and uses no other means to obtain it than importunity and persistency, or a threat, expressed or implied, of resort to litigation to obtain it, if it is not voluntarily paid, and the one of whom the money is demanded has time for consideration and deliberation, and to obtain the advice of counsel or friends, and the money is then voluntarily paid to settle the demand, it cannot be recovered back, though the demand is illegal and unjust." Early in May, 1903, McLellan wrote the deputy sheriff in regard to forfeiture of the bond, and to notify the sureties. This letter was read to plaintiffs, who then wrote the defendant for his terms. McLellan replied June 16th, and the check was not sent till June 20th. The plaintiffs therefore had ample time for consideration.

The rule of law quoted from Parker v. Lancaster is supported by Norris v. Blethen, 19 Me. 351, and Gooding v. Morgan, 37 Me. 419. In the latter case, Chief Justice Shepley says: "The law is regarded as settled in this state, if one with a full knowledge of the facts, or with the means of knowledge, voluntarily pays money under a claim of right, that he cannot recover it back." To the same effect is Norton v. Marden, 15 Me. 45, 32 Am. Dec. 182. See, also, Gilpatrick v. Sayward, 5 Me. 465; Rawson v. Porter, 9 Me. 119; Wilson v. Barker, 50 Me. 447.

The plaintiffs had at hand the means to learn all the facts by an inquiry of their servant daily seen by them. It was inexcusable, almost culpable negligence not to consult him before making the payment. They intentionally refrained from doing this from an ulterior motive insufficient to justify their nonaction. In such case they should be charged with knowledge of what they might easily and ought to have learned, and ought not to be permitted to take advantage of their self-imposed ignorance. This doctrine is sustained by East Haddam Bank v. Scovill, 12 Conn. 310; Behring v. Somerville, 63 N. J. Law, 568, 44 Atl. 641, 49 L. R. A. 578; Stevens v. Head, 9 Vt. 174, 31 Am. Dec. 617; West v. Houstin, 4 Har. (Del.) 170; Simmons v. Looney, 41 W. Va. 738, 24 S. E. 677; Harner v. Price, 17 W. Va. 545, as well as by the cases in this state, supra. There are opposing decisions but we are satisfied with the rule settled in this state.

By making this payment and obtaining a discharge of the execution, without informing themselves of the fact of the disclosure of Robinson, the plaintiffs placed the defendant in a worse position than he would otherwise have been, since they thereby prevented his enforcing his execution against the judgment debtor in some of the ways that were still open to him. A suit in which the plaintiffs could have been summoned as trustees would apparently have secured all or a large part of the debt, as the plaintiffs owed Robinson at the end of that season over $200.

A majority of the court is of the opinion that the ruling below that judgment should be for the defendant is correct, and the entry must be:

HEWEY v. METROPOLITAN LIFE INS. CO.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. Dec. 6, 1905.)

1. INSURANCE—APPLICATION SIGNED IN BLANK—WHEN APPLICANT IS BOUND BY STATEMENTS.

An application for a policy of life insurance was signed in blank by the applicant, and delivered in this condition to the agent of the defendant company, with the understanding that the agent should fill in the answers to the questions from information contained in a previous application for insurance, which had been made out in the applicant's presence and signed by him. The second application, as filled out by the agent, was forwarded to the company, and the policy in suit was issued thereon and afterwards delivered to the applicant, now deceased, and was accepted by him.

Held that, if the agent of the company filled in the second application in accordance with the terms of the first one, then the applicant would be bound by it; but if the agent filled in the second application with answers that were not contained in the first one, or put them in differently from what they were in the first, then the applicant would not be bound by them, because they would be the answers of the agent, and not the answers of the applicant.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 28, Cent. Dig. Insurance, §§ 998–1003.]

2. SAME—CONSTRUCTION OF APPLICATION.

It is a sound rule of law that an application for life insurance, signed in blank by one desiring insurance, and filled in by the company or its agents, should be construed more favorably to the applicant.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 28, Cent. Dig. Insurance, §§ 294, 295, 1001, 1002.]

3. SAME—SUCCESSIVE APPLICATIONS—IDENTITY OF ANSWERS.

Upon an analysis of the two applications the most that can be said with respect to their identity is that, if the applicant had read or been personally interrogated with respect to the questions and answers in the second application, he might have answered the same as he did in the first, and he might have answered in an entirely different way. The answers in the second application cannot, therefore, be said to be such necessary inferences from those contained in the first as to be regarded as a statement of the applicant, and therefore binding upon him.

4. SAME—AVOIDANCE OF POLICY—MISREPRESENTATIONS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In order to defeat the claim of a person insured, who has paid the consideration required for the insurance received, upon the ground that the insured made misrepresentations as to the risk in his application, it is incumbent upon the company to show that the misrepresentations were his, and not mistakes or misrepresentations of its own.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 28, Cent. Dig. Insurance, § 1650.]

5. SAME—APPLICATION—PREPARATION BY INSURER.

When an insurance company or its agents undertake to fill in an application from a previous application or statement made by the applicant it should be held to the strictest adherence to the terms of such application or statement made; otherwise, it would be in the power of the company or its agents in such a case to fraudulently destroy the legal status of the policy so obtained.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 28, Cent. Dig. Insurance, §§ 998–1003.]

Exceptions from Supreme Judicial Court, Androscoggin County, at Law.

Action by Annie J. Hewey against the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings exceptions. Exceptions overruled.

Argued before EMERY, STROUT, PEABODY, and SPEAR, JJ.

Harry Manser, for plaintiff. White & Carter, for defendant.

SPEAR, J. This is an action on the case upon a policy of life insurance. The deceased made an application for a policy for $1,000 in the defendant company, which was dated October 18, 1902, followed by a medical examination the same day. This application was filled out by an agent of the company in the presence of the deceased from information furnished by him, and was then signed by him and witnessed by the agent. The company declined to write a policy on the class applied for, but intimated that it would write one of a different class to the amount of $500. Upon this information Robert Hewey, the deceased, signed a new application on the 8th day of November, 1902, in which the answers to the questions had not been filled in, and delivered it in this condition to the agent of the defendant company, with the understanding that the agent should fill in the answers to the questions from the information contained in the first application, which had been made out in Hewey's presence and signed by him. There was no new medical examination at the time the second application was made. The second application, as filled out by the agent, was forwarded to the company, and the policy in suit was issued thereon and afterwards delivered to Robert Hewey, the deceased, and was accepted by him. Upon this branch of the case the court instructed the jury as follows: "So that in this case any answer in this second application, assuming that Mrs. Hewey's statement is true, that they left it as she says, and that the agents were to fill in the blanks from the old application, or from the knowledge which they got in the old application, so far as they filled in those blanks in accordance with the old application, they would then be filling in the blanks for him, and the answers made would be his answers, because that was what he agreed to do. But so far as they filled in the application with answers that he had not made in the old application, put in things that were not referred to in the old application, put them in differently from what they were in the old application, then he would not be bound by them, because they would be the answers of the agent, and not the answers of Mr. Hewey." This is undoubtedly the correct statement of the law governing this case, and, as we understand, is so conceded by the defendants. The two applications upon which the above instruction was based contained, among other questions and answers, the following, which are material in this case:

"(6 A) Name and residence of your usual medical attendant. Dr. H. H. Cleveland. (6 B) When and for what have his services been required? 9 mos. ago. Cold. (7) Have you consulted any other physician? If so, when and for what? No, except as in No. 3." No. 3, referred to, is as follows: "(3) Give full particulars of any illness you may have had since childhood, and name of medical attendant or attendants. Grippe, 4 yrs. ago. Dr. J. A. Leader." The second application contained the following: "(5) The following is the name of the physician who last attended me, the date of the attendance, and name of the complaint for which he attended me: Dr. Cleveland; Feb. 1902; grippe. (6) I have not been under the care of any physician within two years, unless as stated in previous line, except none."

Dr. Cleveland testified that he treated the deceased in the winter of 1902 at Hewey's home for a bad cold or grippe. He also testified that subsequent to this treatment, and prior to the making of the first application, on October 18, 1902, he treated Hewey at his office for liver disease. The defendant contended that the answers to questions

5 and 6 in the second application were fully authorized by the statements made by Hewey in answer to questions 6 and 7 in the first application, and that the facts testified to by Dr. Cleveland, if true, constituted a breach of the warranty contained in the second application as to the truth of the facts therein stated. The plaintiff contended that the answers to questions 5 and 6 in the second application were not authorized by the facts stated in the first application, and hence were not the answers of the deceased, and were not binding upon him or upon this plaintiff.

Upon the comparative identity in meaning of the two applications the court, having analyzed them, charged the jury as follows: "I think, gentlemen, upon comparing these two applications, I shall instruct you thus: If you find it to be true, as Mrs. Hewey says, that that answer, with the others, was agreed to be filled in from the old application, and if, having the old application, they attempted to fill it in from that, but filled it in the way which they did, it was an unauthorized answer—that is to say, there is nothing in the former application with reference to Dr. Cleveland which made this answer true or proper; and therefore it was not his answer. It was the answer which the agent put in. The answer referred to by the court was number 5 in the second application."

It is to this instruction, that the answers in the second application are not warranted from those contained in the first, that the defendants particularly object, and say: "The court should have instructed the jury that the answers in the second application were fully authorized from those made in the first, and that, if they were untrue, the plaintiff could not recover." In this class of cases we think it a sound rule of law that an application for life insurance, signed in blank by one desiring insurance, and filled in by the company or its agents, should be construed more favorably to the applicant. Upon this view of the law the construction of the presiding justice should be sustained. The question in the first application, "name and residence of your usual medical attendant, when and for what have his services been required," and the assertion contained in the second, "the following is the name of the physician who last attended me, the date of the attendance, and name of the complaint for which he attended me," cannot be fairly construed to mean one and the same thing, or to require one and the same answer. If we were to stop right here, the two inquiries might elicit entirely different answers. The "usual medical attendant" might not be "the physician who last attended the applicant." He might be ill, in need of medical attendance, and a variety of causes intervene to make it impracticable or even impossible for him to secure the services of his usual physician, and consequently be under the necessity of employing some other physician. If this occasion happened to be the last time he needed medical attendance before making an application for insurance, then it is clear that the last medical attendant was not the usual one. But a fair analysis of the two applications requires us to go further. These questions and answers in the first application in the form of a statement are as follows: "My usual medical attendant is Dr. Cleveland. He attended me nine months ago for a cold. I have not consulted any other physician since childhood for any illness, except Dr. Leader four years ago for grippe."

In the second application the applicant is made to say Dr. Cleveland was the physician who last attended him, the date was February 9, 1902, and the complaint for which he attended him was grippe; also, that he had not been under the care of any physician within two years, unless as stated in the previous answer.

Now the defendants contend that, by the observance of the proper rules of logic to their interpretation, the two applications mean precisely the same thing. They say that the first application shows that Dr. Cleveland attended the applicant in 1902, and was the only physician that had attended him for four years, as stated in No. 3. If he was the only physician, he must necessarily have been the last one, as stated in the second application. Also, that the answer numbered 6, that he had not been under the care of any physician for two years, was fully authorized by the statement in the first application that Dr. Cleveland's services had been required only for the cold or grippe in the winter, and, further, that he had not even consulted any physician for four years, except Dr. Cleveland at the time he had this cold or grippe. If we admit that by the defendant's process of reasoning the above conclusions may be drawn, yet, is the applicant to be subjected to the test of reasoning by the process of induction and deduction in order to make the application made by the company agree with the application made by himself?

But the logical conclusions are not necessarily true. A different conclusion may also be drawn. In the first application he says he has not consulted any physician. In the second, filled in by the agent, he is made to say: "I have not been under the care of any other physician," etc. "Consulting" a physician and being "under the care" of a physician, not only in the technical use of the terms, but to the common mind, may mean very different things. A man may consult a physician without ever being under his care at all. To consult is defined: "To apply to for direction or information; ask the advice of—as to consult a lawyer; to discuss something together; to deliberate." Care is defined: "Responsibility, charge or oversight, watchful regard and attention." Hence the first answer might, in the mind of the applicant, be correct, and the second one not. We think the most that can be said with respect to the identity of the two applications is that, if the applicant had read or been personally interrogated with respect to the questions and answers in the second application, he might have answered the same as he did in the first, and he might have answered in an entirely different way. The answers in the second application cannot therefore be said to be such necessary inferences from those contained in the first as to be regarded as the statement of the applicant, and therefore binding upon him. In order to defeat the claim of the person insured, who has paid the consideration required for the insurance received, upon the ground that the insured made misrepresentations as to the risk in his application, it is incumbent upon the company to show that the misrepresentations were his, and not mistakes or misrepresentations of their own. When an insurance company or its agents undertake to fill in an application from a previous application or statement made by the applicant, it should be held to the strictest adherence to the terms of such application or statement made; otherwise, it would be in the power of the company or its agents in such a case to fraudulently destroy the legal status of the policy so obtained.

Exceptions overruled.

RAYMOND v. PORTLAND R. CO.
(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. Dec. 6. 1905.)

1. CARRIERS—INJURIES TO PASSENGER—CARE REQUIRED—INSTRUCTIONS.

The plaintiff was a passenger on one of the street railway cars of the defendant. There was evidence tending to show that the car, an open one, had come to a stop near the point of intersection with the tracks of a steam railroad, that it was the practice and custom of the defendant to stop there, but that the only purpose of the stop was to safeguard the crossing of said tracks; it not being a place where a stop was regularly made for passengers to get off or on the defendant's cars, although it was also in evidence that passengers did sometimes get off or on the cars while so stopping. There was likewise evidence tending to show that, while the car was stopping at said point of intersection, the plaintiff undertook to alight therefrom, but that while she was in the act of alighting, and before she had reasonable time to alight, the car was started, whereby she was thrown and injured.

At the trial of this action the presiding justice, at the request of the plaintiff's counsel, gave the following instruction to the jury: "If you believe that this was the crossing of tracks, and that under the practice and custom of the company the cars stop at this crossing, and believe that people get on or off at this place while cars are stopped, then it was the duty of the conductor in charge of the car to ascertain for himself whether passengers wanted to get on or off; and if he could by great care discover who wanted to get off, whether they wanted to get off, that would be equivalent to actual knowledge on the subject."

2. SAME—"GREAT CARE."

This instruction imposed upon the conductor the duty of exercising "great care" to discover if any one wanted to get off the car. It is not modified by any other clause in the charge, but rather emphasized by a statement made immediately before it that "the railroad was bound to use greater than ordinary care."

The law requires that the conductor should have acted only in the exercise of reasonable care. The phrase "great care," as used in the instruction, was without limitation. It was left entirely to the jury to say what meaning should be attached to it. Under it the jury may have said that it was the duty of the conductor to inquire of every passenger upon his car if they wished to alight, and that if he failed to do this, in the exercise of the duty requiring "great care," he was negligent; or, if so strenuous a duty as to inquire of each passenger was not deemed necessary in the exercise of "great care," the jury might have found that some other burdensome duty was imposed by the instruction given.

3. NEGLIGENCE — CARE REQUIRED — DEFINITION.

The rule of law now generally recognized by the great weight of authority is that the legal measure of duty, except that made absolute by law, with respect to almost all legal relations, is better expressed by the phrases "due care," "reasonable care," or "ordinary care," terms used interchangeably. "Reasonable care" may be defined as such care as an ordinarily reasonable and prudent person exercises with respect to his own affairs, under like circumstances. In this definition it is the phrase "under like circumstances" that imposes upon the term "reasonable care" both its limitations and its elasticity. The term is a relative one. The same act under one set of circumstances might be considered due care, and under different conditions a want of due care, or negligence. Therefore the duty intended by the use of the phrase "ordinary care" is always referable to the circumstances and conditions, under which the act or omission to act is required to be performed. These limit or define the scope of the situation within which the performance of the same act may be called reasonable or unreasonable. Held, that the exceptions to the requested instruction given as aforesaid must be sustained.

Exceptions from Supreme Judicial Court, Cumberland County.

Action on the case by Ada I. Raymond against Portland Railroad Company for negligence, to recover for personal injuries to the plaintiff while a passenger on one of the cars of the defendant, a street railway corporation. Verdict for plaintiff for $969. Defendant excepted to a certain instruction given by the presiding justice at the request of the plaintiff's counsel, and also filed a general motion for a new trial. Exceptions sustained. Motion not considered.

Argued before EMERY, STROUT, SAVAGE, and SPEAR, JJ.

Charles E. Gurney, for plaintiff. Libby, Robinson, Turner & Ives, for defendant.

SPEAR, J. This is an action on the case for negligence to recover for personal injuries to the plaintiff while a passenger on one of the cars of the defendant, a street railway corporation. The case comes up on motion and exceptions. It was alleged in the plaintiff's declaration, and evidence was introduced by the plaintiff tending to show that the defendant's car had been brought to a full stop near the tracks of a steam railroad, and that the car was started again while the plaintiff was in the act of alighting therefrom, and before she had had sufficient and reasonable time to alight, whereby she was thrown and injured.

The defendants offered evidence tending to show that the car, an open one, had come to a stop near the point of intersection with the tracks of the steam railroad; that it was the practice and custom of the defendants to stop there, but the only purpose of the stop was to safeguard the crossing of the said tracks, it not being a station or place where a stop was regularly made for passengers to get off the defendant's cars, although it was in evidence that passengers did sometimes get off or on the defendant's cars there; that throughout the stop the conductor of the car remained upon the car, and was standing all the time on the running board on plaintiff's side of the car, but a few feet behind her, and with his attention upon his passengers of whom he had an unobstructed view; that another employé of the defendant's left the car and went forward to see if the crossing could be made in safety, and, upon finding the way clear, gave the signal for the car to proceed; that the plaintiff never made any movement to leave her seat until the car was again in motion after having made its stop to safeguard the crossing of the tracks, when, without giving any indication by signal or otherwise to the conductor or anybody else that she desired or intended to alight, she suddenly slid down from her seat to the running board, and thence off the car while it was in motion and gathering headway to cross the tracks of the steam railroad. The report of the evidence shows that the contention of the respective parties as above set forth is correctly stated.

Upon these contentions, at the request of the plaintiff's counsel, the presiding justice gave the following instruction to the jury: "If you believe that this was the crossing of tracks, and that under the practice and custom of the company the cars stop at this crossing, and believe people get on or off at this place while cars are stopped, then it was the duty of the conductor in charge of the car to ascertain for himself whether passengers wanted to get on or off; and, if he could by great care discover who wanted to get off, whether they wanted to get off, that would be equivalent to actual knowledge on the subject." To this instruction the defendants seasonably excepted. The defendants also requested certain instructions, but, in view of the conclusion necessarily arrived at with respect to the above instruction, it becomes unnecessary to consider this request by the defendants. We think the exception must be sustained. The instruction imposed upon the conductor the duty of exercising "great care" to discover if any one wanted to get off the car. This instruction is not modified by any other clause in the charge, but rather emphasized by the statement made immediately before it that "the railroad was bound to use greater than ordinary care."

We think the law required that the conductor should have acted only in the exercise of reasonable care. The phrase "great care," as used in the instruction, was without limitation. It was left entirely to the jury to say what meaning should be attached to it. They may have said that it was the duty of the conductor to inquire of every passenger upon his car if they wished to alight, and that, if he failed to do this in the exercise of the duty requiring "great care," he was negligent. Or, if so strenuous a duty as to inquire of each passenger was not deemed necessary in the exercise of "great care," the jury might have found that some other burdensome duty was imposed by the instruction given.

The rule of law now generally recognized by the great weight of authority is that the legal measure of duty, except that made absolute by law, with respect to nearly all legal relations, is better expressed by the phrases "due care," "reasonable care," or "ordinary care," terms used interchangeably. "Reasonable care" may be defined as such care as an ordinarily reasonable and prudent person exercises with respect to his own affairs, under like circumstances. In this definition it is the phrase "under like circumstances" that imposes upon the term "reasonable care" both its limitations and its elasticity. The term is a relative one; that is, the same act under one set of circumstances might be considered due care, and under different conditions a want of due care or negligence. Therefore the duty intended by the use of the phrase "ordinary care" is always referable to the circumstances and conditions under which the act or omission to act is required to be performed. These limit or define the scope of the situation within which the performance of the same act may be called reasonable or unreasonable. The same rule is now generally held to apply to employment in the most perilous places and in the manipulation and use of the most dangerous agencies. A person may be engaged upon a most treacherous machine, yet the employer is held only to the exercise of reasonable care in explaining the hazard connected with the machine and the operation of it. One may employ the use of dynamite or any other powerful explosive, and yet he is responsible only for due care. But in each of these cases due care, under the flexibility of the definition given, might, in the minds of the jury or of the court, require the exercise of the highest possible care which human effort could bestow; but yet it would be in the end only such care as an ordinarily prudent and careful man would exercise, under like circumstances, with respect to his own affairs.

Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) vol. 21, p. 459, under the heading "Degrees of Negligence," summarizes the authorities as follows: "The theory that there are three degrees of negligence, described as 'slight,' 'ordinary,' and 'gross,' was introduced into the common law from some of the commentators of Roman law. While not in frequent use, references are still found in judicial discussions of the subject to the classification of negligence into degrees, the tendency of modern authority and the weight of the best considered cases are now opposed to this view, holding that in every case negligence, however described, is merely a failure to bestow the care and skill which the situation demands, and hence it is more accurate to call it simply negligence. Some decisions even go further and declare that the classification of negligence into degrees is a matter of pure speculation and of no practical consequence; that it is useless and tends to confusion; that in fact it is unsafe to base any legal decision on distinctions in the degrees of negligence."

In Steamboat New World v. King, 16 How. 469, 14 L. Ed. 1019, Mr. Justice Curtis, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The theory that there are three degrees of negligence, prescribed by the terms 'slight,' 'ordinary,' and 'gross,' has been introduced into the common law from some of the commentators of the Roman law. It may be doubted if these terms can be usefully applied in practice. Their meaning is not fixed or capable of being so. One degree, thus described, not only may be confounded with another, but it is quite impracticable exactly to distinguish them. Their signification necessarily varies according to circumstances, to whose influence the courts have been forced to yield until there are so many general exceptions that the rules themselves can scarcely be said to have a real operation." Then he proceeds to quote from Storer v. Gowen, 18 Me. 177, as follows: "How much care will in a given case relieve a party from the imputation of gross negligence, or what omission will amount to the charge, is necessarily a question of fact, depending upon a great variety of circumstances which the law cannot exactly define."

In Perkins v. New York Central Railroad Company, 24 N. Y. 196, the court say: "I think with Lord Deuman, who, in Hinton v. Dibbin, 2 Q. B. 661, said: 'It may well be doubted whether between gross negligence and negligence merely any intelligent distinction exists.'" delivering the opinion of the court, said: "We have already adverted to the tendency of judicial opinion adverse to the distinction between gross and ordinary negligence. * * * And this seems to be the tendency of modern authors."

In Railroad Company v. Lockwood, 17 Wall. 382, 21 L. Ed. 627, Mr. Justice Bradley,

In Milwaukee Railroad Company v. Arms et al., reported in 91 U. S. p. 494, 23 L. Ed. 374, the court say: "This court has expressed its disapprobation of these attempts to fix the degree of negligence by legal definition. * * * Some of the highest English courts have come to the conclusion that there is no intelligent distinction between ordinary and gross negligence. * * * 'Gross negligence' is a relative term. It is doubtless to be understood as meaning a greater want of care than is implied by the term 'ordinary negligence'; but after all it means the absence of the care that was necessary under the circumstances." See, also, Rouse v. Downs, 5 Kan. App. 549, 47 Pac. 982; McPheeters v. Hannibal, etc., R. Co., 45 Mo. 22; Reed v. Western Union Tel. Co., 135 Mo. 661, 37 S. W. 904, 34 L. R. A. 492, 58 Am. St. Rep. 609; Culbertson v. Holliday, 50 Neb. 229, 69 N. W. 853.

It will be here observed that the courts in discussing the above propositions have used the term "negligence," instead of the word "care," to express the measure of duty. But confusion has arisen from regarding "negligence" as a positive, instead of a negative, word.

For this reason, it is usual to express the duty owed in positive terms by stating what constitutes "due care," rather than in negative terms by stating what constitutes "negligence," which is the unintentional failure to perform a duty implied by law. "Negligence" is the opposite of "due care." Where due care is found, there is no negligence. If there is a want of due care, then there is negligence. We are inclined to agree with the great weight of judicial opinion that the attempt to divide negligence, or its opposite due care, into degrees, will often lead to confusion and uncertainty. It seems to us, therefore, that the measure of duty, owed by persons in the discharge of their mutual relations, would be better expressed by the use of the term "negligence," if one prefers a negative definition, or due, reasonable, or ordinary care, always having reference to the circumstances and conditions with regard to which the terms are used. In view of the above conclusion, it becomes unnecessary to consider the motion.

Exceptions sustained.

HEINTZ et al. v. LE PAGE et al.
(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. Dec. 8, 1905.)

1. INTOXICATING LIQUORS—DEFINITION.

Section 40, c. 29, Rev. St. 1903, reads as follows: "No person shall at any time, by himself, his clerk, servant or agent, directly or indirectly, sell any intoxicating liquors, of whatever origin, except as hereinbefore provided. Wine, ale, porter, strong beer, lager beer and all other malt liquors, and cider when kept or deposited with intent to sell the same for tippling purposes, or as a beverage, as well as all distilled spirits, are declared intoxicating within the meaning of this chapter; but this enumeration shall not prevent any other pure or mixed liquors from being considered intoxicating."

Held, that any liquor, containing alcohol, which is based on such other ingredients or by reason of the absence of certain ingredients that it may be drunk by an ordinary person as a beverage and in such quantities as to produce intoxication, is intoxicating liquor. If its composition is such that it is practicable to commonly and ordinarily drink it as a beverage, and drink it in such quantities as to produce intoxication, then it is intoxicating liquor within the meaning of the statute.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 29, Cent. Dig. Intoxicating Liquors, § 142.]

2. SAME—ACTION FOR PRICE.

An action for the price of intoxicating liquors sold contrary to the laws of this state cannot be maintained in the courts of this state.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 29, Cent. Dig. Intoxicating Liquors, §§ 474-479.]

3. SAME—KNOWLEDGE OF VENDOR.

It is immaterial whether the plaintiffs had any knowledge for what purpose the liquors were purchased, if they were in fact intoxicating liquors and intended by the purchasers for illegal sale in this state.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 29, Cent. Dig. Intoxicating Liquors, § 476.]

(Official).

Assumpsit by John C. Heintz and others against Francis Le Page and others on account annexed to recover $770 for "Paragon Malt Extract" sold and delivered by the plaintiffs, residents of the state of New York, to the defendants, residents of Maine, October 21, November 5, and December 19, 1903, the entire quantity being 60 barrels, containing 800 dozen, or 9,600, bottles. Tried at January term, 1905, Supreme Judicial Court, Penobscot county. Plea, the general issue, with a brief statement alleging "that the claim or demand in the above-entitled case is wholly for intoxicating liquors sold in violation of chapter 29, § 64, Rev. St. Me. 1903, and in violation of chapter 27, § 56, Rev. St. Me. 1883, then in force at the time said liquors were purchased."

Verdict for plaintiffs for $770. Defendants then filed a general motion for a new trial. Sustained.

Argued before EMERY, STROUT, SAVAGE, POWERS, PEABODY, and SPEAR, JJ.

Bertram L. Fletcher, for plaintiffs. H. H. Patten, for defendants.

SPEAR, J. This is an action of assumpsit to recover the sum of $770 on the following account: "1903, Oct. 21. To Mdse., $210. Nov. 5. To Mdse., $420. Dec. 19. To Mdse., $210. $840." The first charge in this account was for 20 barrels, 200 dozen, Paragon Malt Extract. The second charge was for 40 barrels, 400 dozen, Paragon Malt Extract.

The third charge was for 20 barrels, 200 dozen, Paragon Malt Extract. In other words, from the 21st day of October, 1903, to December 19, 1903, a little less than two months, the plaintiffs in this case sent to the defendants at Millinocket, Me., 60 barrels, containing 800 dozen (9,600) bottles of Malt Extract, and claim that it was sold and delivered for medicinal use by the inhabitants of this village. The defendants pleaded the general issue to the plaintiffs' declaration, and for a brief statement in defense claimed "that the goods they purchased were intoxicating liquors, sold out of this state with the intention that they should be sold in this state in violation of chapter 29, § 64, Rev. St. 1903, which reads as follows: 'No action shall be maintained upon any claim or demand, promissory note or security contracted or given for intoxicating liquors sold in violation of this chapter or for any such liquor purchased out of the state with the intention to sell the same or any part thereof in violation thereof; but this action shall not extend to negotiable paper in the hands of a holder for a valuable consideration and without notice of the illegality of the contract.'" The undisputed facts, regardless of the testimony of witnesses, show conclusively that the plaintiffs knew that these malt extracts were intoxicating. We have no doubt that they were compounded as a subterfuge to avoid the effect of the prohibitory law of this state. The claim that they intended the sale of 9,600 bottles of this extract for medicinal use only in the village of Millinocket and vicinity is utterly absurd. The quantity alone, under the circumstances, is sufficient to convince us that these extracts were intended to be sold as a beverage, and not as a medicine. The other evidence in the case, if any was needed, thoroughly confirms this view. The plaintiffs' salesman admits that he told the defendants, "so long as they sold malt extract as a medicinal preparation, with the cork intact, that it would be selling it just as safe as anything that they had in their store." Why this advice, if the agent did not know that this preparation was intoxicating? What difference could it make, if it was not intoxicating, whether the cork was intact or not? But this was not all. Six witnesses testified without contradiction that they drank these very goods, and five of them that they became intoxicated on them, and the other that he had seen many people get drunk on them.

It also appeared by the testimony of Prof. Knight, called by both the plaintiffs and defendants, that an analysis of several bottles of this extract showed that it contained from 4.89 per cent. to 5.05 per cent. of alcohol. The defendants were also compelled to pay a United States internal revenue tax. This liquor was sold by the bottle and glass, and the testimony shows that one person could drink two or three bottles at a time. From the testimony we should infer that it was drank practically the same as lager beer and ale. Over 300 bottles were sold on one Fourth of July. The justice presiding charged the jury as follows, with respect to what constituted intoxicating liquors: "So I repeat, any liquor, containing alcohol, which is based on such other ingredients or by reason of the absence of certain ingredients that it may be drank by an ordinary person as a beverage and in such quantities as to produce intoxication, is intoxicating liquor. If its composition is such that it is practicable to commonly and ordinarily drink it as a beverage, and to drink it in such quantities as to produce intoxication, then it is intoxicating liquor." Under this definition, which is entirely accurate, and the evidence in this case, we hardly see how any question can be raised as to the intoxicating quality of the malt extract for which the plaintiffs seek to recover. The evidence indisputably shows that it could be drank in any quantity up to two or three bottles, and by everybody who wanted to drink it, and that it produced intoxication. It seems to us very clear that the plaintiffs must, when they sold these large invoices of goods, have understood the purpose for which they were bought.

It is, however, immaterial whether the plaintiffs had any knowledge for what purpose these extracts were purchased, if they were in fact intoxicating liquors and intended by the purchasers for illegal sale in this state. Knowlton v. Doherty, 87 Me. 518, 33 Atl. 18, 47 Am. St. Rep. 349.

GOODWIN v. INHABITANTS OF CHARLESTON.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. Dec. 11, 1905.)

SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS—TUITION EXPENSES—PAYMENT BY FATHER—RECOVERY BY CHILD.

Under the provisions of section 63, c. 15, Rev. St., a minor, residing with his father, who never undertook to make any contract in his own behalf respecting his tuition at a school attended by him, and who personally incurred no legal indebtedness, made no expenditure, and sustained no loss, cannot maintain an action against a town to recover the amount voluntarily paid as tuition for him to such school by his father.

(Official).

Exceptions from Supreme Judicial Court, Penobscot County.

Action by Frank W. Goodwin, by his next friend, against the inhabitants of Charleston, to recover money paid by plaintiff's father as tuition for plaintiff, a minor residing with his father, as a pupil in school. Verdict for defendant, and plaintiff excepts. Exceptions overruled.

Argued before WISWELL, C. J., and EMERY, WHITEHOUSE, STROUT, and PHABODY, JJ.

Taber D. Bailey, for plaintiff. P. H. Gillin, for defendant.

WHITEHOUSE, J. It is provided by section 63, c. 15, of the Revised Statutes, that "any youth who resides with a parent or guardian in any town which does not support a free high school giving at least one four years' course properly equipped and teaching such subjects as are taught in secondary schools of standard grade in this state may, when he shall be prepared to pursue such four years' course, attend any school in the state which does have such a four years' course and to which he may gain entrance by permission of those having charge thereof, provided said youth shall attend a school or schools of standard grade which are approved by the state superintendent of public schools. In such case the tuition of such youth, not to exceed thirty dollars annually for any one youth, shall be paid by the town in which he resides as aforesaid."

The plaintiff was a minor of the age of 17 years, residing with his father in the defendant town of Charleston, which did not maintain a free high school giving at least one four years' course. During the school year 1902-03, the plaintiff attended the Higgins Classical Institute in Charleston, a school of standard grade, approved by the State Superintendent of Schools. According to the practice prevailing in that institution, he was permitted to enter and pursue his studies through his freshman year without any certificate of qualification from the school committee of the town. On the 26th day of December, 1903, the plaintiff took an examination before the school committee of the town, but failed to receive from that board a certificate of qualification to enter Higgins Classical Institute. Notwithstanding this fact, by permission of those having charge of the Institute, the plaintiff entered upon his second, or sophomore, year in that school and maintained "good rank" in his studies during the fall and winter terms of that year. Although requested, the town officers refused to pay the plaintiff's tuition for these two terms, and the amount was thereupon paid to the Institute by the plaintiff's father. This action was brought in the name of the plaintiff, by his next friend, to recover from the town the amount thus voluntarily paid by his father. The presiding justice ruled that this action in the name of the plaintiff was not maintainable, and ordered judgment for the defendant. The case comes to this court on exceptions to this ruling.

It is the opinion of the court that the ruling of the presiding justice was correct. Whether or not under the provisions of the statute above quoted the Higgins Classical Institute could have maintained an action to recover the tuition of a pupil who was thus permitted to enter the school without a certificate of qualification from the school committee, if the amount had not been paid by the pupil's father, and whether under the same circumstances the father could have maintained an action against the town in his own name for the tuition thus paid by him, are questions not now before the court. The only question now presented for determination is whether this action brought in the name of the pupil himself, by his next friend, can be maintained to recover from the town the amount of the tuition voluntarily paid to the Institute by his father, and our conclusion is that the situation disclosed by the evidence constitutes no legal basis for the plaintiff's action. He was a minor, and never undertook to make any contract in his own behalf respecting his tuition at the Institute. He personally incurred no legal indebtedness, made no expenditure, sustained no loss, and acquired no right of action. The entry must therefore be:

Exceptions overruled.

GERARD v. IVES et al.

(Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut. Jan. 4, 1906.)

1. WILLS—CONSTRUCTION—"HEIRS"—PERSONS INCLUDED.

The word "heirs," in a devise for life with remainder to the devisee's heirs, was, in the absence of anything to the contrary, used in its ordinary legal sense, and could not be construed as meaning either the children of the devisee or her heirs living at the death of testator.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 49, Cent. Dig. Wills, §§ 1090, 1093.]

2. PERPETUITIES—FUTURE CONTINGENT ESTATES.

A devise for the use of a devisee for life with remainder to the devisee's heirs was void, under the statute against perpetuities in force in 1871, in so far as the attempted disposition of the remainder was concerned.

3. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—DISTRIBUTION—EFFECT.

A will directed that a portion of the estate be held by a trustee to pay the income to a devisee during her life with remainder to her heirs. In making distribution in the probate court, the distributors consulted the devisee and her son, and no appeal was taken from the distribution. There was no agreement that the son took any interest, save such as he took by the will; and the devisee and her son supposed and claimed subsequently that the son had a remainder, and testator stated to the son that he had a remainder. Held that, the son as a matter of law having taken no interest under the will, he obtained no interest by the distribution.

4. COURTS—PREVIOUS DECISION IN SAME CASE—EFFECT.

Where a demurrer to a complaint was overruled, the court as a matter of law on the final trial was not required to follow the decision on the demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 13, Cent. Dig. Courts, § 340.]

Appeal from Superior Court, New Haven County; Edwin B. Gager, Judge.

Suit by George L. Gerard against Marie E. Ives, as administrator, and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

William B. Stoddard and John K. Beach, for appellant. Harrison Hewitt, for appellees.

TORRANOE, O. J. The contest in this case relates to the ownership of a lot of land in New Haven, fronting on Chapel street. The plaintiff is the son of Eunice Louise Beecher, and he claimed in effect that under the will of his mother's aunt, Sarah L. Maltby, the life use of said land was given to his mother, and the remainder in fee to himself. The defendants claim (1) that the clause of said will purporting to dispose of said land to the plaintiff and his mother is void as to him; (2) that consequently he has no interest of any kind in said land; and (3) that whatever interest his mother had therein now belongs to the defendants, under the decision of this court in the case of Ives v. Beecher, 75 Conn. 564, 54 Atl. 207. The plaintiff also claims that, if he has no interest in said land under said will, he has such an interest under the distribution of Mrs. Maltby's estate, and the facts found with reference to the acts and conduct of the distributees thereunder.

The complaint was brought under the provisions of the statute (Gen. St. 1902, § 4053) relating to actions to settle the title to land, and one of the prayers for relief is for a judgment that the plaintiff is the owner in fee of said land, subject to his mother's life use. The court held upon the facts found that the plaintiff had no interest in said land, and rendered judgment to that effect; and whether it erred in so doing is the general question in the case. The following is a somewhat condensed statement of the facts found: Mrs. Maltby died in 1871, and her will was probated in October of that year. At the time of her death she owned the land here in question. Her sole heir at law was her sister, Mrs. Garfield, who died intestate in March, 1872, before Mrs. Maltby's estate was distributed. Mrs. Garfield's heirs at law were Nathaniel and John, her sons, Mrs. Beecher, a daughter, and Josephine L. Hazleton Hill, a child of a deceased daughter. In May, 1872, the estate of Mrs. Maltby was settled and distributed. That part of the will of Mrs. Maltby under which the plaintiff claims title reads as follows: "All the real estate that I inherited from my late father, Nathaniel Lyon, I give, devise, and bequeath as follows, to wit: * * * one-fourth part to Henry White, Esq., of New Haven, in trust and confidence that he will annually pay over the rents, issues, interest, and profits thereof to Eunice Louise Beecher, wife of George H. Beecher, my niece, during her natural life; and then and after her decease

I give, devise, and bequeath the said fourth part to her lawful heirs forever." That part of the distribution of the estate of Mrs. Maltby that is claimed to have some bearing upon the questions involved in this case reads as follows: "We have set to Henry White, in trust for Eunice Louise Beecher, * * * during her life, and after her decease to her heirs," certain property described in the distribution, including the land in question.

In making said distribution, the distributors consulted with Nathaniel Garfield and Mrs. Beecher, and endeavored to set out to the distributees such parcels of the estate as would be satisfactory to them, and no appeal was taken from the distribution. "There was no discussion between the distributors and distributees as to the form of said distribution, or of the ultimate effect of the language of the will and of the distribution upon the course of title to the land in question, and such distributors and distributees all endeavored and intended to carry the provisions of the will of Sarah L. Maltby into effect in accordance with the terms thereof, and substantially in the language of the will. There was no agreement, consent, or understanding by the parties interested in said distribution that the plaintiff should by said distribution take any interest in the estate of said Sarah L. Maltby, or in any of the property of said estate, except such interest as he might take by virtue of the will of said Sarah Lyon Maltby at the expiration of the life estate of his mother, should he survive her." Mrs. Beecher is now over 80 years old, and the plaintiff, her son by a deceased husband, and the only child she ever had, is now about 64 years old. When Mrs. Maltby's will was executed in 1853, the plaintiff was about 13 years old, and his mother was then about 34 years old, and married to her present husband. Mrs. Beecher and the plaintiff have always supposed and claimed that she had only a life estate in the land in question, and that he owned the remainder in fee, and none of the other devisees under the Maltby will, and none of the legal representatives of Mrs. Garfield, ever claimed any interest in said land, or that it belonged to the estate of Mrs. Garfield. In February, 1873, Henry White executed a lease of the land in question to Mrs. Beecher and her husband, and immediately thereafter Mrs. Beecher and the plaintiff took possession of said land, and neither White nor his successors in said trust have since then ever had actual possession or charge of said property. For more than 20 years the plaintiff, as agent of his mother in the management of her life interest, has been in possession of said land, and during that time Mrs. Beecher, at her own expense, erected a valuable brick building upon said land. "The said Sarah L. Maltby for many years prior to her death often met this plaintiff, and they were upon very friendly terms, and she told this plaintiff that she had provided by her will that this plaintiff's mother, the said E. Louise Beecher, was simply to have a life estate in one-fourth of Mrs. Maltby's estate, and that this plaintiff would receive by her will the remainder."

Upon the facts found the plaintiff made these two claims of law: "(1) That under the provisions of the will of Sarah L. Maltby this plaintiff obtained a vested title at the death of Sarah L. Maltby in the property in question, subject to the life estate of his mother, E. Louise Beecher; (2) that by virtue of the distribution and of the proceedings of the probate court this plaintiff obtained a title in fee simple to this property in question, subject to the life use of the said E. Louise Beecher."

The first of these claims is founded upon these words of the will hereinbefore quoted, namely: "One-fourth part to Henry White, * * * in trust and confidence that he will annually pay over the rents, issues, interest, and profits thereof to Eunice Louise Beecher * * * during her natural life; and then and after her decease, I give, devise, and bequeath the said fourth part to her lawful heirs forever." The plaintiff claims that the words "her lawful heirs," as used in the above quotation, should be held to mean either "children" of Mrs. Beecher, or the lawful heirs of Mrs. Beecher, living at the death of Mrs. Maltby. This claim is not tenable. In its primary and technical meaning in our law, the word "heirs" is used to express the relation of persons to some deceased ancestor; and when it is used in a will, as here, to point out legatees or devisees, its primary legal meaning should be given to it, unless it is clearly shown by legitimate evidence that the testator used it in a different sense. This is the settled rule of construction in this state. Gold v. Judson, 21 Conn. 616; Rand v. Butler, 48 Conn. 293; Leake v. Watson, 60 Conn. 498, 21 Atl. 1075; Jackson v. Alsop, 67 Conn. 249, 34 Atl. 1106; Ruggles v. Randall, 70 Conn. 44, 38 Atl. 885. We are of opinion that the claim of the plaintiff as to the meaning of the word "heirs" finds no support in the will itself, or in the facts found relating to the circumstances under which it was made, and that said word must here be given its primary and technical meaning. This being so, it necessarily follows under the repeated decisions of this court from the case of Rand v. Butler, 48 Conn. 293, down to that of Buck v. Lincoln, 78 Conn. 149, 56 Atl. 522, that the attempted disposition by will of the remainder interest in the land in question here was void and of no effect, by virtue of the statute against perpetuities, so-called, in force when Mrs. Maltby died. We are therefore of opinion that the plaintiff took no interest whatever in the land in question under the will of Mrs. Maltby.

The next question is, has he any interest in said land by virtue of the distribution of the estate of Mrs. Maltby and the facts found with reference to the acts and conduct of the distributees thereunder? No distribution of real estate devised can be made under the devise to one not within the terms of the devise. No distribution of real estate devised can be treated as an original source of title. It simply declares those to be benefited by the devise and the extent of that benefit. There is nothing, therefore, in the suggestion that, as the former statute of perpetuities affected only "estates given by deed or will," it did not affect distributions. If the plaintiff has any interest in the lands in question, it must be under the will of Mrs. Maltby. The plaintiff likens this case to that of Ward v. Ives, 75 Conn. 598, 54 Atl. 730, but the facts in the two cases differ widely. In Ward v. Ives all the parties interested in the final settlement, in 1886, of the estate of a man who died intestate in 1859, entered into what was termed a "family arrangement" to have their respective rights settled and determined by probate proceedings in the form of a distribution to themselves directly, instead of through the immediate heirs of said intestate, and this arrangement was carried out. The land distributed under said arrangement to Mabel I. Stevens, a granddaughter of the intestate, was made subject to the life use of her father, as tenant by the curtesy, when, in fact, he had no such estate therein, and was a burden thus imposed upon the land to which it was not legally subject. Under the distribution so made and accepted by the court of probate the parties entered into the possession of their respective shares, and ever thereafter continued to hold them under it. Under it Mabel and her father entered into possession of the land set to her. They lived together upon the land, he taking to himself, under a claim of right as tenant by the curtesy, all the rents and profits of said land, and she asserting no claim to the contrary, and apparently fully satisfied with the distribution as made. This continued until she died intestate, and without issue, in 1898. After her death those interested in her estate claimed the rents and profits collected by her father, claiming as tenant by the curtesy from the time of her death; but this court held that they were not entitled to do so, because she, with full knowledge, had by her conduct agreed to abide by the family arrangement, and that those claiming under her as against her administrator could claim no right which she had elected to waive and abandon.

In the case at bar the distribution was not made pursuant to any such family agreement. It was made by order of the court of probate in the orderly settlement of the estate, and not to carry out any arrangement made by the distributees. They were not consulted as to the form or the effect of it; and there was between them "no agreement, consent, or understanding" that the plaintiff should take, by the distribution, any interest in the land in question, "except such interest as he might take by virtue of the will"; and nothing was set out to the plaintiff by name. In setting out the land here in question, the distribution follows the language of the will, and allots to the trustee of Mrs. Beecher just what the will gives him for her, and to her heirs at her decease just what the will gives them, and, as in legal effect the will gave them nothing, it follows that nothing was set to them or to the plaintiff by the distribution. Under these circumstances, and upon the facts found with reference to the acts and conduct of the distributees subsequent to the distribution, it cannot be said that the distributees here waived or abandoned any right in favor of the plaintiff, or that he has acquired as against them or their creditors any right or interest in or to the land in dispute.

It may be added that the distribution neither names nor, as things now stand, embraces the plaintiff. "Nemo est hæres viventis." Before the trial of the case upon its merits a demurrer to the complaint had been overruled by the court (Thayer, J.), and upon the final trial the plaintiff claimed that the court below was bound to follow the decision upon the demurrer, and the failure of the court to do so is assigned for error. This claim and assignment are without merit; for as matter of law the court was not bound to follow the prior ruling upon the demurrer (Wiggin v. Federal Stock & Grain Co., 77 Conn. 507-516, 59 Atl. 607), and in the view we have taken of the case the demurrer and the ruling upon it become of no importance.

There is no error. The other Judges concurred.

In re NICHOLS.

(Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut. Dec. 15, 1905.)

1. WILLS—MENTAL CAPACITY—UNDUE INFLUENCE—EVIDENCE.

In a will contest, evidence considered, and held to justify a finding that testator possessed sufficient mental capacity to make the will and was not induced to execute it by undue influence.

2. SAME.

Where testator executed a will in 1890, that he was insane prior to 1869 and again became so in 1902, after the commencement of proceedings for the appointment of a conservator over him, and that he was always of weak intellect and never understood the effect of a family settlement, afford no legal reason why he might not have had a sufficient mental capacity to execute the will.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 49, Cent. Dig. Wills, § 66.]

3. JUDGMENT—RES JUDICATA—ISSUES.

The appointment of a conservator of a testator in 1903, on the ground that he was mentally incapable of bringing suit for setting aside certain conveyances, after a finding that he had from an early period of his life been mentally unsound in varying degrees, and that he was insane prior to 1872 and since then had been incapable of understanding or managing business or property affairs of any consequence, was not conclusive as an adjudication on the question of testator's capacity to execute a will in 1890, as such question was not within the issues and was not involved in the adjudicated facts.

4. SAME—FINDINGS OF FACTS.

Facts not made a part of the judgment or the record, but found only for the purpose of enabling an appeal to be taken, are not adjudicated facts, binding in a subsequent action between the same parties.

5. WITNESSES—CROSS-EXAMINATION.

Where, in a will contest, an attesting witness testified that testator was of sound mind at its execution, it was error to exclude questions on cross-examination as to how many years he had been identified in business relations with testator, as to what opportunities he had for forming an opinion as to his mental soundness, and what his experience with testator had been.

6. APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

The exclusion of proper questions to a witness is not sufficient ground for reversal, where the witness was subsequently examined fully on the subject.

7. WITNESSES—REDIRECT EXAMINATION.

Where a witness testified on cross-examination that a brother or testator had a characteristic similar to testator, it was error to exclude, on redirect examination, a question as to the brother's mental condition when he manifested such peculiarities.

8. EVIDENCE—OPINIONS.

Where a witness testified to conversations between testator and his brother concerning the execution of the will and that the testator in certain matters deferred to his brother's judgment, it was proper to permit him to be asked whether there was any act or statement of such brother indicating coercion or attempt to influence testator.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fairfield County; Alberto T. Roraback, Judge.

Application by Susan W. Nichols for the probate of a will of Samuel W. Nichols, deceased. From a judgment of the superior court, reversing a decree of the probate court approving the will, the contestant appeals. Affirmed.

Stiles Judson, for appellant. Alfred S. Brown and Goodwin Stoddard, for appellee.

HALL, J. The testator, Samuel W. Nichols, died in 1903, 69 years of age, unmarried, leaving a will executed December 11, 1890, containing but two provisions: One giving all his property absolutely to his brother, Alexander, and his sister, Susan W. Nichols, in equal proportions, and upon the death of either before that of the testator, to the survivor; and the other appointing said devisees, respectively, executor and executrix of the will. Said Susan W. Nichols is the proponent of the will, and the appellant from the decree of the court of probate refusing to approve the will. The appellee contesting the will is Georgie B. Wentz, a niece of the testator. The testator and his brothers and sisters, Alexander, George, John, William,

Charles, Effingham, Susan W., and Maria, were the children of Samuel and Susan N. Nichols. Said Susan N. Nichols died in 1872, and by her will gave, upon the death of her husband, which occurred in 1880, to eight of her children, not including Charles, as tenants in common, two pieces of real estate in the city of New York, one known as the "Maiden Lane and Liberty Street property," hereafter referred to as the "Maiden Lane property," and the other as the "Cedar Street property"; to John, Susan W., and Maria, the homestead at Greenfield Hill in this state; and charged each of her six sons, who were such devisees, with the payment of $2,500, when they should become entitled to the income of the property devised to them, such sum of $15,000 to be held by George, Effingham, William, and Alexander in trust for the support of Charles during his life; and, upon his death, without issue, the unexpended residue to be distributed among his surviving brothers and sisters.

One of the brothers having conveyed his interest in the Maiden Lane and the Cedar Street properties to another of the brothers, the remaining seven tenants in common, in March, 1877, united in a conveyance of said properties, subject to the life estate of their father, and to said charge of $15,000, to George, Effingham, Alexander, Susan W., and Maria, as joint tenants, who, in 1882, conveyed the same properties through an intermediate conveyance to Effingham, Alexander and Susan W., as joint tenants, subject to said charge of $15,000; the consideration named in said deeds being a nominal sum, and other good and valuable consideration. In 1888, said three joint tenants conveyed the Cedar Street property to the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York for the consideration of $80,000; and, in 1902, Susan W., who by the death of Alexander and Effingham had become the sole owner of the Maiden Lane property, sold it for $140,000. By conveyance from John and Maria, Susan W. became in 1885 the sole owner of the Greenfield Hill property. Charles died in November, 1892, in a retreat for the insane, and in the following month his six brothers and two sisters signed a document, which was duly recorded, acknowledging payment of their respective distributive shares of said $15,000, and releasing the trustees from liability respecting it.

The testator studied law and was admitted to the bar of New York state prior to 1858, in which year he became an inmate of an insane retreat, where he remained until 1869, when he was discharged, improved. Thereafter, until near the time of his death, he lived with the family at Greenfield Hill, consisting of Susan W., Alexander, and John, and during a considerable portion of the time, also of William and Effingham and their families. The premises upon which they lived consisted of about two acres of land with a house upon it, until in 1894, when 25 acres of adjoining land was purchased by Susan W. and a new house built upon it. The testator and his brother John continued, of their own choice, to occupy the old house, taking their meals in the new one at the table with the rest of the family. Respecting his manner of life and deportment during this time the trial court finds these facts: The testator presided at the table, was gentlemanly and refined in his deportment, affectionate in his treatment of his brothers and sisters, and neat in his person and attire, and in the care of his room. He occupied himself with gardening, transacted business intelligently, read the daily papers and current magazines, the books in his father's library, and periodicals relating to farming and gardening, and discussed intelligently and interestingly the daily events, and the subjects of which he had read. During the winter he spent much of his time in New York, at the home of one of his brothers, remaining there several months at a time, always going to and about the city unattended. The household bills were paid by Susan W., or by Effingham or Alexander, and the testator was never charged anything for his support. His resources consisted of a legacy from his father of $5,000, which he lost in speculative investments.

In 1890 the testator began to talk about receiving his share of his mother's estate, and on the 10th of December of that year went to the office of Effingham, who was a lawyer in New York, and had general charge of the family property and financial matters, and met him and Mr. Brown, the family attorney, by appointment, and discussed with them the amount which he should receive as his share. The Cedar Street property had then been sold for $80,000, and the Maiden Lane property was then valued at $60,000. There was an indebtedness from the testator to Effingham, which the latter proposed should be canceled, and that the testator should further receive certain railroad bonds which Effingham then had as the consideration of a release of his interest in his mother's estate. On the following day the testator stated the number of said bonds which he claimed, to which Effingham assented, and the testator thereupon executed a release to Effingham, Alexander, and Susan W., of all his interest in his mother's estate, for the stated consideration of $11,265, made up of the value of said bonds, and said indebtedness of the testator to Effingham, with interest to that date of $1,265. The testator thereafter received the income from these bonds until he loaned the certificate of deposit of the trust company which held them, which certificate he never again recovered. It did not appear that the testator received any other consideration for said deeds, and releases of his interest in his mother's estate or any other payment of his share of the rent of the Maiden Lane property amounting to $4,000 or $5,000 a year, than said sum of $11,265 and the care and support which he received from his brothers and sisters.

On said 11th of December, 1890, after signing said release, the testator went into a room apart from Effingham and duly executed the will in question, which was produced and read and explained to him by said Brown, and had been prepared in accordance with the previously expressed intention of the testator, and of the execution of which and of his settlement with Effingham he subsequently informed several members of his family. Thereafter the testator continued the same course of life without any apparent change until March, 1902, when the appellee George B. Wentz applied to the court of probate for the appointment of a conservator over him, alleging in her petition that from mental derangement he had become incapable of managing his affairs. The court of probate denied the application, but, upon an appeal to the superior court a conservator was appointed in January, 1903. The appeal from that judgment to this court, entitled "Wentz's Appeal from Probate," is reported in 76 Conn. 405, 58 Atl. 625. After having testified in those proceedings upon being subpoenaed as a witness by this appellee, the testator failed mentally and physically until in May, 1903, it became impossible to take care of him at home, and he was removed to a sanitarium, where he died in the following September. He left little estate of value. John, Maria, and Susan W. are the only living children of said Samuel and Susan N. Nichols.

The said George B. Wentz is a daughter of William Nichols by his first wife, who was divorced from him in 1870, and the appellee has since lived with her mother, and the relations of herself and her mother with the brothers and sisters of her father have not been friendly. The conservator so appointed upon her application, commenced an action against Susan W. Nichols, which was pending at the time of the testator's death, for an accounting, and for a restitution to the testator of his interest in said New York real estate. Upon these facts the trial court held that the testator, at the time he executed the will in question, possessed sufficient mental capacity to make said will; that he was not induced to make it by the undue influence of Effingham and Susan W. Nichols, as alleged in the appellee's reasons for contesting the will, and reserved the decree of the court of probate refusing to admit said will to probate. Assuming for the moment that no mistake was made in the rulings upon evidence, the facts found fully justify the decision of the trial court, unless a different conclusion was compelled by the judgment in Wentz's Appeal.

The fundamental test of the capacity of the testator to make the will in question is whether his mind and memory were sound enough to enable him to know and understand the business in which he was engaged when he executed the instrument claimed to be his will. Sturdevant's Appeal, 71 Conn. 392-401, 42 Atl. 70. The fact that he was insane prior to 1899; that he again became so after his niece brought him before the courts in 1902-03 in the proceedings for the appointment of a conservator over him; that he was always of weak intellect, and never fully understood the purpose and effect of the family arrangement by which the New York property was conveyed to certain of his brothers and sisters as joint tenants in 1877, or of the deeds and releases which he signed, furnishes no legal reason why he might not have been found to have had sufficient capacity to make this will on the 11th of December, 1890. Kimberly's Appeal, 68 Conn. 428-438-440, 36 Atl. 847, 37 L. R. A. 261, 57 Am. St. Rep. 101. The will is a very simple one, and carries upon its face no evidence that it is the product of an unsound mind. It disposes of all the testator's property by a single provision. The two devisees are a brother and sister of the testator with whom he had lived, and by whom he had been cared for during most of his life, and are two of the three joint tenants to whom the New York property had been conveyed by the other brothers and sisters. The history of the testator's life, and the circumstances under which the will was made, as narrated in the finding, indicate sufficiently clearly that when the testator executed his will he understood what property he was possessed of; that he was making a disposition of it to take effect after his death; and that he appreciated to whom he was giving it, and to whom he ought to give it. The facts are entirely consistent with the conclusion that there was no undue influence exercised over the testator. It does not appear that Effingham could have received any benefit from the will as it was made, or that Susan W. Nichols attempted in any way to induce the testator to make such a will, or was present when it was made or executed, or had any knowledge of it until afterward. Having found that it was shown by a preponderance of evidence that there was no undue influence, the court was not required to state upon whom it considered the burden of proof to have rested upon that question. The adjudication in Wentz's Appeal was not conclusive upon the question of the testator's capacity to make this will. That question was not within the issues of that case, nor was it involved in the adjudicated facts.

It appears by paragraph 27 of the finding of facts that the files and records of the superior court in Wentz's Appeal, including the finding of facts made in that case for the purpose of an appeal to this court, were admitted in evidence, against the appellant's objection, for the purpose of showing that the mental condition of the testator in January, 1903, was in issue, and what it then was and as evidential of his mental condition when the will was executed. They are attached to, and made a part of the finding in this case. It appears by the judgment file in that case, dated January 8, 1903, that Susan W. Nichols, the appellant in this case, appeared to defend said application, and that the court found the allegations of said application true, and appointed a conservator over the testator as an incapable person. The following is a part of the finding of facts in Wentz's Appeal, made by the trial judge in that case for the purpose of an appeal to this court. "Said Samuel [W.] Nichols has, ever since an early period of his life, been mentally unsound in varying degrees. * * * He was insane and an inmate of an insane asylum for a considerable number of years, 7 to 10, prior to 1872. Since 1872, he has been for the most part orderly and tractable, but during all of said time he has been, and still is, incapable of understanding or managing business or property affairs of any consequence, intricacy, or importance. * * * Neither John nor Samuel are wasteful or spendthrifts; they are capable of doing or managing the petty ordinary details and affairs of their every day lives in the circumstances in which they are now placed; they are not capable of managing any matters involving any business responsibility or judgment, or such affairs as may be involved in attempting to set aside any conveyances herein referred to or conducting suits for an accounting in connection therewith." As these particular facts were a part of the finding in Wentz's Appeal, which had been made a part of the finding in this case, it was unnecessary that they should be repeated as a part of paragraph as requested by the appellee.

The trial court having ruled that it was conclusively decided by the judgment in Wentz's Appeal that the testator by reason of mental derangement was, on the 8th of January, 1903, incapable of managing his affairs, and was then a proper subject for a conservator, was not required to rule specifically upon the appellee's claim that the judgment in Wentz's Appeal was an adjudication that the testator was incapable of making a will on that date. If that judgment were to be regarded as in effect such an adjudication, the judgment in the present case, that the testator was of sufficient mental capacity to make a will in 1890, does not conflict with one that he was incapable of making 13 years later. The trial court properly declined to make any specific ruling upon the claim of the appellee that the adjudication in Wentz's Appeal of the testator's mental unsoundness in 1903, coupled with the fact that there was no change in his mental condition between said date and the date of the execution of the will, established his incompetency at the latter date. Upon the facts before us the trial court properly refused to find that there had been no such change. One of the appellee's reasons of appeal to this court is that the trial court erred in holding that that part of the finding of facts in Wentz's Appeal above recited "was not as to the extent and nature of the testator's mental derangement, or as to the period of its continuance, binding upon the court in the case at bar." It does not appear that the trial court so ruled, or that such question was raised in the trial court, nor do we consider that there is any legal inconsistency between the facts found in Wentz's Appeal and the judgment rendered in the present action. As appears from the finding in this case, and from the transcript of evidence before us called Exhibit F, the portion of the finding in Wentz's Appeal above referred to was received in evidence only for the purpose of showing that the mental derangement of the testator in January, 1903, was the foundation of the judgment then rendered in that case, and that was the purpose for which it was offered. It was admissible, assuming that the judgment itself was doubtful, on its face, to show the scope of the judgment, by showing that the subject of inquiry and adjudication was the mental incapacity of the testator to manage his affairs, and not his inability to do so for other reasons. The facts in that case not made a part of the judgment or of the record, but found only for the purpose of enabling an appeal to be taken, are not adjudicated facts, binding upon the parties to this action, assuming the parties to be the same in both proceedings. Corbett v. Matz, 72 Conn. 610-612, 45 Atl. 494, 48 L. R. A. 217; Kashman v. Parsons, 70 Conn. 295-304, 39 Atl. 179; In re Premier Cycle Mfg. Co., 70 Conn. 473-480, 39 Atl. 800. We are unable to see that the trial court failed in any respect to give the proper evidential effect either to the finding of facts or to the judgment in Wentz's Appeal, which was manifestly a proceeding to procure the appointment of a conservator over the testator, upon the ground that he was mentally incapable of bringing or conducting suits for setting aside said conveyances, and for an accounting, and was so regarded by the court that tried it.

Upon the opening of the case in the trial court the appellant called as a witness Alfred S. Brown, one of the witnesses to the will, who having testified to what occurred when the will was executed, was asked this question by appellant's counsel: "At the time of the execution of the will by Mr. Nichols, was he of sound and disposing mind and memory?" The witness replied, "He was." Upon cross-examination, counsel for the ap-pellee asked the witness how many years he had been identified in business or professional relations with the testator, and what opportunities he had had for forming an opinion as to the soundness of his mind, and to state what his experience with the testator had been. Upon objections by the appellant, these questions were excluded by the court, apparently upon the ground that the cross-examination must be limited to what occurred when the will was executed. In answer to further questions by the appellee, the witness stated that his opinion as to the sanity of the testator was based upon his conduct at the time of the execution of the will; that he had known the testator a great many years, and that his previous acquaintanceship might possibly have influenced his judgment that he was of sound mind at the time he executed the will. One of the grounds upon which these questions were claimed by appellee was to test the good faith of the witness in stating that the testator was of sound mind when he executed the will.

There was error in the exclusion of these questions. Prominence is justly given to the attesting witnesses of a will who are supposed, from the fact that they were present when the will was executed, to have had the means and opportunity of judging of the testator's capacity. Field's Appeal, 36 Conn. 278. While the testimony of these witnesses in the opening of the case is usually confined to the appearance, conduct, and surrounding of the testator, at the time of the execution of the will, and the opinions of the witnesses based thereon (Barber's Appeal, 63 Conn. 393-401, 27 Atl. 973, 22 L. R. A. 90), it does not follow that the cross-examination of these witnesses must be limited to inquiries as to what occurred when the will was executed. The contestants of the will may, by proper inquiries upon the cross-examination of such a witness, seek to elicit facts indicating that the opinion expressed by him is not a candid one; that it is entitled to little weight because of bias or interest arising from his previous relations with the testator, or the part which he may have taken in preparing or procuring the execution of the will; or that such opinion is not based upon what the witness observed when the will was executed, but either wholly or in part upon his previous acquaintance or experience with the testator. To elicit such facts, it is frequently necessary to inquire, on cross-examination, regarding occurrences before the time of the execution of the will. Such cross-examination of a witness to the will who, in the opening of the case, has given his opinion regarding the sanity of the testator as based upon what he observed when the will was executed, is very commonly and properly deferred, upon the understanding that the witness is to be recalled for that purpose at a later stage of the trial; but for the court to order such postponement against the objection of the contestants might, if the witness was not afterward produced by the proponents, be a sufficient ground for a new trial. The exclusion of the questions referred to is not a sufficient ground for a new trial in the present case, since the appellee afterward fully examined the witness Brown upon the subjects of said inquiries.

Two of the appellee's witnesses who had testified that the testator was of unsound mind, and that one of his characteristics was "to break off in conversation" when talking, and who, when asked on cross-examination, if other members of the family had not the same characteristic, had replied that John had, were asked by the appellee, upon redirect examination, what, in their opinion, was the mental condition of John, when he manifested these peculiarities. These questions were excluded upon the appellant's objection. They were admissible for the purpose of showing that the fact that John had the same peculiarity, did not indicate, as implied by the cross-examination, that it might be a characteristic of a person of sound mind. The fact that the appellee was afterward given a full opportunity to present, and did present evidence as to the mental condition of John and of other brothers and sisters of the testator renders the exclusion of these questions an insufficient reason for granting a new trial.

The witness Brown having testified to the conversations between the testator and his brother Effingham on the 10th and 11th of December, 1890, concerning the execution of the will, and the adjustment of accounts between them, and as what was said at these interviews, and having testified in answer to questions by the appellee that the testator in certain matters deferred to the judgment of Effingham, the appellant was properly permitted to ask the witness whether there was any act or statement of Effingham indicating coercion or attempt to influence the testator; and the witness was properly permitted to answer that there was no suggestion of coercion. This question and answer were permissible, upon the ground that the facts upon which the conclusion of the witness was based could not be fully detailed to the court as they appeared to the witness. Kimberly's Appeal, 68 Conn. 428-432, 36 Atl. 847, 37 L. R. A. 261, 57 Am. St. Rep. 101; Sydleman v. Beckwith, 43 Conn. 9.

We find no error in the other rulings complained of upon questions of evidence. They require no discussion. The finding of facts was sufficient to enable the appellee to fully present all the questions of law she desired to have reviewed. There was no error in the refusal of the trial judge to make the requested corrections.

There is no error. The other Judges concurred.

HAVENS v. MASON.

(Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut. Dec. 15, 1906.)

1. WILLS—UNSOUNDNESS OF MIND—EVIDENCE.

The execution of a will, in reliance on the assurance of counsel that it conforms to the instructions given, containing expressions which can only be understood by those acquainted with the law to which it refers, is not evidence of unsoundness of mind.

2. SAME—MENTAL CAPACITY—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction that if testatrix was not possessed of sufficient intelligence and memory to rationally know the effect of what she was doing, the nature of her business, and the nature and condition of her property, and to appreciate who were or should be the natural objects of her bounty, and her relations to them, the manner in which she wished to distribute it, and the scope of the provisions of the will, she did not have sufficient intelligence and memory to make a will, was erroneous, as imposing too severe a test of capacity.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fairfield County; Joel H. Reed, Judge.

Application by Francis A. E. Mason for the probate of the will of Sarah B. Stevens, deceased. From a judgment of the superior court, reversing the probate decree approving the will, the proponent appeals. Reversed.

Henry E. Shannon, Carl Foster, and Arthur J. Hull, for appellant. John C. Chamberlain and J. Gilbert Calhoun, for appellee.

BALDWIN, J. The paper propounded as the will of Sarah B. Stevens contained certain specific and pecuniary bequests to a niece, Elizabeth Wells, a nephew, George Wells, and others; gave to Francis A. E. Mason, another nephew, who was also appointed as the executor, $4,000 "in consideration and appreciation of his services in caring without remuneration for my property in Hartford, and because of his many kindnesses to me"; and had the following residuary clause: "(7) I direct that all the rest and residue of my estate, real and personal, or both, that shall remain after the foregoing bequests shall have been satisfied, be divided among my heirs according to their respective shares under the laws of this state; the aforesaid Elizabeth Wells, George Wells, and Francis A. E. Mason, each to receive whatever may be her or his lawful share in the said residue under this clause in addition to the bequests already hereinbefore made them." On the trial a lawyer who wrote the will testified that the testatrix told him that she wished her residuary estate to be divided equally among all her heirs; that he read the will aloud to her after it was drawn; and that she said it was as she desired. On cross-examination he stated that her instructions for drafting the residuary clause were that each heir should have what the statute would give him in the absence of a will; that he was not informed whether her heirs apparent were all related to her in the same degree; and that he did not explain to her what the effect of the statute would be in case some should take by representation. Following, in substance, a request of the heir who appealed from the probate decree, the trial court instructed the jury that, if they should find that the terms of the will were so indefinite and uncertain that an ordinary person would not know what they meant upon having them read to him, the fact that Mrs. Stevens executed it was evidence that she was not of sound mind at the time. The will before the jury contained nothing that was indefinite or uncertain. Whether, if it had, such an instruction could, under any circumstances, have been proper, it is unnecessary to inquire. It could only serve to mislead and confuse in the case on trial. To execute, in reliance on the assurance of counsel that it conforms to the instructions given, a will containing expressions the effect of which can only be understood by those acquainted with the provisions of a law to which it refers does not tend to show unsoundness of mind. The error in these instructions requires a new trial; but none of the other reasons of appeal are sufficient to call for one. There was, however, one error not assigned, which, in view of the probable submission of the cause to another jury, it is proper to notice.

The following instructions were given to the jury: "If you find by a fair preponderance of the evidence that at the time Sarah B. Stevens executed the paper before you she was possessed of sufficient intelligence and memory to freely and rationally know and comprehend the effect of what she was doing, and of the nature of the business she was engaged in, and the nature and condition of her property, and to appreciate who were or should be the natural objects of her bounty and her relations to them, the manner in which she wished to distribute it among or withhold it from them, and the scope and bearing of the provisions of the will she was making, then I charge you that the testatrix had in the eye of the law sufficient intelligence and memory to make a will. But if you find that she was not possessed of sufficient intelligence and memory to freely and rationally know and comprehend these things, then she had not in law sufficient intelligence and memory to make a will. * * * It is for the jury * * * to say whether or not at the time of the execution of this will, Mrs. Stevens knew that she was making a will, knew what property she possessed, and knew the natural objects of her bounty, and if you find that these essentials she knew and understood at the time of the execution of this will, then the will should be sustained. * * * In order to have sufficient capacity to make a will, the testatrix must have had at the time sufficient mind and memory to comprehend the nature and conditions of her property, the persons who were or should be the natural objects of her bounty and her relation to them, the manner in which she wished to distribute

It among or withhold it from them, and the scope and bearing of the provisions of the will she was making. A testatrix may not have sufficient strength of mind and vigor of intellect to make and digest all parts of a contract, and yet be competent to direct the distribution of her property by will. The question is, were her mind and memory sufficiently sound to enable her to know and understand the business in which she was engaged? * * * If the jury shall find by a fair preponderance of the evidence that at the time she made this will Mrs. Stevens had become so enfeebled in mind and memory that she could not remember the natural objects of her bounty, and had actually forgotten who they were, they should find for the appellant, and find that this was not the last will and testament of the deceased."

The first of these sentences states a sound legal proposition. But while one possessing the intelligence and memory which it describes has, as matter of law, sufficient testamentary capacity, it does not follow that one without actual knowledge of all the various matters specified may not have it also. Persons of large means rarely know precisely what property they own, or even the nature and present condition of every considerable item of it. If by the class described as those who were or should be the natural objects of Mrs. Stevens' bounty was meant her heirs at law, as seems probable by the reference to their relations to her, a test of capacity was imposed which was too severe. She had 14 nephews and nieces living, who were her next of kin. She might have sufficient testamentary capacity, without knowing whether all were alive, or whether any others, who might have died previously had left issue that then represented them. The vital and really the only question as to the capacity of Mrs. Stevens was correctly stated to be this: Were her mind and memory sufficiently sound to enable her to know and understand the business in which she was engaged? Sturdevant's Appeal. 71 Conn. 392, 401, 42 Atl. 70; In re Nichols, 78 Conn. —, 62 Atl. 610.

There is error, and a new trial is ordered.

ATWOOD v. BUCKINGHAM.

(Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut. Dec. 15, 1905.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—FAILURE TO FILE INVENTORY—PENALTIES—REPEAL OF STATUTE—EFFECT.

Gen. St. 1902, § 1, provides that the repeal of an act shall not affect any suit or prosecution pending at the time of the repeal for an offense committed or for the recovery of a penalty or forfeiture incurred under the act repealed. Held, that the repeal of section 324, providing for the recovery of a penalty from an administrator for his unexcused failure to file an inventory within 12 months before suit brought to recover the penalty, while effectual to prevent the institution of new actions for such delinquencies, past or future, did not affect an action pending at the time of the repeal to recover a penalty under such section.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 44, Cent. Dig. Statutes, §§ 372-374.]

2. SAME—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE.

Under Gen. St. 1902, § 324, imposing a penalty on an administrator for his unexcused failure to file an inventory for 12 months prior to the bringing of the action to recover such penalty, no penalty or forfeiture could be incurred by any delinquency before suit was in fact instituted to recover such penalty.

3. SAME—RETROACTIVE OPERATION.

Gen. St. 1902, § 324, providing a penalty for an administrator's failure to file an inventory within a specified time, was repealed by Act June 21, 1905 (Pub. Acts 1905, p. 363, c. 160), and later in the session Act July 6, 1905 (Pub. Acts 1905, p. 413, c. 217), was passed, declaring that in all actions pending and brought under section 324 the recovery shall be for the sum of $1 only, as the forfeiture for such neglect and the taxable costs of the court, and that defendant might before trial tender such sum and costs, and on plaintiff's refusal to accept the same he should not recover more. Held, that Act July 6, 1905, was retroactive and applied to pending causes.

4. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—RETROACTIVE LEGISLATION.

Act July 6, 1905 (Pub. Acts 1905, p. 413, c. 217), providing the amount recoverable in actions pending to recover a penalty against administrators for failure to file an inventory, as provided by Gen. St. 1902, § 324, was not unconstitutional because retroactive; there being no provision in the State Constitution forbidding such legislation.

5. SAME—VESTED RIGHTS.

A plaintiff, in a suit against an administratrix to recover a penalty imposed by Gen. St. 1902, § 324, for failure to file an inventory prior to the bringing of the action, had no vested right in such unenforced penalty, so as to render unconstitutional, as impairing such rights, Act July 6, 1905 (Pub. Acts 1905, p. 413, c. 217), providing that the penalty in pending actions under section 324 shall not exceed $1 in costs.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 10, Cent. Dig. Constitutional Law, § 233.]

6. SAME—OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS.

No contract relation existed between the state and the person suing an administratrix to enforce a penalty imposed by Gen. St. 1902, § 324, for her failure to file an inventory, as provided by law, so as to render Act July 6, 1905 (Pub. Acts 1905, p. 413, c. 217), limiting the recovery in such actions then pending to $1 and costs, unconstitutional as impairing the obligation of contracts.

7. SAME—ENCROACHMENT ON JUDICIARY.

Act July 6, 1905 (Pub. Acts 1905, p. 413, c. 217), limiting the recovery in pending actions against administrators for failure to file an inventory as provided by law to $1 and costs, was a proper exercise of the Legislature's power to declare what the law shall be, and was not an encroachment on the judiciary.

8. SAME—EQUAL PROTECTION OF LAW.

New actions to recover penalties against administrators for failure to file an inventory as provided by law being rendered impossible by the repeal of Gen. St. 1902, § 324, authorizing the recovery of a penalty for such failure, Act July 6, 1905 (Pub. Acts 1905, p. 413, c. 217), limiting the recovery in pending actions under such section to $1 and costs, was not unconstitutional, as depriving plaintiffs in pending suits under section 324, as distinguished from those who might prosecute suits under such section, of the equal protection of the laws.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Fairfield County; Howard J. Curtis, Judge.

Action by D. Preston Atwood against Annie McLean Buckingham to recover a forfeiture incurred by defendant as an administratrix, for unexcused failure to file an inventory, as provided by Gen. St. 1902, § 324. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff for the limited amount provided in such actions by Pub. Acts 1905, p. 413, c. 217, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

B. P. Arvine and John J. Phelan, for appellant. Lucien F. Burpee and S. McLean Buckingham, for appellee.

PRENTICE, J. The plaintiff, in May, 1904, brought his action to recover $240, as the forfeiture provided by section 324 of the General Statutes of 1902, claimed to have been incurred by the defendant as an administratrix through her unexcused failure, for the 12 months prior to the bringing of the action, to file an inventory as provided by law. While the action was pending the General Assembly, by an act which was approved and went into effect on June 21, 1905, repealed said section. Pub. Acts 1905, p. 365, c. 160. Later in the session, by another act which was approved and went into effect July 6, 1905, it was enacted that "in all civil actions pending in the courts of the state brought under section 324 of the General Statutes for recovery of the forfeiture therein provided, such recovery shall be for the sum of one dollar only as the forfeiture for such neglect and the taxable costs of court." The act further provided that the defendant might before trial tender to the plaintiff the sum of one dollar and accrued costs, and that upon the plaintiff's refusal to accept the same he should not recover any sum in excess thereof. Pub. Acts 1905, p. 413, c. 217. The defendant thereupon filed an answer in which she set up a tender of the sum of $1 and the amount of taxable costs then accrued. To this answer the plaintiff demurred and assigned as grounds of demurrer various reasons involving the construction and effect of the two acts of 1905 referred to and the constitutionality of the one under which the tender was made and pleaded. The court overruled the demurrer, and, the plaintiff refusing to plead further, rendered judgment that the plaintiff recover the amount of the tender. Of this action he complains.

Section 1 of the General Statutes of 1902, provides, among other things, that the repeal of an act shall not affect any suit or prosecution or proceeding pending at the time of the repeal for an offense committed or for the recovery of a penalty or forfeiture incurred under the act repealed, and that the passage or repeal of an act should not affect any action then pending. The repeal of said section 324 did not, therefore, as the defendant concedes, affect the plaintiff's action or any other which may have been pending under said section. The repeal, however, was effectual not only to prevent the institution of new actions for future delinquencies, but also to prevent the bringing of such actions for past ones. The plaintiff has erroneously assumed the contrary to be the situation as respects neglects which antedated the repeal. It is the well-settled rule that, in the absence of a saving clause or statute, the right to bring suit to recover a penalty or forfeiture falls with the act which provides it. Yeaton v. United States, 5 Cranch, 281, 3 L. Ed. 101; Maryland v. Baltimore, etc., R. Co., 3 How. 534, 11 L. Ed. 714; Norris v. Crocker, 13 How. 481, 14 L. Ed. 210; Welch v. Wadsworth, 30 Conn. 149, 79 Am. Dec. 239. There was no saving clause in the present repealing act. Section 1 of the General Statutes of 1902 contains the general provision that the repeal of an act should not affect any punishment, penalty, or forfeiture incurred before the repeal takes effect. But no penalty or forfeiture could by any possibility be incurred under the repealed act by any delinquent before suit was in fact instituted, for the all-sufficient reason, if for no other, that the section expressly provides that there should be no forfeiture incurred in any case where the delinquent before suit is brought makes to the court of probate an acceptable excuse for his delay. The absence of this excuse at the moment suit is brought is thus made one of the conditions of forfeiture. This the plaintiff recognized when he framed his complaint, which averred the absence of an accepted excuse. By reason of this condition, no incurred forfeiture was possible under the act until the status of the party against whom a forfeiture was sought to be enforced was by the bringing of an action fixed as that of a delinquent subject to the statutory penalty. When, therefore, the repeal took effect, there was an end to all situations which could furnish the basis of new actions. Persons who had escaped suit might be in neglect, but none of them had as yet become subject to the penalty of the statute, and it could not then have been foretold that any one of them would ever have become so had the statute continued in force.

The plaintiff contends that said chapter 217, which is the act which reduces the amount of the forfeiture and under which the tender was made, should be given a prospective application only, and not made to retroact upon actions already brought. In aid of this contention it is said, and well said, that the presumption is that statutes are intended to operate prospectively, and that they should not be construed as having a retrospective effect, unless their terms show clearly and unmistakably a legislative intention that they should so operate. Thames Mfg. Co. v. Lathrop, 7 Conn. 550; Plumb v. Sawyer, 21 Conn. 353; Smith v. Lyon, 44 Conn. 175; Middletown v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 62 Conn. 492, 27 Atl.

119. With respect to the present act, however, it is to be observed that to confine its operation to suits to be brought is to deny it all operation whatsoever. Its subject-matter is expressed to be "all civil actions pending in the courts of the state brought under section 324 of the General Statutes." We have already seen that the only actions which could by any possibility ever be or become pending under that act were those which were pending at its repeal, which antedated the enactment of chapter 217. The Legislature must therefore have meant by pending actions those actions or none at all. Furthermore, if chapter 217 be read in connection with chapter 160, as it should be, it will be clearly seen that by the two acts the General Assembly, at its session in 1905, undertook to deal with the whole situation presented by litigation, actual or possible, which might arise under said section 324. In the first it was sought to prevent all new actions; by the second to deal with those which had been begun. These considerations, when taken in connection with the natural meaning of the language employed in chapter 217, leave no room for doubt as to the legislative intent, and that the legislative command was thereby expressly given that the right of recovery in all actions then pending under section 324, should be controlled and limited as therein provided. In the presence of this express command the saving clauses contained in section 1 of the General Statutes, which have been already noticed, of course, become ineffective. They are but legislative enactments, and must yield to the later expression of the legislative will.

The plaintiff next claims that, in so far as chapter 217 professes to operate upon actions pending at the time of its enactment, it is unconstitutional. Three reasons are assigned for this conclusion, to wit: (1) Because it is thus made to retroact to divest vested rights; (2) because thereby contract obligations are impaired; and (3) because it thus becomes an unlawful attempt of the legislative department to dictate to, interfere with, direct, and coerce the judicial department in respect to its judicial functions in the rendition of a judgment. It is further urged that, if the act is to be interpreted as applying solely to actions pending at the time of its enactment, it is unconstitutional for the further reason that it denies to the plaintiff and all others whose actions were pending the equal protection of the laws. There is no provision in our Constitution forbidding retrospective legislation. Such legislation is not of itself unlawful. Curtis v. Whitney, 13 Wall. 68, 20 L. Ed. 513. The present statute could affect no vested rights. The plaintiffs, in actions for the recovery of forfeitures under said section 324 which were pending when said chapter 217 went into effect, had not at that time acquired a vested right to such forfeitures. "No person has a vested right in an unenforced penalty." Norris v.

Crocker, 13 How. 429, 14 L. Ed. 210; Welch v. Wadsworth, 30 Conn. 149, 79 Am. Dec. 239; Mix v. Illinois Central R. Co., 116 Ill. 502, 6 N. E. 42; Railway v. Wells, 65 Ohio St. 313, 62 N. E. 332, 58 L. R. A. 651; Bank of St. Mary's v. State, 12 Ga. 475; Anderson v. Byrnes, 122 Cal. 272, 54 Pac. 821.

The claim which is based upon a supposed contract relation between the state and the claimant of a forfeiture, said to be created by the enactment of said section 324 and the institution of an action to recover the forfeiture, is wholly without foundation. "A forfeiture is to be regarded as a punishment inflicted for a violation of some duty enjoined upon the party by law." Maryland v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 3 How. 534, 552, 11 L. Ed. 714. When a law is enacted providing for such a punishment to inure to the benefit of another, the right of the state to ameliorate or remit that punishment at its pleasure is unrestrained, and no contractual relation between the state and any person is created either by force of the enactment itself or by the combined force of the enactment and the institution of proceedings under it which imposes such a restraint. The analogy sought to be drawn between statutes offering rewards and those imposing a forfeiture for the benefit of whomsoever should sue therefor entirely fails. The former contain the conditions of a contract; the latter do not. The many cases, of which certain have been cited which effectually determine that no vested right is acquired by the institution of an action to recover a forfeiture, are directly in point. It is the province of the legislative department to define rights and prescribe remedies; of the judicial to construe legislative enactments, determine the rights secured thereby, and apply the remedies prescribed. Chapter 217 deals with the remedy for a violation of a statutory duty. In this the General Assembly was not invading the judicial province; neither was it thereby interfering with, dictating to, or coercing the judicial department. "To declare what the law is or has been is a judicial power; to declare what it shall be is legislative." Dash v. Van Kleeck, 7 Johns. 477, 498, 5 Am. Dec. 291.

If more was necessary to justify our conclusions that the provisions of chapter 217, although operating upon pending actions, were not unconstitutional for any of the reasons thus far discussed, that justification would be found in a long line of decisions including those of the Supreme Court of the United States and our own, uniformly holding that the power of legislative bodies to repeal acts prescribing penalties and forfeitures in such manner as to prevent recoveries in pending suits is, in the absence of special constitutional limitations, not found in our Constitution, full and ample. Norris v. Crocker, 13 How. 429, 14 L. Ed. 210; Welch v. Wadsworth, 30 Conn. 149, 79 Am. Dec. 239; Butler v. Palmer, 1 Hill, 324;

Lewis v. Foster, 1 N. H. 61; Oriental Bank v. Freese, 18 Me. 109, 38 Am. Dec. 701; Mix v. Illinois Central R. Co., 116 Ill. 502, 6 N. E. 42; Railway v. Wells, 65 Ohio St. 313, 62 N. E. 332, 58 L. R. A. 651; Bay City, etc., R. Co. v. Austin, 21 Mich. 390; Anderson v. Byrnes, 122 Cal. 272, 54 Pac. 821; Bank of St. Mary's v. State, 12 Ga. 475; Commonwealth v. Standard Oil Co., 101 Pa. 150; State v. Village of Passaic, 36 N. J. Law, 382; Musgrove v. V. & N. R. Co., 50 Miss. 677; Pope v. Lewis, 4 Ala. 489.

The plaintiff's final claim, that chapter 217 denies to him and all others who may have had suits pending the equal protection of the laws, is based upon the assumption that it singles out for discriminating action a portion only of those who might prosecute suits under the repealed section 324. This assumption we have already had occasion to see was a mistaken one, since new actions were made impossible by the repeal. That being so, the amelioration of the penalty contained in chapter 217 was one which affected alike all actions which were then, or ever could be, pending, and there was no singling out of persons to be reached by the new legislation, and no arbitrary or unreasonable classification made. The plaintiff's argument necessarily falls with the assumption. Cotting v. Kansas City Stock Yards, 183 U. S. 79, 111, 22 Sup. Ct. 80, 46 L. Ed. 92; Norwich G. & E. Co. v. Norwich, 76 Conn. 565, 573, 57 Atl. 746.

BOUTON v. BEERS.

(Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut. Dec. 15, 1905.)

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES — VALIDITY AS BETWEEN PARTIES.

A conveyance of his property by a debtor to another is valid as between the parties, notwithstanding the debtor intended thereby to place the property beyond the reach of creditors, and his grantee had knowledge thereof; the transaction being voidable only as against those who might be defrauded thereby.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 24, Cent. Dig. Fraudulent Conveyances, § 523.]

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Fairfield County; Howard J. Curtis, Judge.

Action by Foster Bouton against Carrie Beers. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. No error.

The complaint alleges, in substance, that on April 30, 1902, the plaintiff conveyed by warranty deed to the defendant the tract of land described, with the following condition for reconveyance expressed in the deed: "And it is further agreed and understood by and between the parties that the grantee herein shall deed back the above-described premises to the grantor herein at any time within the period of five years from the date hereof, if so desired by the grantor herein upon the payment of $5.00 to the grantee herein"; that said deed was duly recorded; that on March 22, 1904, the plaintiff tendered to the defendant the sum of $5 and a proper deed of reconveyance, and demanded of the defendant that she execute and deliver the same in fulfillment of her said agreement; that the defendant then refused to execute said deed and to execute any deed of conveyance to the plaintiff, and claims by way of equitable relief judgment for specific performance or a decree vesting the title of said land in the plaintiff. The defendant's answer substantially admits the allegations of the complaint, and avers by way of second defense that just before the execution of the deed the plaintiff was guilty of intolerable cruelty to his wife, by acts which compelled her to leave his house, and that she left his house for several months, returning to him late in the fall of the same year; that the plaintiff executed the deed mentioned in the complaint and delivered the same to the defendant for the purpose of preventing his wife from placing an attachment for alimony in case she brought divorce proceedings, and to prevent her obtaining said alimony. To this second defense the plaintiff demurred, and the claimed error of the court in sustaining the demurrer is the only reason of appeal assigned.

William H. Cable, for appellant. Howard W. Taylor, for appellee.

HAMERSLEY, J. (after stating the facts). The plaintiff urges with much force that the deed of April 30, 1902, from the plaintiff to the defendant, cannot be regarded as a fraudulent conveyance, either at the time of its execution or at the commencement of this action within the meaning of the law defining such conveyances and declaring them to be void as against creditors; but that question is not necessarily involved in this case. No attempt is here made to set aside the deed as void as against the plaintiff's wife. The plaintiff does not seek to set aside or reform the deed for the purpose of compelling the defendant to execute a secret trust in respect to property given to her, with intent thereby to defraud the plaintiff's creditors. This action seeks to compel the defendant to execute an agreement entered into by her and expressed in a deed of land duly recorded. The defendant admits her agreement, and that by the terms of the deed conveying the land to her she is under obligation to reconvey the land to the plaintiff upon the payment of $5, and claims that the facts stated in her second defense are sufficient in law to justify her in refusing to carry out her agreement. This claim is not maintainable. A conveyance of his property by a debtor to another, so made as to be valid and binding between the parties, is valid as between them, notwithstanding the debtor intended thereby to place his property beyond the reach of creditors, and his gran-lee knew of his intention. The transaction is not turpis causa, and therefore void, but is only voidable as against those who might be defrauded thereby, and, until avoided, is valid and binding. The parties to such transaction, as between each other, will not be permitted to prove their fraudulent purpose in order to escape the obligations of their contract. The grantor will not be permitted to prove his own fraudulent purpose in order to avoid the valid contract he has made; nor will the grantee be permitted to prove the fraud in which he participated for the purpose of avoiding the obligations of his valid contract. This rule rests largely upon considerations of public policy, and has been stringently enforced. Nichols v. McCarthy, 53 Conn. 299, 23 Atl. 93, 55 Am. Rep. 105; Stores v. Snow, 1 Root, 181; Chapin v. Pease, 10 Conn. 69, 72, 25 Am. Dec. 56; Bonesteel v. Sullivan, 104 Pa. 9; Dyer v. Homer, 22 Pick. (Mass.) 253, 257; Harvey v. Varney, 98 Mass. 118; Clemens v. Clemens, 28 Wis. 637, 9 Am. Rep. 320; Greenthal v. Lincoln, Seyms & Co., 67 Conn. 372, 376, 35 Atl. 266.

Upon the facts stated in the complaint, and in the defendant's second defense the plaintiff was plainly entitled to the relief asked, and the defendant could not escape the performance of her admitted obligation by proving that the plaintiff executed, and she accepted, the deed in question for the purposes alleged by her, even if that fact rendered the deed void as against the plaintiff's wife. The demurrer to the second defense was properly sustained by the trial court.

There is no error in the judgment of the court of common pleas. The other Judges concurred.

FITZMAURICE v. CONNECTICUT RY. & LIGHTING CO.

(Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut. Dec. 15, 1905.)

NEGLIGENCE—CONDITION—USE OF LAND—CARE REQUIRED AS TO CHILDREN.

In an action for negligence, it appeared that plaintiff, an infant about three years of age, while living with her parents, strayed upon defendant's land and climbed upon or fell into a pile of hot soot. Defendant's land had been used as a dumping ground for soot from a heating plant for several years, and was practically an open lot; the fences having been down ever since defendant bought it. There was nothing on the land likely to attract children, the place of the injury was not on or near a thoroughfare, and it had never been used as a playground or place of resort for children. Held, that defendant was not liable for failure to guard against such injury.

Appeal from Superior Court, New Haven County; Silas A. Robinson, Judge.

Action by Vera Fitzmaurice, by her next friend, against the Connecticut Railway & Lighting Company, for injuries resulting from defendant's alleged negligence. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John J. Walsh and John Keogh, for appellant. William T. Hincks, for appellee.

HALL, J. The plaintiff, an infant about three years of age, brings this action by her next friend. On the day alleged in the complaint, while living with her parents in a house belonging to her uncle, Patrick Fitzmaurice, she strayed upon the defendant's land, and either climbed upon or fell into a pile of hot soot, which one of the defendant's workmen had that day dumped in the defendant's yard, and was severely burned. Upon the following facts the trial court held that she was not entitled to a judgment for substantial damages: The back yard of the premises of said Patrick Fitzmaurice extended along the west side of land purchased by the defendant, about five years before the time of accident, as a place upon which to dump ashes and soot from the furnace of its power house located upon land adjoining on the west, that of said Patrick Fitzmaurice. This land, in the rear of the defendant's premises, had been used by the defendant as such a dumping ground ever since its purchase in substantially the same manner as on the day of the accident. It was practically an open lot; the fences on the east and west sides of it having been down or in a dilapidated condition ever since the company bought it. It did not appear that there had been any division of the fence between the defendant's and Patrick Fitzmaurice's land for the purpose of repair. During most of the time while this yard had been so used, the accumulated ashes had formed a pile 15 to 20 feet wide, extending 30 or 40 feet from the rear of the power house, and sloping from a height of 3 or 4 feet down to the ground, at what remained of the divisional fence between the land of the defendant and that of said Patrick Fitzmaurice. While cinders and material from the dump sometimes slid down this slope upon the Fitzmaurice property, the ashes did not extend over upon it to any considerable extent at the time of the accident. The ash pile was distant from the street, and upon land not used by any one as a thoroughfare. Poor people of the neighborhood sometimes raked over the edges of the pile for coke, and were not driven away by the defendant. The place was not one likely to attract children, nor was there anything to cause the defendant to anticipate that a child of the plaintiff's age would stray unattended upon the premises and be injured. The plaintiff had never gone upon the defendant's lot before, nor had any one been burned by the ashes or soot upon said land. The soot by which the plaintiff was burned was dumped by the defendant's workman upon the side of defendant's lot most distant from the Fitzmaurice property during the forenoon of the day of the accident, which occurred at about 1:30 in the afternoon. There was nothing in the appearance of the pile of soot to indicate its heat. The defendant knew that the soot thus thrown out retained its heat for a considerable time, but did not throw water upon it or attempt to cool it in any other way. The trial court held that under these circumstances the defendant was not negligent, and that the injury to the plaintiff was due to her "infantile inexperience and helplessness."

Of the six reasons of the plaintiff's appeal the first, third, and fourth may be dismissed with the statement that the rulings assigned by them as erroneous do not appear to have been made by the trial court. The remaining reasons of appeal are, in substance, that the court erred in holding that there was no implied invitation to the plaintiff to come upon the defendant's premises, that the facts did not make the doctrine of "attractive nuisance" applicable, and that the defendant was not required to protect and safeguard the heated soot and ash pile upon its land. None of these assignments of error can be sustained upon the facts found by the trial court.

In support of his claims the plaintiff's counsel cites the case of Birge v. Gardner, 19 Conn. 507, 50 Am. Dec. 281, and many cases of injuries to children whose presence upon the defendant's premises and near the dangerous object should have been reasonably anticipated by the defendant. In Birge v. Gardner the defendant was held liable upon the ground that he was negligent in placing a heavy gate upon or near the line of a lane or public passway over which the plaintiff, a child under seven years of age, and other children and persons, were accustomed to pass in going to and from the highway, to and from their homes, and because the gate, although upon the defendant's land, was left in such an insecure condition that it fell upon the plaintiff, when, as the defendant claimed to have proved, he put his hands upon it and shook it as he was passing along the lane from the highway to his home. The opinion states that the court did not decide whether the plaintiff was a trespasser or not, but that, if he was, the defendant might properly have been found guilty of such gross negligence as to render him responsible, as in cases of injuries to trespassers by spring guns and mantraps placed by the owners of land upon their property. Evidently the gross negligence of which he might have been found guilty was the careless leaving of this insecurely fastened and heavy gate, where he had reason to know it was liable to fall upon persons who might be lawfully using the public passway.

The case at bar differs from Birge v. Gardner, in that in the present case it appears that the plaintiff was a mere trespasser upon the defendant's land, that the object of danger was not on or near land used as a thoroughfare, and that the presence of an unattended child of the plaintiff's age near it was not reasonably to have been anticipated. It differs from most of the other cases cited of injuries to children either in the fact that the present defendant's land was never used as a playground or place of resort for children, or in the fact that the dangerous object was not in the present case calculated to attract or interest children. The owners of land are not required in using it for legitimate purposes to guard against every possible danger to children. To children whose presence upon the premises could not reasonably have been anticipated they owe no duty to keep their land free from dangerous conditions. As the facts show that the defendant had no reason to anticipate that a young and unattended child like the plaintiff might come into this dump yard and upon or near this pile of hot ashes or soot, it is not liable for the injury sustained by the plaintiff.

There is no error. The other Judges concurred.

STATE v. SLINEY et al.

(Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut. Dec. 15, 1905.)

WILLS—CONSTRUCTION—ABSOLUTE OR LIMITED ESTATE IN PERSONAL PROPERTY.

Testatrix, after disposing of the bulk of her estate, bequeathed the residue to K., in trust "for the purpose of paying the premiums on a certain policy of insurance on the life of M., * * * and, if any money remains after paying said premiums, I give, devise, and bequeath the use, improvement, income, and enjoyment of the same to said K., and upon the death of said M. said trust shall cease, and thereafter I give, bequeath, and devise the use, improvement, income, and enjoyment of said rest and residue of my estate to said K. during his natural life, and upon the death of said K., I give, devise, and bequeath said rest and residue to others." Held, that after the payment of the premiums referred to the residue of income in excess of such payments belonged to K. absolutely.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, New Haven County; Jacob B. Ullman, Judge.

Action by the state of Connecticut against John T. Sliney, administrator of the estate of Bernard F. Kivian, and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

William A. Wright, for the State. Edmund Zachar, for appellees.

TORRANCE, C. J. This case involves the construction of the eleventh section of the will of Mary Gallagher, who died in September, 1892. In that section she created a trust, and appointed as trustee thereof her son-in-law Bernard F. Kivian. After settling her estate as executor, Kivian in January, 1894, qualified as such trustee, and gave the bond in suit, executed by himself, as principal, and three sureties. Kivlan died in April, 1902, and one of the sureties died in February, 1903, and this suit is against Kivlan's estate, the two surviving sureties, and the estate of the deceased surety. The trust estate consisted of money in savings bank, and notes secured by mortgage. Between January, 1894, and the time of his death, in April, 1902, Kivlan, as trustee, received an income from the trust fund, in excess of premiums paid and other proper charges, amounting in all to the sum of $421.68, for which neither he nor his estate has ever accounted. This suit is brought to recover the amount so received. McGuire survived Kivlan. In the trial court the defendants claimed that the money so received belonged to Kivlan under the terms of the will, and the court sustained that claim, and whether it erred in so doing depends upon the construction of the eleventh clause of the will.

The will contains 12 clauses. The first merely directs the payment of debts and funeral expenses, and the twelfth appoints Kivlan as executor. In the second the testatrix devises certain real estate to certain children of her brother, Patrick Williams. In the third, fourth, and fifth she devises real estate to three of the children of Ellen Williams, and in the sixth she gives certain sums of money to each of the remaining two children of Ellen Williams. In the seventh, eighth, and ninth clauses she makes certain bequests of money to divers persons. In the tenth clause she gives her son-in-law, Kivlan, the life use of certain real estate, and gives the remainder over to the children of Ellen Williams. The eleventh clause reads as follows: "All the rest and residue of my estate I give, devise, and bequeath to said Bernard F. Kivlan, in trust, however, and for the purpose of paying the premiums on a certain policy of insurance on the life of John McGuire of said Branford; and if any money remains after paying said premiums, I give, devise, and bequeath the use, improvement, income, and enjoyment of the same to said Bernard F. Kivlan; and upon the death of said John McGuire said trust shall cease; and thereafter I give, devise, and bequeath the use, improvement, income, and enjoyment of said rest and residue of my estate to said Bernard F. Kivlan during his natural life, and upon the death of said Bernard F. Kivlan I give, devise, and bequeath said rest and residue of my estate to the children of said Ellen Williams, to be theirs and their heirs, forever, in fee simple; and in the case of the death of any of the said children of Ellen Williams before my decease, I give, devise, and bequeath to the children of said children of Ellen Williams the share that the parents would have been entitled to if living." The dispute between the parties arises out of these words of the eleventh clause: "And if any money remains after paying said premiums, I give, devise, and bequeath the use, improvement, income and enjoyment of the same to said Bernard F. Kivlan."

The state contends that under these words Kivlan took only the use of the sums received by him as income in excess of premiums and charges; while the defendants claim that he took such sums as his own. We think the claim of the defendants must be sustained. In the clauses of her will preceding the eleventh the testatrix had disposed of the great bulk of her estate apparently, and her main object in the eleventh seems to be to provide for the payment of the premiums upon the McGuire policy as they should become due from time to time. She doubtless knew the amount of the residue of her estate which would be required to meet them. That residue consisted entirely of money and notes secured by mortgage, the equivalent of money, and she devotes the whole of it, principal as well as income, to the payment of the premiums. Upon a careful reading of the eleventh clause of the will we think it clear that the testatrix intended (1) that the premiums should be paid at all events, even if it took the entire residue to make them; (2) that if after the payment of premiums from time to time, there should be income from the residue in excess of such payments, that excess should belong to Kivlan; (3) that at McGuire's death the entire income of the residue should belong to Kivlan for life; and (4) that at Kivlan's death the residue should go to the children of Ellen Williams. By the clause in question the testatrix intended to benefit three, and only three, parties—McGuire, Kivlan, and the children of Ellen Williams. McGuire was to have his premiums paid, Kivlan was to have the income of the trust fund not required to pay premiums, and the children of Mrs. Williams were to have that fund as it should be when the payment of premiums ceased. In short, we think the eleventh clause, when read, as a whole in the light of the facts found and of the other parts of the will, shows a clear intent that Kivlan should have all the income from the residue not needed for the payment of premiums.

There is no error. The other Judges concurred.

WATERTOWN SAV. BANK v. MATTOON et al.

(Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut. Dec. 15, 1905.)

1. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY—CREATION OF RELATION—FRAUD—CONCEALMENT.

Gen. St. 1902, § 3445 provides that the treasurer of every savings bank shall give a bond, payable to the bank, to the satisfaction and acceptance of the directors. Held, that inasmuch as the bond is for the benefit of the public, and the only duty imposed by statute upon the directors with reference to it is the duty of accepting or rejecting it, their fraud in failing to inform the sureties, when the bond was given, that the treasurer had already embezzled funds, did not release the sureties.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 40, Cent. Dig. Principal and Surety, §§ 87, 89.]

2. SAME.

Where the sureties on the bond of a bank treasurer did not sign at the request of the directors, or in their presence, and the sureties did not apply to the directors for any information concerning the character or conduct of the treasurer, the fact that the directors knew, when they accepted the bond, of prior embezzlements by the treasurer, and that they did not inform the sureties, did not amount to a fraud on the part of the directors, releasing the sureties.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 40, Cent. Dig. Principal and Surety, § 89.]

Appeal from Superior Court, New Haven County; John M. Thayer, Judge.

Action by the Watertown Savings Bank against Burton H. Mattoon and others to recover the amount of a bond to secure performance of the duties of the treasurer of the bank. Defendants appealed to the superior court, where a demurrer was sustained to several defenses, and after a trial to the court, and judgment for plaintiff, the sureties appeal. Affirmed.

Edward F. Cole, for appellants. Lucien F. Burpee, for appellee.

TORRANCE, C. J. In July, 1902, Burton H. Mattoon was the treasurer of the plaintiff bank, and as such officer gave to it the bond in suit, signed by himself as principal and by the three other defendants as sureties. The bond was in the usual form of fidelity bonds, for the sum of $10,000, payable to the plaintiff bank, dated July 1, 1902, and was approved by the directors of said bank July 7, 1902. The complaint alleged that Mattoon, while treasurer of said bank, in September, 1903, embezzled certain funds of said bank, and had never repaid or accounted for the same. The sureties filed an answer purporting to contain four defenses. In the first they admitted the execution and delivery of the bond, but in effect denied the other allegations of the complaint; while in the second, third, and fourth they set up the admissions and denials contained in the first, and the special matter hereinafter set forth. The special matter set up in the second and third defenses was in substance as follows: At the time said bond was given Mattoon had already taken and appropriated to his own use a large amount of the plaintiff's money without authority, all of which was then well known to the directors of the plaintiff bank. "The directors of the plaintiff bank fraudulently concealed from these defendants the fact of said defalcation and misappropriation by the said Burton H. Mattoon, and allowed these defendants to execute said bond, and to become sureties for said Mattoon, as aforesaid, in ignorance of the fact that he was already a defaulter to said bank." The fourth defense, after alleging that Mattoon was a defaulter at the time the bond was given, proceeds in substance as follows: "The directors of the plaintiff bank utterly failed in the performance of their duties as required by law, and did not cause the books, accounts, and securities belonging to said bank to be annually examined, as required by law. If they had performed their said duties according to law, and caused proper examination of the books, accounts, and securities belonging to said bank to be made as required by law, such examination would have disclosed the said defalcation. By reason of the said neglect of the duties of the said directors of the plaintiff bank, the said defalcations of the said Burton H. Mattoon were concealed from these defendants, and these defendants were thereby fraudulently induced to execute said bond as surety for said Mattoon in ignorance of the fact that he had been and then was a defaulter to said bank." To the new matter thus set up in the answer of the sureties the plaintiff demurred, on the ground that the following facts did not appear anywhere in said answer, namely: (1) That said defendants became sureties on the bond in question at the plaintiff's suggestion or request, or as a result of its inducement; (2) that said plaintiff had any dealings or opportunity to communicate with said defendants prior to or at the time of the execution of said bond; (3) that said defendants relied on the plaintiff for advice or information, or that they requested the same from it, or acted on any belief created or induced by the plaintiff's conduct; (4) that the plaintiff was under any legal duty to said defendants to disclose to them any former wrongdoing of said Mattoon; (5) that the plaintiff was under any legal duty or obligation to said defendants to "cause the books, accounts, and securities belonging to said bank to be annually examined; (6) that the plaintiff had actual knowledge of the fact that said Mattoon had wrongfully taken and appropriated to his own use any money of the plaintiff without authority at or before the time of the execution and delivery of said bond. The trial court sustained the demurrer, and rendered final judgment against the principal and the defendant sureties, and the sole matter assigned for error is the action of the court in sustaining said demurrer.

The new matter set up in the answer amounts in effect to a single defense, the substance of which may be stated in this way: (1) The directors, when they approved, knew that Mattoon had already embezzled the funds of the bank. (2) They did not disclose that fact to the sureties, and thereby "fraudulently concealed" it from them, and "fraudulently induced" them to execute and deliver the bond. Whether the answer contains any legal charge of fraud against the directors is not, perhaps, free from doubt, for the allegation of fraudulent concealment seems to be an inference or conclusion not supported by the other facts alleged. But, assuming for the present that the answer sets forth such a non-disclosure on the part of the directors as in law amounts to a fraudulent concealment of a material fact, it does not follow that such a fraud can avail the sureties in this suit. The bond in suit was not one which it was the duty of the bank or of its directors to procure. It was one which the statute, under a penalty, required the treasurer to give. Gen. St. 1902, §§ 3445-3454. The law required it to be made for a sum not less than $10,000, and payable to the bank; that it and all its renewals should be kept safely by the president of the bank; that it and all renewals of it should be recorded at length on the books of the bank, and in the office of the Secretary of State; and that it and its renewals should be inspected by the bank commissioners, at every inspection of the bank. The statute further provides that no president or director of the bank shall be surety upon such a bond. Such a bond is to be regarded as one in which, in an important sense, the public have an interest. It is made, not for the benefit of the directors or officers of the bank, but for the benefit and protection of the public having dealings with the bank as its depositors or creditors. Such a bond ought not to be liable to be invalidated, or the sureties upon it released, by anything short of some act of the bank itself, acting within the scope of its powers, through some agent duly authorized to do such act. The unauthorized fraud or neglect of some officer or agent ought not to have any such effect.

The answer does not allege that the bank perpetrated any fraud upon the sureties. It alleges only that the directors did so, and it does not allege, nor does it otherwise appear, that they did so, as the agents of the bank. Indeed it is not even alleged that in so doing they acted as a board. The only duty imposed by statute upon the directors with reference to the treasurer's bond was the duty of accepting or rejecting it. As agents of the bank they had no power, and were not required, to do more, and from the admitted facts in this case it does not appear that in performing that duty the directors, as agents of the bank, were under the further duty of disclosing to the sureties the prior defalcation of the treasurer. Assuming, then, as we have heretofore, for the purposes of discussion, that the answer contains a legal charge of fraud against the directors as such, we are of the opinion that a fraud of that kind cannot avail the sureties in a suit such as this, brought by the bank. But we are also of the opinion that the answer contains no proper charge of fraud even as against the directors.

The fraud charged is the concealment of a material fact. "The term 'conceal' implies something more than a mere failure to disclose. We do not in general speak of a person concealing a thing, unless he is in some way called upon to produce it." Bartholomew v. Warner, 32 Conn. 98, 103, 85 Am. Dec. 251. / The facts alleged in the answer show, on the part of the directors, the nondisclosure of a material fact, rather than the concealment of it; and as a general rule mere nondisclosure of a fact does not amount to fraud, unless the party not disclosing was called upon by the other party to disclose, or his relation to that party was such as to make it his legal or equitable duty to disclose, all material facts. 14 Amer. & Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 66, and cases there cited.

There is nothing in the answer to show that the sureties signed the bond at the request of the directors, or in the presence of the directors, or that the sureties applied to the directors for any information concerning the character or conduct of Mattoon. In short, there is nothing to show that the directors knew anything about the bond or the sureties thereon until it was presented to them for acceptance. It does not appear that the directors had any opportunity to disclose until after the bond was executed and delivered to the bank. The only facts alleged are (1) that the directors, at the time they accepted the bond, knew of the prior defalcation; (2) that the sureties, when they signed the bond, were ignorant of such defalcation; (3) that the directors did not inform the sureties of such defalcation. We think the facts alleged in the answer fail to show that the relation of the parties to each other was such as to make it either the legal or the equitable duty of the directors to disclose to the sureties the prior defalcation, and that upon the admitted facts in this case the failure to disclose such defalcation was not a fraudulent concealment. The court did not err in sustaining the demurrer to the answer. Pine County v. Willard, 39 Minn. 125, 39 N. W. 71, 1 L. R. A. 119, 12 Am. St. Rep. 622; McShane v. Howard Bank, 73 Md. 135, 20 Atl. 776, 10 L. R. A. 553; Life Ins. Co. v. Clinton, 66 N. Y. 326; Roper v. Sangamon Lodge Trustees, 91 Ill. 518, 33 Am. Rep. 60; *Cawley v. There is no error. The other Judges concurred.

COATES v. LOCUST POINT CO. OF CITY OF BALTIMORE.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Dec. 6, 1905.)

1. BROKERS — COMMISSIONS — PROCURING CAUSE OF SALE—EVIDENCE—FINDINGS.

In an action for broker's commissions, evidence held to warrant a finding that the broker was the procuring cause of the sale.

2. SAME—LICENSES.

Where a broker was duly licensed at the time he completed negotiations for the sale of certain real estate by which the purchaser leased the same with an option to purchase, the fact that the broker was not licensed at the time the purchaser elected to exercise such option was no defense to the broker's claim for commissions.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 8, Cent. Dig. Brokers, §§ 2½, 43.]

3. SAME—STATUTES.

Code Pub. Loc. Laws, art. 4, § 658, provides that any person, copartnership, or firm applying for the same, and paying the sum of money provided, may obtain a license as a real estate broker in the city of Baltimore, and section 659 makes it a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine, for any person not licensed to carry on such business. Held, that such law was a mere revenue measure, and that a broker's failure to procure a license was no ground for denying his right to commissions earned on a sale of real estate.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 8, Cent. Dig. Brokers, § 43.]

4. SAME—ACTIONS—LIMITATIONS.

Where a broker sold certain property under a contract by which the purchaser leased the same for a term of years with an option to purchase, which option was exercised on December 31, 1902, the broker's right to commissions did not accrue until that date, and was not barred by the three years' statute of limitations prior to the commencement of an action to recover the same on June 27, 1904.

5. SAME—PAYMENT OF PRICE—AMOUNT OF COMMISSIONS.

Where a broker negotiated a sale of certain property for $31,000, under a contract by which he was to receive 2½ per cent. of the price paid, and the purchaser at the time suit was brought to recover commissions had paid at least $15,000 of the price, the broker was at least entitled to recover commissions on such amount.

Appeal from Baltimore City Court; Danl. Giraud Wright, Judge.

Action by Leonard R. Coates against the Locust Point Company of the City of Baltimore. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BRISCOE, BOYD, SCHMUCKER, JONES, and BURKE, JJ.

James J. Lindsay and R. R. Boarman, for appellant. Edgar Allen Poe, for appellee.

BOYD, J. This suit was instituted to recover commissions for the sale of a lot of ground in the city of Baltimore claimed to have been made by the appellant for the appellee. The defendant pleaded the statute of limitations in addition to the general issue. The first bill of exceptions presents the ruling of the Baltimore city court on an offer of certain evidence, and the second contains a prayer granted by the court, at the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence, which instructed the jury that the plaintiff had offered no evidence legally sufficient to entitle him to recover upon the pleadings, and the verdict must be for the defendant. The questions to be determined are: (1) Did the appellant make the sale for which the commissions are claimed? (2) Does the fact that he was not a licensed real estate broker for 1903, when the deed was made, preclude his recovery? (3) Is the statute of limitations a bar to his recovery? (4) If it be determined that the appellant will be entitled to commissions, was he so entitled when this suit was brought?

1. There can be no doubt from the testimony that the appellant was employed by Dr. Gallagher, the president of the appellee company, to sell the property, and that he was to receive 2½ per cent. commission, if he made the sale. Mr. Levering, the president of the Piedmont-Mt. Airy Guano Company to which the property was conveyed, testified that Dr. Coates called his attention to the property, brought him and Dr. Gallagher together, and that it was through the negotiations begun with Dr. Coates that the arrangement was finally made. That was in the latter part of 1897. On the 16th of December, 1897, an agreement was made between the two companies by which the Locust Point Company leased to the guano company the lot of ground claimed to have been sold by the appellant for the period of three years from the 1st day of January, 1898, at an annual rental of $1,500. The guano company was authorized to sell the machinery contained in the main building upon the demised premises, and apply the proceeds thereof to repairing the main buildings, the wharf, and the flooring of the machine shop, and to replace the platform of the foundry; the proceeds of sale in excess of the repairs, etc., to be paid to the Locust Point Company, less the costs and expenses incident to the sale. It was further agreed that, "at any time during the demise hereby created and not thereafter," the Locust Point Company would, upon the payment of $26,000 and a pro rata proportion of the rent accruing under the demise to the date of the payment of the purchase money, convey the demised premises in fee simple to the guano company by a good and merchantable title, free and clear of all incumbrances. The agreement further provided that the term could, at the option of the guano company, be extended for another term of two years "at the same rent and upon the same terms and conditions as those hereinbefore contained," provided notice was given as therein stated. The president of the guano company testified that it availed itself of the option the day it expired, which was December 31, 1902. The deed was dated the 1st day of January, 1903, and it recites the consideration to be "the sum of five dollars and divers other good and valuable considerations," and conveys this lot of ground and another. A mortgage was given by the guano company to the appellee of the same date as the deed, which recites that the guano company held an option to buy the property demised for the sum of $31,000, and, having determined to avail itself of the option, had issued three promissory notes of even date, each for the sum of $5,000, payable on the 1st days of March, May, and July, 1903, and also its note of $16,000 payable five years after date, as well as certain interest notes. The mortgagor was authorized to pay off the mortgage debt at any time prior to July 1, 1903, and after that date at any time of the maturity of any interest note. It conveyed the two lots of ground and contained the usual provisions for foreclosure in case of default. Mr. Levering testified that $26,000 was paid for one and $5,000 for the other lot of ground. He spoke of the mortgage for $16,000 being given to, the Sheppard-Pratt Asylum, but it is not explained in the record what he meant by that. The lot for which the sum of $26,000 was to be paid is the one that the appellant had undertaken to sell for the appellee. Dr. Gallagher was not willing to spend any money in making the repairs, and the appellee declined to take the property unless they were made. It was then agreed that the machinery spoken of should be sold and the proceeds used. Dr. Coates sold the machinery, and, apparently, he also had a railroad switch built to the property. Mr. Levering said that Dr. Coates was the only person he saw during the negotiations until they were virtually consummated, and then Dr. Gallagher came to instruct Mr. Dawson to draw the lease—the arrangements were carried out as agreed upon by Dr. Coates, who "brought the principals together." Dr. Coates testified that at the time of his employment by Dr. Gallagher it was agreed that he was to have 2½ per cent. commissions. In his testimony is the following: "Q. At the time of your negotiations with Dr. Gallagher was there anything said by Dr. Gallagher as to what commissions you were to receive for making the sale and the carrying out this agreement? A. I was to receive 2½ per cent., if the option was exercised. Q. You were to receive 2½ per cent. if the option was accepted? Is that it? A. That is the idea." There is also evidence that the appellant received $75 commission on the first year's rent, but there is nothing in the record to show that that was received in lieu of the commissions on the sale, in case the option was exercised. There was therefore evidence tending to show that the appellant did make the sale, for it cannot be doubted that, if the appellant's statement is correct, he could not be deprived of the commissions simply because he did not effect a sale at once—he distinctly testified that he was to receive the commissions if the option was exercised, and the evidence tends to show that the agreement or lease was made as the result of his negotiations with Mr. Levering.

This case presents an altogether different question from one in which a broker would be employed to sell property, but simply obtained an option. Of course that of itself would not entitle him to commissions, but in this case the option was exercised, the sale consummated, and, according to the plaintiff, the agreement was that he was to have the commissions if the option was exercised. In Kimberly v. Henderson, 29 Md. 512, the brokers inserted a provision in the contract by which the proposed purchaser had the option of avoiding the contract of sale on payment of a forfeit, and he did avoid it and did not become the purchaser. This court held that, under those circumstances the brokers could not recover the commissions, but the opinion strongly intimated that a different conclusion might have been reached if the party had ultimately become the purchaser. In Leopold v. Weeks, 96 Md. 280, 53 Atl. 987, the contract of sale was conditioned upon the acceptance of the invention referred to by the Reichspostamt after one year's trial of 400 instruments which were to be installed in the city of Berlin. Several extensions to the time were given, with the consent of the parties interested, and the sale was finally consummated. We held that, as Leopold first procured the purchaser and arranged the terms of contract that formed the foundation upon which the sale was ultimately made, he must be regarded as the procuring cause of the sale, notwithstanding the subsequent modification of the contract, and was entitled to the commissions provided for in the agreement creating his agency.

2. Does the fact that the appellant was not a licensed real estate broker in 1903 prevent his recovering the commissions? We cannot understand how that could be. In the first place he did have such license from October 4, 1897, until the 1st day of May, 1899. He was therefore a licensed broker on the 16th of December, 1897, when the agreement was executed, and there is nothing to show that he was not during the entire negotiations with the guano company. The fact that he was not licensed when the option was exercised and the sale consummated could not prevent his recovering commissions on the sale, which was the result of the work done by him when he was licensed, even if it be conceded that his failure to have a license at the time of his negotiations could have such effect. According to the appellant's testimony he rendered the services for which he seeks compensation when he was a licensed broker, and, if that be true, there can be no reason why he should not be entitled to receive his compensation when it became due, although he was not then a licensed broker. But, aside from that, w-think the case of Banks v. McCosker, 82 Md. 518, 34 Atl. 539, 51 Am. St. Rep. 478, is conclusive of the question. In that case this court held that the failure of a hawker and peddler to take out the license required by the Code did not affect the contract between the unlicensed peddler and the purchaser of goods from him. That statute furnished more reason for such a contention as that made by the appellee than the one applicable to real estate brokers does. Section 24 (formerly 27) of article 56 provides that "No hawker or peddler shall buy for sale out of the state, or buy to trade, barter or sell, or offer to trade, barter or sell within the state any goods, wares or merchandise until he shall have first taken out a license for that purpose." The penalty prescribed by that statute for its violation is the imposition of a fine, and this court said: "When the law declares the consequence of its violation, the contract can in no sense be regarded as illegal, unless the law itself, either by its manifest intent or in express terms, so declares it. The provisions of the Code referred to neither directly nor indirectly refer to any consequences save the payment of a fine for a violation of the law, and the failure to pay such fine, so that it can only be regarded as a revenue measure, and does not affect the contract between an unlicensed peddler and the purchaser of goods from him." The statute now under consideration is to be found in article 4 of the Local Code applicable to Baltimore City. Section 658, Code Pub. Loc. Laws, provides that "Any person, copartnership or firm applying for the same, and paying the sum of money herein provided, may obtain a license for carrying on the business of real estate broker in the city of Baltimore," etc. Section 659, Code Pub. Loc. Laws, makes it a misdemeanor and imposes a fine for carrying on such business without first obtaining a license, but does not declare invalid a contract made by one who was not licensed, or indicate that such should be the result. It would seem then to be clearly "a revenue measure," such as was spoken of in Banks v. McCosker. We are therefore of opinion that the plaintiff was not precluded from recovering by reason of anything in that local law. The general laws on the subject do not apply to Baltimore City, but they do not materially differ from this local law in respect to the question under consideration.

3. Nor do we think that the statute of limitations is a bar to the plaintiff's action. As we have already seen, he was only to get the commissions in case the option was exercised. That was not done until December 31, 1902, and therefore the appellant's cause of action did not accrue until then. He could not have sued before that time, and, as this suit was commenced the 27th of June, 1904, the period fixed by the statute of limitations (three years) had not expired.

4. It is impossible to determine from this record just how much of the $26,000 had been received by the appellee when this suit was brought, or whether the circumstances were such as to require the appellant to wait until the purchase money was paid. The agreement between the two companies apparently contemplated the payment of the $26,000 in cash, and it does not appear whether the appellant consented to have the payment of his commission postponed until the money was due under the mortgage, but at least $15,000 of the $31,000 was due, and, as we understand from Mr. Levering's evidence, was paid before the suit was brought. It may be that the appellee also realized on the mortgage before then, as Mr. Levering spoke of the mortgage to the Sheppard-Pratt Asylum for the $16,000, and possibly the appellee had sold it to that institution. But it is apparent that the appellant is entitled to commissions on the $15,000, or at least so much of it as was to be applied to the payment of the $26,000 and hence the court below was in error in granting the prayer which prevented the appellant from recovering anything. We will not undertake to determine from the meager facts that appear in this record whether he can recover commissions on the $16,000, which under the terms of the mortgage was not due for five years. Nor do we deem it necessary to discuss the first bill of exceptions. That exception is thus stated in the record: "To the sustaining of the defendant's objections to any sale made by the plaintiff by which he claims commissions unless he was a licensed real estate broker in the year eighteen hundred and ninety-three, the plaintiff excepted," etc. We suppose it was intended to be "in the year nineteen hundred and three"; but, assuming that to be so, what we have said above on the subject is sufficient. The judgment will be reversed.

Judgment reversed, and new trial awarded; the appellee to pay the costs.

DENTON BROS. v. GILL & FISHER.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Dec. 7, 1905.)

1. SALES—FAILURE OF CONSIDERATION—RE-SALE BY VENDEE—ACTION BY VENDEE.

Where a vendee of a shipment of corn resold it, and there was a shortage, the vendee might recover of his vendor without first having reimbursed his vendee for the shortage.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 43, Cent. Dig. Sales, § 1131.]

2. CUSTOMS AND USAGES—CUSTOM AS AFFECTING CONTRACT.

In order for a custom to be regarded as part of a contract, it must have been actually or constructively known and be consistent with the contract.

3. SAME—CONSISTENCY WITH CONTRACT.

Where a contract for the sale of corn provided, "Any deficiency on bill of lading weights to be paid for by the seller," the contract could not be varied by evidence of a custom whereby, in sales and purchases of corn, the shipping weights taken at port of shipment, as stated in the bill of lading, are final.

Appeal from Superior Court of Baltimore City; Danl. Giraud Wright, Judge.

Action by Denton Bros. against Gill & Fisher. From a judgment in favor of defendants, complainants appeal. Reversed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BOYD, PAGE, PEARCE, SCHMUCKER, JONES, and BURKE, JJ.

John I. Donaldson, for appellants. D. K. Este Fisher, for appellees.

McSHERRY, C. J. The appellants brought suit in the superior court of Baltimore City against the appellees. The declaration contains three of the usual common counts and a fourth count in special assumption. To the common counts the appellees pleaded, and issues were joined thereon; to the special count they demurred, and the lower court sustained the demurrer. The trial then proceeded before a jury on the issues of fact framed on the general issue pleas, and, under the instructions of the court, resulted in a verdict for the appellees, who were the defendants. From the judgment on that verdict this appeal was taken. The questions here involved are, first, the one raised by the demurrer to the fourth count, and, secondly, those arising on the prayers for instructions to the jury. As the question raised by the demurrer and the one arising on the fourth prayer of the appellees, which was granted, and the second prayer of the appellants, which was rejected, are identical, they will be considered together. By doing so but one other inquiry of any consequence will remain to be disposed of, and that is the one presented by the fifth prayer of the appellees, which was also granted, and the first prayer of the appellants, which was rejected.

To simplify the discussion, and with a view to avoid repetition, the facts appearing in the record will now be concisely stated. The appellants, Denton Bros., are grain merchants in Leavenworth, Kan. On September 28, 1899, they sold to the firm of Bowring & Archibald, of New York, 5,000 quarters of No. 2 corn at 43 cents per 56 pounds "cost, freight and insurance to Liverpool," to be shipped in January or February, 1900. Bowring & Archibald, then cabled to C. T. Bowring & Co., Limited, of Liverpool an offer of 5,000 quarters of corn of the same quality on cost, freight, and insurance terms, and the last-named company placed the offer with Montgomery, Jones & Co. who accepted the terms, and C. T. Bowring & Co. cabled Bowring & Archibald of the sale, but C. T. Bowring did not actually buy the corn. Bowring & Archibald then drew, with the documents attached, on C. T. Bowring & Co. in the usual way for the price of the whole 5,000 quarters sold by Denton Bros. to Bowring & Archibald and sold the draft to Bankers. On January 20, 1900, the appellees, Gill & Fisher, through Parker & McIntyre, brokers, sold to Denton Bros. 3,000 quarters (5 per cent. more or less as per London contract) of No. 2 corn at 46 cents per 56 pounds "cost, freight and insurance to Liverpool," to be shipped during February by first class steamer from any Atlantic port, "Payment by sellers' draft at sight on buyers with documents attached as customary." In February the steamship Indore received on board in hold 5 at Baltimore & Ohio Elevator C at Locust Point the corn sold by Gill & Fisher to Denton Bros., and, upon the faith of a certificate from the railroad company's elevator foreman that 3,000 quarters of corn of the grade sold had been loaded aboard the Indore for account of Gill & Fisher, the agents of the Johnston Line of steamships issued to Gill & Fisher three bills of lading for the 3,000 quarters of corn; each bill of lading being for 1,000 quarters. For 3 cents per bushel of the 46 cents agreed price Gill & Fisher drew on Denton Bros., who paid the draft on presentation, and for the balance of the contract price, viz., 43 cents, at the request and by the direction of Denton Bros., Gill & Fisher drew on Bowring & Archibald, with the bill of lading indorsed in blank, the insurance policies and inspection certificates attached, and the draft was paid on presentation. These directions to the appellees were given by Denton Bros. in part performance of their contract with Bowring & Archibald, though no proof was offered that the appellees knew of the existence of that contract. Montgomery, Jones & Co. paid C. T. Bowring & Co. for the whole 5,000 quarters. When the Indore reached Liverpool, about March 7th, Montgomery, Jones & Co. claim that the corn delivered to that vessel on account of Gill & Fisher at Baltimore & Ohio Elevator C weighed out 215,992 pounds short. For the amount of that alleged shortage at the then value of corn in Liverpool, viz., 18 shillings sterling per quarter, Montgomery, Jones & Co. made demand for reimbursement on C. T. Bowring & Co. and were paid by that company the full amount, namely, £349 17s. 3d. C. T. Bowring & Co. then made claim for the same amount on Bowring & Archibald and were allowed therefor in accounts between them. In April, 1900, C. T. Bowring & Co. took over the business of Bowring & Archibald as a going concern and assumed all its assets and liabilities. On February 1, 1901, Denton Bros. made to C. T. Bowring & Co. an assignment of any claim they might have against Gill & Fisher. The record also contains a copy of the "London Contract" referred to in the memorandum of the sale of the 3,000 quarters of corn for account of Gill & Fisher to Denton Bros.; and the following clauses appear in that contract. "Two per cent. more or less"; and "Seller has the option of shipping a further 3 per cent., more or less, on contract quantity, the excess or deficiency over the 2 per cent. to be settled at the c. f. & l. price on date of bill of lading, value to be fixed by arbitration, unless mutually agreed"; and again, "Any deficiency on bill of lading weight to be paid for by seller, and any excess over bill of lading weight to be paid for by buyer at contract price." It is denied by the appellees that there was any shortage in the weight of the corn; but with that contention we have nothing to do, as it is exclusively a matter for the jury to determine.

Compressed into the narrowest compass the situation presented is this: Denton Bros. purchased from Gill & Fisher 3,000 quarters of corn, and sold the same corn to Bowring & Archibald; Bowring & Archibald, through C. T. Bowring & Co., sold the same corn to Montgomery, Jones & Co. The last-named purchasers paid C. T. Bowring & Co. in full. It is alleged that there was a material shortage in the weight when the corn was delivered. Montgomery, Jones & Co. were refunded the amount of that shortage by C. T. Bowring & Co., C. T. Bowring & Co. were refunded the same amount by Bowring & Archibald, and the latter have made a demand on Denton Bros. to refund the same amount. Denton Bros. have not paid back that amount, but have sued Gill & Fisher, their vendors, to recover the sum which they, Denton Bros., are liable to pay on account of the same shortage to their vendee. The question on these facts is, can Denton Bros. maintain this suit until they actually pay back to their vendee the amount claimed by the latter from Denton Bros. on account of that shortage? This question is the one raised by the demurrer to the fourth count of the narr., and by the fourth instruction granted at the instance of the appellees and the second rejected prayer of the appellants. We will dispose of that question before stating or considering the other or remaining inquiry.

If Denton Bros. had not resold the grain to Bowring & Archibald, and if, after they had paid Gill & Fisher the agreed price for the entire 3,000 quarters of corn purchased from the latter, it had been discovered that the vendors had in fact failed to deliver over 200,000 pounds of the corn sold and paid for, it could not be questioned that Denton Bros. would have a sustainable cause of action against Gill & Fisher for a breach of the latter's contract. How can the resale of the corn by Denton Bros. extinguish Gill & Fisher's obligation to comply with their contract, or exonerate them from the consequences of a breach which occasions a failure of consideration? The right of the vendee to recover from the vendor for a failure of consideration is founded on the simple fact that the former has not received from the latter what the vendor sold and agreed to deliver, and what the vendee paid for and contracted to get. The breach consists in the failure of the vendor to live up to his contract, and no subsequent sale of the grain by the vendee can obliterate or condone that breach. If a sale of the same commodity by the vendee to a subvendee extinguishes the responsibility of the vendor to make good a shortage to his vendee, then a payment to the subvendee by his vendor of the damages caused by the shortage would revive the first vendor's responsibility to his vendee; and thus the obligation of the first vendor to make good a deficiency to his vendee would depend, not upon his own breach of the contract of sale, but upon a collateral and independent transaction between the vendee and a third party who is a total stranger to the original contract of sale.

The adjudged cases do not support that view. Allusion will now be made to some of them. Perhaps the most apposite is Randall and Another v. Raper, Ellis, Black & Ellis, 84. The defendant in that case by warranting 30 quarters of seed barley to be then chevalier seed barley, sold the same to the plaintiffs at and for £1 2s. 6d. per quarter which the plaintiffs paid him. The plaintiffs were corn factors and purchased the seed barley for the purpose of reselling it in the way of their trade. The seed barley delivered was not chevalier seed barley. Without any knowledge of the breach of the warranty, and believing the seed to be chevalier seed barley, the plaintiffs sold to several subvendees the same seed barley delivered to them by the defendant, and sold it under a like warranty given by the defendant to the plaintiffs. The subvendees sowed the seed and the seed, not being chevalier seed barley as it had been warranted to be, produced inferior crops, whereby the subvendees were damaged and injured. The plaintiffs then became liable to compensate and make good to the subvendees, respectively, the damages by them so sustained and incurred. The plaintiffs, the original vendees, thereupon sued the vendor to recover the amount for which they were liable, but had not yet paid to the subvendees. Judgment went by default, and the damages were assessed under a writ of inquiry before the deputy sheriff of Essex. A verdict was directed for £261 7s. 6d. reserving leave for the defendant to move to reduce the verdict to £15. Upon a motion to reduce the verdict, heard by the Court of Queen's Bench, it was contended that the verdict should be reduced because the jury were misdirected; and it was argued by Bovill that there ought not to have been any allowance for the damages in respect to the plaintiffs having agreed to make compensation to their subvendees because the amount of the compensation to be paid by the plaintiffs to their vendees had not been ascertained and was not definite. Lord Campbell, C. J., after remarking that, if the plaintiffs had paid the subvendees the amount of the damages claimed by them, there would have been no doubt as to the right of the plaintiffs to recover from the defendant the sums thus paid to the subvendees, observed: "But then it is contended, secondly, that, even if the damages could be recovered in the event of the actual payment, they cannot be recovered upon a mere liability. I think we cannot lay down a rule that the mere liability cannot be the foundation of damages; if it can, the amount may be estimated by a jury. The demand is made, and is a just one; and though it is not yet satisfied, yet the jury may find to what extent the plaintiffs are damaged by their having become liable to it." And Erie, J., said: "But then it is said that here the plaintiffs have made no actual payment; so that, if they recovered such damages in this action, they might put them into their own pockets without paying the subvendees. But I think that the true rule is that a liability to loss is sufficient to give the party liable a title to recover." And Crompton, J., observed: "Taking the narrowest rule as to the probable and necessary consequences of a breach of contract, these damages fall within it. It is said, however, that the plaintiffs have here only incurred a liability, and have made no payment. But I entirely deny that payment is necessary to entitle a party to recover. Liability alone is sufficient. It has always been customary to state in the allegation of special damages, 'whereby the plaintiff became liable to pay.' I recollect a discussion once arising whether an allegation 'whereby the plaintiff paid' was sufficient without an allegation 'whereby the plaintiff became liable to pay'; but I do not recollect a discussion whether the latter allegation was sufficient without the former. In actions for bodily injuries the liability to pay the surgeon's bill is always allowed as an item of damages. In an action for breach of contract you can recover only once, and the action accrues at the moment when the breach occurs. A liability to payment, which has been incurred by a plaintiff in consequence of the breach of a defendant's contract, may well form a part of the damages, though it may be difficult to estimate them." In Josling v. Irvine, 6 Hur. & Nor. 512, Randall v. Raper was referred to with approval, but distinguished. Dingle v. Hare, 7 C. B. N. S. 145, is also directly in point. In Muller v. Eno, 14 N. Y. 597, the syllabus states: "The purchaser may recover for the breach of a warranty, although he has sold the goods and no claim has been made upon him and he is liable to none on account of the alleged defect. Nor in such action is he required to prove the price at which he resold the goods. That price may be evidence of the amount of damages but does not furnish the rule." In the judgment of the court it is said: "The vendor is simply required to make good his own contract, and I do not see how he can discharge that obligation by inquiring into relations between other parties. * * *

The promise is not one of indemnity against loss on a resale." See, also, Passinger v. Thorburn, 34 N. Y. 637, 90 Am. Dec. 753, where Randall v. Raper is cited with approval. In Western Twine Co. v. Wright, 11 S. D. 521, 78 N. W. 942, 44 L. R. A. 438, suit was brought by the vendor of binder twine to recover from the vendee the amount of a promissory note given for the price thereof. Some of the twine had been sold by the vendee to numerous farmers for cash, and they made no claim on the vendee for reimbursement. It was held that the vendee could defeat a recovery on the note at the suit of the vendor to the extent of the actual difference between the real value of the twine and what it would have been worth had it corresponded with the warranty, even though "a part of it had been sold for cash, and no claim has been made by any of the purchasers on account of defects." The case of Wheelock v. Berkeley, 138 Ill. 153, 27 N. E. 942, was cited with approval. In the last-mentioned case it was ruled that in an action for breach of a warranty it is of no consequence what the purchaser may have received from a resale.

The cases cited by the appellees' counsel do not conflict with those above referred to. They arose either upon indemnity bonds or grew out of the evictions, and depended upon entirely different principles. In California Dry Dock Co. v. Armstrong (C. C.) 17 Fed. 221, no question between vendor and vendee was involved at all. We hold, then, for the reasons and upon the authorities already alluded to, that Denton Bros., the legal plaintiffs, were entitled to recover from Gill & Fisher the amount for which they (Denton Bros.) were liable to the subvendees, notwithstanding the fact that Denton Bros. had not paid over the sum for which they were so liable to the subvendees. It follows, therefore, that there was error committed in sustaining the demurrer to the fourth count of the narr., and that the court was wrong in granting the appellees' fourth prayer and in rejecting the appellants' second prayer.

Secondly. The appellees contended that the court, by granting their fifth prayer and by rejecting the appellants' first prayer, ruled that the appellants were not entitled to recover, if the jury should find from the evidence that there existed among grain merchants a general and well-established usage or custom to the effect that, in sales and purchases of corn for shipment to a foreign port, the shipping weights taken at the port of shipment upon loading the vessel, as stated in the bill of lading, should be final; and that, in case of shortage in the outturn at the port of discharge, the purchaser or his assigns should have no claim upon the seller for the value of the shortage. To support that contention and to sustain the rulings upholding it, there must be written into the "London Contract," by force of the usage or custom relied on, some such term as "bill of lading weights final or conclusive." "To be regarded as part of a contract, however, the usage or custom must have both of the following elements: (1) It must be actually or constructively known, and (2) it must be consistent with the contract. If either of these elements is lacking, the usage or custom cannot be regarded as part of the contract." 2 Page on Contracts, § 604. And this court said, in Foley & Woodside v. Mason & Son, 6 Md. 49: "And although evidence of usage is sometimes admissible to add to, or to explain, the terms of an agreement, yet it will never be permitted to vary or contradict the clear and manifest signification of the terms which the contracting parties may think proper to employ to express their meaning." By the express terms of the "London Contract" the usage or custom invoked by the appellees is excluded. If the bill of lading weights are final and conclusive according to the custom, how can that custom be imported into the contract in the face of the explicit provision that "any deficiency on bill of lading weights to be paid for by seller"? The custom set up is absolutely inconsistent with the contract and can only constitute a term of that contract by expunging a diametrically opposite term. When the parties to the contract have distinctly agreed that the bill of lading weights shall not be final—as they have done by stipulating who shall be liable if the weights are erroneous—a custom that they shall be final cannot override the contract, because such a custom is flatly inconsistent with the contract. There was error, therefore, in granting the appellees' fifth prayer and in rejecting the appellants' first prayer. The appellants' third prayer should have been granted. It told the jury that if the whole amount of grain called for by the contract, viz., the 3,000 quarters, was not in fact delivered by the railroad company at its elevator to the steamer Indore, then the surrender by Gill & Fisher of elevator receipts calling for that quantity of corn is, under the pleadings, no defense to this action. The proposition announced is self-evident. If the quantity of grain for which Gill & Fisher were paid was not delivered to their vendee, then their surrender of the warehouse receipts did not relieve them from their liability to their vendee for the shortage in delivery. We do not discover any error in the rejection of the appellants' fourth prayer. It undertook to define the rights of Gill & Fisher against the railroad company, but, as the rights of the former against the latter, and the liabilities of the latter to the former with respect to the alleged shortage in the weight of the corn, are not in any way involved in the pending case, they were not matters with which the jury had any concern. The appellants' fifth prayer was correct and ought to have been granted. It merely told the jury that the appellants had no cause of action against the railroad company on account of the shortage, as there was no contract between that company and them.

The appellees' first prayer related to the burden of proof and was properly granted.

It results from what has been said that the judgment in favor of the appellees must be reversed because of the errors committed in sustaining the demurrer, in granting the appellees' fourth and fifth prayers, and in rejecting the appellants' first, second, third, and fifth prayers, and a new trial will be awarded.

Judgment reversed, with costs above and below, and new trial awarded.

GARITEE v. BOND.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Dec. 7, 1905.)

1. EXECUTORS — COMPETENCY OF PERSON NAMED AS EXECUTOR—CONVICTION OF INFAMOUS CRIME.

One convicted of making an overcharge for prosecuting a pension claim, in violation of Act Cong. June 27, 1890, c. 634, § 4, 26 Stat. 183 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3231], and subject to imprisonment in the discretion of the court, has not been convicted of a "crime rendering him infamous according to law," within Code Pub. Gen. Laws, art. 93, § 51, making one convicted of a "crime rendering him infamous according to law" disqualified from acting as executor, though it be assumed that in the contemplation of the federal jurisdiction the offense be deemed an infamous one.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 22, Cent. Dig. Executors and Administrators, §§ 32, 77; vol. 27, Cent. Dig. Indictment and Information, §§ 10-22; vol. 50, Cent. Dig. Witnesses, § 111.]

Appeal from Orphans' Court of Baltimore City; Myer J. Block, Wm. J. O'Brien, and Harry C. Gaither, Judges.

Application by Charles E. Garitee for letters testamentary on the estate of Sophia V. Chambers, deceased. From an order denying the application, on the petition of William A. Bond, the applicant appeals. Reversed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BOYD, PEARCE, SCHMUCKER, JONES, and BURKE, JJ.

Joseph W. Bristor and Thomas O. Ruddell, for appellant. W. Ashbie Hawkins, for appellee.

SCHMUCKER, J. The appellant was named as executor in the last will of Sophia V. Chambers, late of Baltimore City. Upon his application to the orphans' court of that city for letters testamentary upon her estate, the appellee, claiming to be the adopted son of the testatrix, filed a petition asking that the letters be refused, because the appellant had been convicted of, and imprisoned for, an infamous crime, and had been disbarred as an attorney by the supreme bench of Baltimore City for unprofessional conduct, involving moral turpitude. The appellant answered the petition, denying that he had been convicted of any infamous offense, or that he was not a fit and proper person to act as executor, and insisting that the matters alleged in the petition would not justify the court in refusing to grant him letters testamentary. The record contains no evidence touching the appellant's alleged disbarment by the supreme bench, nor is that allegation adverted to or noticed in the order appealed from; but there does appear in the record a transcript of proceedings from the District Court of the United States for the District of Maryland showing his indictment and conviction for a violation of the act of Congress approved June 27, 1890, c. 634, § 4, 26 Stat. 183 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3231]. That act provides as follows: "No agent, attorney or other person engaged in preparing, presenting or prosecuting any claim under the provisions of this act, shall directly or indirectly, contract for, demand, receive or retain for such services in preparing, presenting or prosecuting such claim, a sum greater than ten dollars, which sum shall be payable only upon the order of the commissioner of pensions by the pension agent making payment of the pension allowed; and any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this section or who shall wrongfully withhold from a pensioner or claimant the whole or any part of a pension or claim allowed or due such person or claimant under this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof, shall for each and every offense be fined not exceeding $500 or be imprisoned at hard labor not exceeding 2 years or both in the discretion of the court."

The indictment in the District Court charges the appellant with having, in violation of the statute, unlawfully demanded and received from a pensioner for prosecuting his claim for the pension the sum of $12, which was not paid to him upon the order of the commissioner of pensions by the pension agent making payment of the pension. It does not appear from the proceedings whether the traverser charged the pensioner $12 in addition to the $10 fee contemplated by the law, but it does appear that the $12 were collected from the pensioner in violation of the statute.

The orphans' court, upon a hearing of the matter thus presented to it, passed the order appealed from on July 12, 1905, declaring that the appellant "be, and he is hereby, removed as executor of the will of Sophia V. Chambers, he having been convicted of an infamous crime, and that letters testamentary to him be refused." It is conceded that the orphans' court in passing this order acted in exercise of power supposed to have been conferred upon it by section 51, art. 93, of the Code of Public General Laws, which provides as follows: "If any person named as executor in a will shall be at the time when administration ought to be granted under the age of eighteen years or of unsound mind incapable according to law of making a contract or convicted of any crime rendering him infamous according to law, or if any person named as executor shall not be a citizen of the United States, letters testamentary or of administration may be granted in the same manner as if such person had not been named in the will."

Without pausing to consider the propriety of the form of the order appealed from, we pass to the discussion of the most important question presented by the record, which is whether the offense of which the appellant was convicted in the federal court was an infamous one, within the meaning of section 51, art. 93, Code Pub. Gen. Laws. The authorities differ in their definition of an "infamous crime." Some of them rely for that purpose upon the character of the crime with reference to its degree of moral turpitude, while others hold that the true test is the nature of the punishment inflicted for the commission of the offense. The definition has in some instances been made to depend largely upon the connection in which the designation "infamous" was applied to the offense and the purpose intended to be accomplished by its use. Thus, in construing the provision of the federal Constitution which prohibits prosecution for "a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury," the Supreme Court of the United States in the habeas corpus case of Ex parte Wilson, 114 U. S. 422, 5 Sup. Ct. 935, 29 L. Ed. 89, held that the provision must be considered, not merely from the standpoint of the character of the crime, but also from the nature of the consequences to the accused if he should be found guilty, and it discharged the prisoner, whose offense was punishable by imprisonment for a term of years at hard labor, because he had been tried and convicted upon a mere information without indictment or presentment by a grand jury. The court in that case gave to the constitutional provision then under consideration, which was manifestly adopted for the benefit of accused persons, that construction which afforded to the greatest number of such persons the benefit of its operation. That decision was followed by a number of others in the same court, holding that imprisonment in the penitentiary was infamous punishment. Mackin v. U. S., 117 U. S. 348, 6 Sup. Ct. 777, 29 L. Ed. 909; In re Mills, 135 U. S. 263, 10 Sup. Ct. 762, 34 L. Ed. 107; In re Claasen, 140 U. S. 200, 11 Sup. Ct. 735, 35 L. Ed. 409. But even in Wilson's Case it was held that at common law, prior to the Declaration of Independence, "it was already established law that the infamy which disqualified a convict to be a witness depended upon the character of his crime, and not upon the nature of his punishment." The authorities generally, though not with entire uniformity, hold that the infamous nature of a crime was determined at common law by the character of the act itself, and not by the penalty inflicted for its commission. The crimes which the common law regarded as infamous because of their moral turpitude were treason, felony, perjury, forgery, and those other offenses, classified, generally, as crimen falsi, which impressed upon their perpetrator such a moral taint that to permit him to testify in legal proceedings would injuriously affect the public administration of justice. Rex v. Ford, 2 Salk. 690; Bouv. Law Dict. 1027; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 873; Whart. Crim. Law, § 758; Bish. Crim. Law, § 974; Utley v. Merrick, 52 Mass. 302; 12 Cyc. 135; 16 Am. & Eng. Encyc. p. 247, and cases there cited; In re Butler, 84 Me. 25, 24 Atl. 456, 17 L. R. A. 704; State v. Nolan, 15 R. I. 529, 10 Atl. 481. Our predecessors had occasion in the case of State v. Bixler, 62 Md. 380, to determine what constituted an infamous crime, within the meaning of section 2, art. 1, of the Constitution of this state, which prohibits from voting at any election a person "convicted of larceny or other infamous crime unless pardoned by the Governor." It is said in the opinion in that case: "An 'infamous crime' is such a crime as involved moral turpitude, or such as rendered the offender incompetent as a witness in court; upon the theory that a person would not commit so heinous a crime unless he was so depraved as to be unworthy of credit. 1 Abb. Law Dict. 602, and authorities there cited. The general court of this state in Evans v. Bonner, 2 Har. & McH. 378, defined 'infamous crime' to be one which rises at least 'to the grade of felony.' This is, however, too narrow, for perjury is a misdemeanor, but by all authority is 'infamous.' The Constitution in providing for exclusion from suffrage of persons whose character was too bad to be permitted to vote could only have intended by the language used such crimes as were infamous at common law, and are described as such in common-law authorities. * * * There are many misdemeanors punishable by confinement in the penitentiary which are clearly not infamous crimes within the meaning of the common law or of the Constitution. If, for example, the prisoner had been convicted of any of the assaults with intent mentioned and punished by the Code, and had been sentenced to the penitentiary, and served his time out there without being pardoned by the Governor, he would not be chargeable with having committed an 'infamous crime.'" Construing, therefore, as we should, the expression "infamous crime," used in section 51, art. 93, of the Code, in the same manner that our predecessors construed it when used in the Constitution, we are compelled to hold that the statutory offense of which the appellant was convicted cannot be regarded by us an infamous one merely because it was punishable, at the discretion of the court, by a term of imprisonment, which that court might, in the exercise of its recognized power, have required him to serve in a penitentiary. Nor do we think that the statutory offense of which the appellant was convicted (of making an overcharge for services in prosecuting a claim for a pension, and collecting the fee so charged without complying with the provisions of the statute) involved the degree of moral turpitude which would have been requisite to make his transgression an infamous crime at common law.

Even if we assume that, in the contemplation of the federal jurisdiction in which the appellant was tried and convicted, his offense would be regarded from the nature of its punishment as an infamous one, that jurisdiction must be considered quoad hoc as foreign to that of the Maryland courts. Logan v. U. S., 144 U. S. 308, 12 Sup. Ct. 617, 36 L. Ed. 429; Langdon v. Evans, 3 Mackey (D. C.) 1. In Logan's Case the Supreme Court held that both "at common law and on general principles of jurisprudence, when not controlled by express statute giving effect within the state which enacts it to a conviction and sentence in another state, such conviction and sentence can have no effect, by way of disqualification of a witness, beyond the limits of the state in which the judgment is rendered." See, to same effect, Com. v. Green, 17 Mass. 515; National Trust Co. v. Gleason, 77 N. Y. 400, 33 Am. Rep. 632; Story, Conf. Laws, § 92.

The orphans' court were therefore in error in treating the appellant as disqualified to fill the office of executor because he had been convicted and sentenced by the District Court of the United States for the offense mentioned in the record, and for that error the order appealed from must be reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

Order reversed, with costs, and cause remanded for further proceedings.

THOMAS v. GOTTLIEB BAUERN-SCHMIDT STRAUS BREWING CO.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Dec. 7, 1905.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT—LEASE—OPTION TO PURCHASE—CONSTRUCTION.

A lease for a year contained a proviso that the "agreement, with all its provisions and covenants," should continue in force from time to time after the expiration of the year, provided that the parties could terminate the same at the end of the year or any term thereafter, and stipulated that the tenant should have the right to purchase the premises "at the end of said term" for a fixed sum. Held, that the tenant's option to purchase could be exercised at the end of the year, or every succeeding year until the lease was terminated.

2. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—CONTRACTS ENFORCEABLE—MISTAKE.

Equity will not compel one to perform a contract which he did not intend to make, and which he would not have entered into had its true effect been understood.

3. SAME — EVIDENCE OF MISTAKE — SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence on the issue whether a stipulation in a lease for a year with the privilege of renewals, which gave the lessee the option to purchase during the renewal periods, was inserted through misapprehension on the part of the lessor, examined, and held not to warrant a finding that the stipulation was inserted through misapprehension, such as to justify equity in refusing to grant the lessee the right to exercise the option.

4. SAME—MUTUALITY OF OBLIGATION.

Where a lessee notified the lessor of its intention to purchase the property under the terms of the lease, giving the lessee an option to purchase, the stipulation granting the option became enforceable at the instance of the lessor or lessee.

5. SAME—REQUISITES OF CONTRACT.

Relief by way of specific performance is not a matter of right, and to warrant the granting of it the contract must be fair, certain, founded on an adequate consideration, and free from suspicion as to its bona fides.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Baltimore County; N. Charles Burke, Judge.

Suit by the Gottlieb Bauernschmidt Straus Brewing Company against Hannah Thomas. From a decree for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BRISCOE, BOYD, PAGE, PEARCE, JONES, and SCHMUCKER, JJ.

Edward S. Kines, for appellant. Elmer J. Cook, for appellee.

McSHERRY, C. J. This is an appeal from a decree passed by the circuit court for Baltimore county sitting in equity. The decree required the appellant, who was the defendant below, to execute specifically a certain contract for the sale of a house and lot situated in that county by conveying the same to the appellee. The Gottlieb Bauernschmidt Straus Brewing Company, a body corporate, filed its bill of complaint against Hannah Thomas on April 14, 1904. The bill alleged, in substance, that the defendant, the appellant here, being the owner of the real estate in controversy, subject to an annual ground rent of $45, demised and leased the same to the Maryland Brewing Company, a body corporate, for the term of one year, beginning on the 1st day of May, 1900, and ending on the 30th day of April, 1901, at a specific rent, payable monthly, and that the lease contained a proviso "that this agreement, with all its provisions and covenants, shall continue in force from term to term after the expiration of the term above mentioned, provided, however, that the parties hereto, or either of them, can terminate the same at the end of the term above mentioned, or of any term thereafter, by giving at least thirty days previous notice thereof in writing." The bill further alleged, and the lease itself confirms the averment, that the next succeeding clause of the agreement stipulated "that the said tenant shall have the right to purchase said property at the end of said term for the sum of two thousand dollars." The bill charges that on August 10, 1901, the plaintiff, the appellee here, acquired all the rights and property of the Maryland Brewing Company, including the lease and option of purchase aforesaid, with the knowledge of the appellant, who recognized the appellee as her tenant and as the assignee of said agreement of lease and option of purchase; that, desiring to avail itself of the option of purchase, the appellee corporation during the continuance of the lease so notified the appellant, "and duly tendered the sum of two thousand dollars ($2,000) upon the execution to it of a proper deed of said premises, and is now ready to pay the same, but the said Hannah Thomas refuses to receive it," and that she "refuses to make a conveyance of the said property to your orator, as she rightfully ought to do." The prayers for relief are, first, that the agreement may be specifically enforced; and, secondly, for general relief. The bill was demurred to, the demurrer was overruled, and the appellant then answered.

The main defenses set up in the answer are, first, that the option of purchase terminated on April 30, 1901 without the Maryland Brewing Company having made any attempt to close the option. In view of one of the contentions relied on in behalf of the appellant, it will not be amiss to advert at this point to an admission contained in her answer under oath. That admission is as follows: The Maryland Brewing Company, "desiring to use the property for a saloon, said through its accredited agent that it did not care to purchase until they knew the character and amount of business that could be done, and requested an option of one year to test the business, and promised that, if the same was satisfactory, to purchase the same at the end of the year, to wit, on the 30th day of April, 1901, and, upon the promise of this defendant to give said option, it was incorporated in the agreement of rental." The second ground of defense is that the appellee never had an option of purchase, inasmuch as the option had expired before the appellee succeeded to the rights of the Maryland Brewing Company; and, thirdly, that no claim was ever made by the appellee that it intended to exercise any option until after the appellant had sold the property to another person. A general replication was filed, and testimony was then taken.

At the argument in this court three reasons were assigned by the appellant for a reversal of the decree, viz.: First. As contended in the answer, because the lease did not give an option which extended beyond April 30, 1901, and, as the option had not been availed of before that date, it had expired and is no longer binding. Secondly. Because the extrinsic facts proven in the case show that the appellant never intended to give any option at all beyond the first year, and therefore that it would be inequitable to force her to make a conveyance which was not within her contemplation when she signed the lease. Thirdly. Because the contract as embodied in the lease is not mutual, and cannot, therefore, be enforced specifically at the suit of the party not obligated by it to purchase. These three reasons will be considered in the order just named.

First, then, what is the true interpretation of the provision of the lease relating to this subject? There is a distinct agreement that the tenant shall have the right to purchase the property "at the end of the said term" for the sum of $2,000. What is the end of said term? Is it the end of the first year, or is it the end of any succeeding year thereafter during the continuance of the lease? The lease itself must and does furnish an answer. "This agreement, with all its provisions and covenants, shall continue in force from term to term after the expiration of the term above mentioned [that is, after the term of one year, ending April 30, 1901] provided, however, that the parties hereto, or either of them, can terminate the same at the end of the term above mentioned, or of any term thereafter, by giving at least thirty days' previous notice thereof in writing." The parties themselves have in the contract itself defined the meaning of the phrase "at the end of said term," for they have declared that the agreement, with all its provisions and covenants, and therefore with the provision and covenant giving the option of purchase, shall continue in force from term to term after the expiration of the first year, though to each of the parties the right was reserved to terminate the lease at the end of the first term, or of any term thereafter. It is obvious, then, that the parties to the agreement defined each year to be a term within and subject to every provision and covenant applicable to the first year; and hence it must follow that, if the option of purchase was a provision or covenant which could have been exercised during the first year, it continued in force during every succeeding year or term, until the lease was brought to an end by the method therein prescribed. The right of the tenant to purchase the property is, as was stated by this court in Maughlin v. Perry & Warren, 35 Md. 357, "a continual obligation running with the lease on the part of the lessor, with the option in the tenant to accept the same or not within that time." Maughlin v. Perry & Warren is decisive of this branch of the case at bar. It appeared there that one Wells on March 9, 1864, rented certain property to Hynson for three years, renewable for a similar period, with covenant binding the lessor to sell and convey unto the lessee the demised premises for the sum of $1,500 at any time before the expiration of the lease of tenancy. On March 15, 1867, Wells sold the same property to Maughlin for $1,600, and the purchase money was paid. Wells died intestate before the expiration of the three years for which the lease had been renewed. All the rights of Hynson, the tenant who had the option of purchase, became vested through meane assignments in Perry and Warren. Under these circumstances, six days before the expiration of the renewal of the lease a bill was filed by Perry and Warren, alleging that they were ready to pay the stipulated sum of $1,500, and praying for a specific performance of the contract. Maughlin resisted, on the ground that the acceptance of the option had not been in time, since it was not made during the original term of three years, and not until six days prior to the expiration of the renewal term, and that the mere offer in the bill to pay the money was not a sufficient compliance with the contract. This court ruled against both contentions, using the language hereinbefore quoted. As Maughlin had notice of the contract which gave Hynson the option, it was held that he did not acquire any greater right than Wells possessed. In the case at bar, Smith, who purchased from the appellant, knew of the option contract before he bought, and he secured no right superior to that of the appellee.

It would seem, then, both in view of the terms of the lease and in virtue of the decision by this court of Maughlin v. Perry & Warren, that the option of purchase incorporated in the lease was a continual obligation, running with the lease on the part of the appellant, with the option in the tenant to accept the same or not during each successive term which the lease created; and therefore the option had not expired when a tender was made of the agreed purchase money, and a deed was demanded during the continuance of the lease. So much for the defenses set up in the answer.

Secondly. Do the extrinsic facts show that the appellant did not intend to give any option at all beyond the first year, and that, consequently, the insertion of the renewal and extension clause providing therefor was a mistake which ought not to be binding on the lessor? The paragraph we have quoted from the answer distinctly admits that an option of purchase was given for one year. It is a settled principle that a court of equity will not grant its affirmative remedy to compel the defendant to perform a contract which he did not intend to make, and which he would not have entered into had its true effect been understood. Somerville v. Coppage, 101 Md. —, 61 Atl. 818. But the evidence shows that an effort was made by the Maryland Brewing Company within the first year to close the option, and at the earnest solicitation of the appellant the matter was permitted to stand open, and the relation of landlord and tenant was allowed to continue under the lease. Though Mrs. Thomas denies this, the preponderance of testimony is against her, and it is reasonably clear that she asked the agent of the Maryland Brewing Company not to insist upon closing the option during the first year of the tenancy, without intimating that it was her understanding that the privilege to purchase lapsed at the expiration of the first term of one year. While she stated in one portion of her testimony that she said to the person who took the lease to her for her signature, "There's one mistake; that's the two thousand dollars; I have set no price"—she admits a little later on that, had the lessee taken the property "when the year was up, it would have been all right." She must, therefore, have known that the purchase price had been agreed upon at $2,000; and, as she read the lease before signing it, and had her son read it with her, she must have understood, not only that an option of purchase at a named price had been provided therein, but also that the same option continued from term to term during the period the lease remained in force. We do not find that the testimony makes out such a case of misapprehension or misunderstanding in respect to the provisions of the agreement as would justify a court of equity in refusing to grant the relief prayed for. The evidence does not bring the case within the principle applied in Somerville v. Coppage and that class of decisions.

Thirdly. The defense relied on in the argument and founded on the supposed want of mutuality in the contract cannot prevail. If a contract is lacking in mutuality, it cannot be enforced. Whenever, as a general proposition, a contract is from any cause incapable of being enforced against one party, that party will not be permitted to enforce it against the other. Both parties must have a right to compel a specific performance at the date of the decree, or neither will have it. Dixon v. Dixon, 92 Md. 440, 48 Atl. 152. Agreements upon condition and options are within the rule, but when the condition has been performed or the option has been closed, the right of the respective parties to demand specific performance becomes mutual. Dixon v. Dixon, supra. Here the option was closed within the life of the lease. When the appellee corporation tendered itself ready to pay the money, and announced to the appellant its intention to purchase the property under the terms of the agreement, the contract ceased to be a mere option, and became a mutually binding obligation, which could have been enforced at the instance of the appellant just as effectively as at the suit of the appellee. Before the bill was filed, and, of course, before the decree was signed, both parties to the contract had an equal right to compel a specific performance. The cases cited by the appellant's counsel are not at variance with this conclusion. Take, for illustration, the case of Geiger & Patterson v. Green, 4 Gill, 472, where the contract under which Green claimed granted him a mere "privilege of digging and moving ore" at 25 cents per ton on the farm of Charlotte Owings, but imposed no obligation on Green to do anything but to pay for each ton of ore he might dig. He did not contract to dig any particular quantity or any ore whatever, and he had entered into no obligation of any sort, and of course no decree could be passed requiring him to specifically perform something which he had not undertaken to do. But an option of purchase at a specific price is a very different thing. It is a continuing offer for a definite time, which, upon acceptance within that time, becomes a definite contract, mutually binding on both parties, and hence capable of being enforced by either against the other. The case of King v. Warfield, 67 Md. 246, 9 Atl. 539, 1 Am. St. Rep. 384, is also totally dissimilar. That was a suit on a conditional contract—a contract which was to be binding only in the event that a contingency, over which a third party had exclusive control, should happen. The contingency did not happen, and consequently the incomplete contract never ripened into a perfected agreement, and hence no suit could be maintained upon it. In Duvall v. Myers, 2 Md. Ch. 401, an application was made for the specific performance of a contract for the sale of growing timber, but the contract relied on was not signed by the vendor, Duvall, or by any one for him, and when he sought to enforce it he was met with the objection that it was lacking in mutuality; and since, by reason of his not having signed it, it could not be enforced against him at the suit of the vendee, he could not compel the vendee, who had signed it, to execute it. The chancellor observed: "The paper says 'I have sold.' Who has sold? Who is the party who has contracted with the defendant? The paper does not inform us, and it may as well be any one else as Duvall. Where, then, in the agreement which he seeks to have specifically executed against the defendant is the reciprocal obligation on his part?" The case is clearly distinguishable from the one at bar. In Billingslea v. Ward, 33 Md. 48, a bill was filed by Ward for the specific enforcement of a parol contract alleged to have been made between one Green in his lifetime and Ward for the sale of land by the former to the latter. The evidence adduced by Ward consisted of declarations made by Green, and the evidence adduced by Green's executor comprised declarations made by Ward, to the effect that the contract was not final or conclusive, but left Ward the option to retain or to surrender the property of which, at the time the alleged contract was made, Ward was tenant. There was no sufficient proof of the contract, and no adequate evidence of part performance to take the case out of the statute of frauds. Tyson v. Watts, 7 Gill, 124, was quite similar to Geiger v. Green, supra. "After carefully collating these contracts," said this court in 7 Gill, 157, "we think the case at bar cannot be distinguished from the case of Geiger v. Green." No further comment is needed to show that Tyson v. Watts is inapplicable to the case before us.

It is undoubtedly the settled doctrine of courts of equity that relief by way of specific performance is not a matter of right to be demanded ex debito justitiæ, and that to warrant the granting of such relief the contract must be fair, certain, and mutual, it must be founded on an adequate consideration, and must be free from any suspicion as to its bona fides. All these requisites have been met. The certainty and mutuality of the agreement have been considered; there is nothing in the record to question its fairness. The consideration has been shown to be adequate and full, and there is not a suggestion of bad faith in the entire transaction.

We see no reason to disturb the decree of the circuit court, and it will accordingly be affirmed.

Decree affirmed, with costs above and below.

McDERMOTT v. BENNETT.

JOHNSTON v. BENNETT.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Nov. 4, 1905.)

JUDGMENT—CONFESSION—FRAUD AND COERCION—OPENING.

Where an affidavit, on a rule to open judgment entered on a judgment note given to an attorney by his client when in serious difficulties, avers fraud and coercion, and the circumstances of the note are such as to justify judicial investigation, the judgment is properly opened.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 80, Cent. Dig. Judgment, §§ 109, 116, 120.]

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Allegheny County.

Actions by Frank P. McDermott and by Aaron E. Johnston against Laura Biggar Bennett. From orders discharging rules to open the judgments in both cases, defendant appeals. Reversed.

The petition for the rule averred as follows: "That Frank P. McDermott secured by fraud and coercion a certain judgment note of $1,500 in the month of July, 1903. The nature of such fraud and coercion will more fully be shown by revelation of all the circumstances connected with the same, to wit: On or about the month of September, A. D. 1902, in the city of Long Branch, Monmouth county, N. J., your petitioner was charged with the crimes of perjury and conspiracy by one Peter J. McNulty, an executor of the will of Henry M. Bennett; said perjury and conspiracy being charged against your petitioner because she established her wifehood to H. M. Bennett, and because she proved the death of a posthumous child as a result of said marriage. That your petitioner in the month of November, 1902, surrendered herself voluntarily into the custody of said court of Monmouth county. That about the month of December, 1902, she was indicted for said crimes by the grand jury of Monmouth county. That on representation to the general sessions court of Monmouth county, New Jersey, that she being unable to retain counsel, she being penniless, the said court assigned Messrs. Frank

P. McDermott and Aaron Johnston, both of the Monmouth county bar, to defend her. That upon being so assigned the said Johnston and McDermott immediately visited said petitioner and codefendants in the jail of Monmouth county, and told said petitioner that her interests in said trial could not be successfully guarded and that trial would not be very well prepared or conducted, except petitioner would sign an agreement wherein she promised to pay said McDermott and Johnston and one Joseph Noonan the sum of $10,000 jointly. Said agreement, which cannot be found, was based on the consideration above, and on the promises of said McDermott and Johnston to procure bail for codefendants of petitioner, who were indicted for the same crimes, and on consideration of the expenditure of necessary disbursements at trials, and of expenses of an appeal to a higher court if a conviction would result. That said agreement provided, among other things, that no part of said moneys in said agreement would be asked for until said petitioner's estate, under the will of Henry M. Bennett, was satisfactorily settled, and that at no time was she to pay said McDermott and Johnston any more than one-third of her actual income as received from said estate. That each and every condition of said agreement was and is violated by said McDermott and Johnston. Your petitioner further shows that since and before and at the times she was charged with said crimes that she was ill in body and mind, and that the conduct of said attorneys has been of such unfairness to petitioner that she has suffered very much. That your petitioner further shows that said attorneys at the time they were assigned by said court to defend petitioner they visited her in the Monmouth county jail, and told her that owing to the prejudice entertained towards her that they could not fully defend her except she would sign the said agreement. That they spent nothing in the way of disbursements. That they discouraged publicly many offers of bail for her codefendants. That they neglected to get evidence on the demand of her codefendants that they alone could get. That they positively repudiated voluntary witnesses who offered their services in her behalf. That all the witnesses who appeared at petitioner's trial were treated with indifference by said attorneys. That all expenditures of moneys at the trial and for appeal were paid by said petitioner. That your petitioner's codefendants were convicted (your petitioner being acquitted) of said crimes, December 24, 1902. That on or about the 1st day of July, 1903, the last day on which briefs could be filed on the appeal of the codefendants to the Supreme Court of New Jersey, said attorneys notified your petitioner that except she paid the money due on said agreement or gave judgment notes of $1,500 each to them, and also a

$1,500 judgment note to lawyer Noonan, that no appeal would be filed, and that her codefendants would have to serve their sentences of two years and a half, and pay a fine of $1,000 each, and that she would, as a result, never appear before the world as innocent. That at the time this misrepresentation was made the appeal and briefs were actually on file in the Supreme Court at Trenton, N. J., as petitioner found out later on. That on this fraudulent and cruel representation your petitioner executed said judgment notes in lieu of said agreement. That before she executed said notes said attorneys made a written agreement connected with the same to the effect that no attempts would be made to collect on said notes or force the collection on same, until she were able to pay."

The court discharged the rule.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

Charles R. Carruth, for appellant. Thomas Patterson, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. These two cases are substantially alike, and were argued together. The appellant in her affidavit for a rule to open the judgment sets out that the notes were given to counsel by a client, who was in serious difficulties, under circumstances which, even if they should not be shown to amount to fraud and coercion as charged, are certainly such as to justify full investigation.

Order reversed, and rule directed to be allowed.

MORGAN v. WESTMORELAND ELECTRIC CO.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

1. ELECTRICITY — NEGLIGENCE — ACTION — STATEMENT.

Where the statement in an action against an electric light company to recover for death of plaintiff's son charged that defendant operated two lines of wire from its main line to the cross-arms of a pole sustaining certain telephone wires, and negligently permitted the wires without proper care to be placed on the cross-arm of said pole, charging the arm with a powerful current of electricity, and the action was tried on the theory that such act was a part of the construction, it was sufficient to give notice to the defendant that the plan of the construction was brought into question.

2. PLEADING—WAIVER OF DEFECTS.

Where a certain question was treated by both parties as in issue, it was too late to question the sufficiency of the averment as to such issue after a trial on the merits.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 39, Cent. Dig. Pleading, §§ 1848-1851.]

3. ELECTRICITY—NEGLIGENCE.

In an action against an electric light company to recover for the death of plaintiff's son, an employé of a telephone company, held, that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that his death was caused by contact with an iron brace charged with electricity by the negligence of defendant.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Westmoreland County.

Action by Elizabeth Morgan against the Westmoreland Electric Company to recover for the death of her son. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The court charged in part as follows: "The manner of conducting the current through between the strands of the telephone company's wires and along the cross-arm on which they are supported has been referred to, and you must determine, by an application of the test that we have given you, whether such construction is faulty. If faulty and defective, and by reason of that fault and defect, the plaintiff's decedent has been injured, if that has been the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury, then there would be a right to recover. * * * In so far as construction is concerned the defendant company needs no notice. Having itself constructed it, it has all the notice that is necessary."

Defendant presented these points: "(2) Even if the jury should find that these two electric wires or either of them were defectively insulated, the defendant would not, on that account, be liable for the death of plaintiff's decedent, there being no evidence that the defendant had notice of the defective insulation, and no evidence as to the cause of the defect. Answer: We have already spoken at some length on that point in the general charge. The question referred to in this point cannot with propriety be disposed of as a question of law by the court. There is evidence respecting the manner in which the wires were carried through on the cross-arms, which tends to show the mode adopted from the beginning to have been faulty in construction. With respect to such faulty construction, if it exists, no notice is necessary. With respect to the wires being in a defective state of repair, notice is necessary, but it may be constructive as well as direct. There is testimony bearing on the ordinary life of insulation and also on the length of time these wires had been in use. There is testimony tending to show that the wire had sagged from its proper position, and that the insulation was worn off at the point of contact with the carriage bolt. If the insulation was, in fact, removed by erosion, the consideration of the question of the duration of time while that process was going on is not irrelevant. There is evidence that several years before a wire on the upper cross-arm, when it had become displaced, caused a lineman to receive a shock. Although that specific displacement of the other wire was at once remedied, and did not exist at the time of the accident, yet it may be considered specific notice of the danger attending a displacement of the wire, and an admonition with respect to the thoroughness with which inspection should be maintained. The high voltage of the current is also an admonition with respect to what thoroughness of inspection is due. The defendant may be held responsible for defects in the state of repair of its appliances of which it has express notice, and also for accidents arising from defects which this supervision, reasonably exercised, would have disclosed. Whether there was a long or a short period of displacement of the wire and wearing of the insulation which an ordinary diligent examination exacted by the circumstances would have disclosed, is a question for the jury, especially when we consider the nature of the inspection which the defendant company's testimony shows was made. The question of notice seems to us to be one not to be disposed of as a question of law by the court, and the point is therefore refused.

* * * (8) Under all the evidence in this case, and under the pleadings, your verdict must be for the defendant. Answer: This point is refused for the reasons that are already indicated."

Verdict and judgment for plaintiff for $8,000. Defendant appealed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

John B. Head, D. S. Atkinson, W. C. Peoples, and J. S. Moorhead, for appellant. Curtis H. Gregg and Sidney J. Potts, for appellee.

FELL, J. Three questions are presented by the specifications of error: (1) Did the issue raised by the pleadings include the subject of the original construction of the appellant's lines of electric light wires? (2) Was there sufficient evidence of constructive notice of defective insulation to sustain a recovery on the ground of failure to maintain the wires in a safe condition? (3) Did the evidence warrant the conclusion that defective insulation of one of the wires was the proximate cause of the accident?

It is averred in the declaration that the appellant owned, maintained, and operated two lines of wires extending from its main line to the cross-arms of a pole which sustained a number of telephone wires; that, not regarding its duty to maintain these wires in a safe condition, it "negligently and carelessly allowed and permitted said two wires without proper insulation to be placed on a cross-arm of said pole, thereby charging said arm and braces attached with a powerful current of electricity." The placing of the wire on the cross-arm was a part of the construction, and the averment gave notice to the appellant that the plan of construction was brought into question. The case was tried upon this theory. Testimony as to the construction as it existed at the time of the accident was admitted, without objection that it did not support the declaration, and affirmative evidence was introduced by the appellant to show the plan of original construction. If there is doubt as to the sufficiency of the averment, it is too late to raise it after a trial on the merits, in which the question was treated by both parties as a part of the issue.

On the question of constructive notice, the instruction was that with respect to faulty construction notice was unnecessary since the appellant must be held to have notice of what it had designedly done; and with respect to a defective state of repair, it must be held to know that which supervision reasonably exercised would have disclosed. This instruction was correct. It was called for because there was evidence tending to show that the manner in which the electric wires were carried through a network of telephone wires was faulty, and that the wire alleged to have caused the injury had been in use a number of years and had sagged, and that its insulation had worn off.

The main contention of the appellant is that there was not sufficient evidence of any negligent act that was the proximate cause of the accident to warrant the submission of the case to the jury. It appears from the evidence that the appellant permitted for a consideration a telephone company to use one of its poles. On this pole there were 11 cross-arms, which supported 130 telephone wires. The cross-arms were 22 inches apart, and each one was supported by iron braces which extended down the pole to within a few inches of the next lower arm. The appellant's electric light wires were attached to the faces of the seventh and eighth cross-arms, and extended across the lines of telephone wires. They were held in place at the cross-arms by the use of porcelain knobs, and their insulation was by cotton covering ordinarily used for inside wiring. These wires had been in use seven years, and the covering of the wire on the seventh cross-arm was worn off at its point of contact with an iron bolt which passed through a brace. It was customary for persons climbing among the wires for the purpose of inspecting or repairing them to use the braces as an aid in climbing, and as supports. The appellee's son was in the employ of the telephone company and was last seen alive when at about the fifth cross-arm. He was killed by an electric shock, and his body was found on the wires supported by this cross-arm. Evidently he had been above these wires or his body would not have fallen on them, and when above them, he would have been in close proximity to the brace of the seventh cross-arm, which was charged with electricity, and its position was such that he probably would have grasped it in climbing.

There was no direct evidence that the deceased was killed by coming into contact with the iron brace. But direct evidence was not essential. The cause of death might properly be inferred from the location of his body with relation to the dangers to which he was exposed. The telephone wires were in themselves harmless, and death by electricity could have been caused only by the deceased coming into contact with some object charged with a powerful current. This object was at hand in a position where any one climbing the pole would be likely to touch it. Conditions were shown to exist which indicated very clearly the cause of death, and no other cause being shown the jury were warranted in finding that this was the cause.

The judgment is affirmed.

In re MASSETH'S ESTATE.

Appeal of CAMPBELL.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Nov. 4, 1905.)

1. WILLS—DEVISAVIT VEL NON—REFUSAL OF ISSUE.

A will contained 17 bequests of money and specific articles to 19 different persons. The items were dictated to the counsel who drew the will by the testatrix from memory, and she signed it without reading the same over. The scrivener testified that he wrote it according to his instructions, and failed to read it at her command. There was evidence of delusions on the part of testatrix, arising from the taking of narcotics to relieve pain, but that these delusions did not affect the testamentary act. Held, that the refusal of an issue devisavit vel non was not error.

2. SAME—EXECUTION.

The fact that a will was not read over to testatrix at the time she signed was immaterial, where there was no doubt that it correctly expressed testatrix's intent.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 49, Cent. Dig. Wills, § 262.]

Appeal from Orphans' Court, Butler County.

In the matter of the estate of Araminta Masseth. From a decree refusing an issue devisavit vel non, Margaret F. Campbell appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

Thomas H. Greer, W. S. Thomas, John M. Greer, and John B. Greer, for appellant. W. H. Lusk and T. C. Campbell, for appellees.

PER CURIAM. The will of testatrix bears strong intrinsic evidence of her possession of a sound memory as to her possessions, and a clear view of what she wanted to do with them. There are 17 clauses giving legacies and bequests of money and specific articles of personal and household use to 19 different persons, and according to the testimony of the counsel who drew the will she dictated all these items to him from memory, and without suggestion from others. It would require very clear evidence of want of testamentary capacity to overcome this prima facie case, and no such evidence was presented. Kane's Estate, 206 Pa. 204, 55 Atl. 917.

There was testimony to delusions on the part of the testatrix, but they were fairly accounted for by her habit of taking narcotics for the relief of pain. The learned judge below found that they were not continuous and did not affect her mind as to matters involved in the making of her will. He therefore rightly held that they should be disregarded. Shreiner v. Shreiner, 178 Pa. 57, 35 Atl. 974. The fact that the will was not read over to her at the time she signed it is not material. Such fact only becomes important when there is doubt whether the will correctly expresses the testator's intent. Hess' Appeal, 43 Pa. 73, 82 Am. Dec. 551. In the present case there is nothing to raise such doubt. The attorney who wrote the will testified that he wrote it according to her instructions, and that his omission to read it to her was by her own command.

Decree affirmed, at costs of appellant.

MAINES v. HARBISON-WALKER CO.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURY TO EMPLOYEE—DIRECTING VERDICT.

In an action for personal injuries, plaintiff testified that the machine at which he worked was in a dangerous condition, and was told by the master mechanic that he would change it on Sunday. The change was not made, and plaintiff thereafter subsequently called the attention of such mechanic to the condition of the machinery, and each time was informed that a change would be made on the following Sunday. After a promise of that character plaintiff continued to do the work, and on the following Monday he began work again, though knowing there had been no change in the machinery as promised, and was injured. Held error to grant a compulsory nonsuit.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 34, Cent. Dig. Master and Servant, §§ 1076, 1084, 1085.]

2. SAME—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Whether an employé was guilty of contributory negligence in continuing to work after discovering that certain changes had not been made in the machinery which he knew was in a dangerous condition was a question for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 34, Cent. Dig. Master and Servant, §§ 1096, 1097.]

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Cambria County; O'Connor, Judge.

Action by Daniel Maines against the Harbison-Walker Company. From an order refusing to take off compulsory nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

Thomas H. Greevy, Charles Geesey, and A. V. Dively, for appellant. R. A. Henderson, for appellee.

POTTER, J. The Harbison-Walker Company is engaged in the manufacture of fire brick, and owns works at Blandburg, Cambria county, Pa. During the process of manufacture at these works the fire clay, after being ground, was placed in circular pans for the purpose of mixing. The mixed clay was formerly shoveled out of the pans by hand, and placed upon trucks to be conveyed to the molds. But later, an improvement was introduced, called a "pan emptier," to carry the mortar from the pans to the trucks. This emptier consisted of a frame carrying a revolving belt passing around a roller at each end. The belt was operated by cogwheels at the upper end. Three pans were in use by the defendant at this place; each pan having an emptier. The plaintiff was a pan tender, and was in charge of pan No. 3. The cogwheels upon the emptier at this pan were upon the side next to the workman. It appears from the evidence that there was no necessity for the cogwheels to be so placed, but that they could just as well have been changed, so as to be at the back of the belt, or upon the far side of it, from the pan tender. In fact they were so placed upon the "emptiers" at the other two pans used by the defendant company. The change in position of the cogwheels could easily have been made at any time when the machinery was at rest. The only danger from the cogwheels being upon the outside or front of the belt was the liability to the workmen of getting caught between the wheels as they revolved. The plaintiff had worked for years about the premises, and was familiar with the machinery. He testified that he considered the arrangement of the cogwheels on this particular emptier as dangerous, and that he had complained of it to the master mechanic. In reply he was told by the master mechanic that he would like to change the position of the cogwheels, but that the superintendent would not give him time to do so. But he added, "I will change them on Sunday." The change was not made then, and the plaintiff testifies that he thereafter called the attention of the master mechanic to the condition of the cogs repeatedly—as often as three or four times a week during a period of some six weeks—and that the answer was that the change would be made on Sunday, when the machinery was idle. Finally, on Monday, April 29, 1901, the plaintiff again called attention to the fact that the change had not been made, and again the promise was renewed that the cogwheels would be changed the following Sunday. The plaintiff continued to work during that week. On the succeeding Monday morning, May 6th he went to the mill at a very early hour, about 8 o'clock in the morning, as was his duty, and he then found that the promise had again been broken, and no change in the position of the cogwheels upon the emptier had been made. He began work, however, and during the manipulation of the machinery, in the effort to get it started, the sleeve of his right arm caught in the cogs, his arm was drawn in, and so badly mangled that amputation was necessary. This action was brought to recover for the damages thus caused.

Upon the trial a compulsory nonsuit was entered, upon the ground that the plaintiff, by continuing to work with dangerous machinery after the time when he was promised that the dangerous condition should be remedied, took the chances, and could not recover for the negligence of his employer.

It is conceded by counsel for the appellee that the questions as to whether the defendant was negligent, and whether the danger from the cogwheels was so imminent and obvious that a man of ordinary prudence would refuse to work about them, were questions for the jury. But it is contended that the master mechanic promised to make the change at a definite time—that is, on Sunday—and, when he failed to do so, the servant was not justified in continuing to work, except at his own risk. It must be noted, however, that the evidence does not show that the promise was limited to any particular or definite Sunday. But the Sunday following each complaint seems to have been intended as the next convenient season to make the change. The plaintiff says that the promise was made to him time after time, and that he continued to work upon the strength of the promise, which was apparently renewed from week to week. The question, therefore, is whether the plaintiff was negligent in continuing to work in the face of the fact that not only one promise of the employer had been violated, but a series of them. Or, to put it in another way, had he, at the time of his hurt, any reasonable expectation of the fulfillment of the promise, which had been made and broken, and renewed and broken, a number of times before? It is not disputed that, if no exact or specified time is fixed for the restoration of safe conditions, the suspension of the master's right to avail himself of the defense of the servant's knowledge of the defect continues for a reasonable period. What that reasonable period is would ordinarily be a question of fact for the jury.

Under the peculiar circumstances of this case, we feel impelled to hold that, in spite of the plaintiff's knowledge that the fulfillment of the promise had again been delayed, it was still an open question whether he was not justified in continuing to perform his duties. Had but one promise been given, and that one broken, and had there been no renewals of the assurance previously given, from time to time, the case would be different. Certainly it was within the power of the master to take upon himself the risk of the work, and beyond doubt the effect of the promise was to assume that risk during the period covered by the promise. This protected the plaintiff until the morning upon which he was hurt. For clearly he worked under the promise until the close of the week, on Saturday. The change was to have been made under the last promise, upon the next day, Sunday. The plaintiff went to work before daylight on the following morning, Monday, and was hurt almost immediately. Until then he had no opportunity to know that the change had not been made. We cannot say, therefore, that the mere fact that he observed immediately after the expiration of the time fixed that the cogwheels had not yet been changed, and that he did not then (in consequence) at once refuse to go on with his work, is to be treated as controlling this case as a matter of law. We think that, under the peculiar circumstances here shown, the conclusion as to whether the plaintiff was negligent in continuing his work at the time, was a question of fact, which should have been left to the determination of the jury.

The assignment of error to the refusal to take off the compulsory nonsuit is sustained. The judgment of the court below is reversed, and a writ of procedendo is awarded.

SHEEHAN et al. v. CITY OF PITTSBURG.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Nov. 4, 1905.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS — CONTRACTS — RESPONSIBILITY FOR DELAY.

A municipal contract provided for the construction of a street, and that all loss or damages from delay and unseen difficulties should be borne by the contractor. It was understood by both parties that the complete right of way had been secured by the city. Held, that the delay caused by failure to obtain a complete right of way was not within the terms of the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 36, Cent. Dig. Municipal Corporations, §§ 883, 894.]

2. SAME — RIGHTS OF CONTRACTOR.

Where, because of default of a city in obtaining a complete right of way, a contractor for the construction of a street is delayed in completing his work, he may abandon the work or claim damages caused by the city's fault.

3. SAME — CONTRACT — AMOUNT DUE THEREUNDER.

Where there is a dispute between a city and a municipal contractor as to the amount due for grading a street, and the city could have settled the same by measuring and certifying the work, but did not do so, the question of the amount was for the jury.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Allegheny County.

Action by John C. Sheehan and others against the city of Pittsburgh. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

It appeared that on September 16, 1896, the city of Pittsburgh entered into a contract with W. E. Howley & Co. for the construction of a street known as the "Grant Boulevard." This contract was subsequently assigned to Werneberg, Sheehan & Co., plaintiffs. Both parties to the contract assumed that the complete right of way had been acquired by the city. It turned out that this was not the case, and that by reason of the delay in securing the right of way the contractors were subjected to a large loss. The contract contained the following provisions: "All loss or damage arising out of the nature of the work to be done under this contract, or from any unforeseen obstructions or difficulties which may be encountered in the prosecution of the same, or from the action of the elements, or from any incumbrance on the line of the work, shall be sustained by the parties of the second part [the contractors]. No charge shall be made by the contractor for any hindrance or delay from any cause during the progress of the work, but it may justify his asking an extension of the time allotted for completing the same sufficient to make allowance for the detention, to be determined by the director of the department of public works, provided, the contractor shall give said director immediate notice in writing of the cause of the detention." In addition to the loss caused by delay, plaintiffs claimed to recover for a quantity of filling, as to the amount of which they offered evidence.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

William Watson Smith, Asst. City Sol., and T. D. Carnahan, for appellant. Thomas Patterson, William W. Wishart, and John W. Kephart, for appellees.

PER CURIAM. Notwithstanding the breadth of the language of the agreement that all loss or damages from unforeseen obstructions and difficulties and from delay, were to be borne by the contractors, it is clear that the delay from the city's failure to obtain complete right of way was not in the class of difficulties and delays which were in the minds of the parties, for the agreement itself was based on the assumption by both parties that the complete right of way had been secured, so that the work could be begun at any point and proceed without interruption. For the same reason the provision for extension of time only on written assent by the director of public works is not applicable. There was, therefore, no breach of the agreement by the plaintiffs which prevented them from recovering, and the authorities are clear that they were not bound to abandon the work or to be taken as having waived the delay caused by the city. While they might have abandoned it, they had the option to continue and claim the damages caused by the city's fault.

The dispute as to grading was one of amount alone. The director of public works might have settled the amount conclusively by measuring and certifying it, but he did not do so. It was therefore a question for the jury.

Judgment affirmed.

JONES v. WEIR.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Nov. 4, 1905.)

RECEIVERS—APPOINTMENT—HEARING.

A decree appointing a receiver, without any findings of fact on which the decree was based, will be reversed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 19, Cent. Dig. Equity, § 830; vol. 42, Cent. Dig. Receivers, § 67.]

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, York County.

Bill by Simeon M. Jones against Thomas Weir. From a decree appointing a receiver without findings of fact or opinion filed, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

N. Sargent Ross and Thomas H. Greevy, for appellant. Edward B. Scull, George E. Neff, and Henry C. Niles, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. The court below made no findings of fact, and there is therefore nothing of record to sustain its decree. This is a plain disregard of the equity rules; and, if we should consider the merits of the case in its present condition, we should be obliged to examine the evidence in detail, make the findings of fact for ourselves, and thus assume the duties of the court of first instance.

The decree is reversed and the injunction dissolved, with directions to the court to vacate the appointment of the receiver and compel an immediate accounting by him. The case may then proceed in the regular way to final hearing.

HANNA v. PHILADELPHIA & R. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

1. RAILROADS — INJURY AT CROSSING — EVIDENCE.

The presumption that one about to cross a railroad track stopped to look and listen can only be overcome by evidence that he failed so to do.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 41, Cent. Dig. Railroads, §§ 1121-1123.]

2. SAME—NONSUIT.

In action to recover for the death of plaintiff's husband at a grade crossing, held error to enter a compulsory nonsuit.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Philadelphia County.

Action by Sarah Hanna against the Philadelphia & Reading Railway Company. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

At the trial the court in awarding a nonsuit said: "The deceased was driving on the river road, which runs in a generally northerly direction and parallel with the tracks of the defendant company. Upon reaching an ice-house at the side of the road, a distance of 739 feet from the railroad crossing, he was seen to stop and rest his horses. He then drove on until he reached a place known as the "battery wall," 363 feet from the crossing, and on a level with the tracks. At this point he was seen to look south along the railroad tracks. He then drove on, and was next seen with the hind wheels of his wagon resting upon a bridge over a small stream 109 feet from the railroad crossing and 12 feet below the level of the tracks. At this point the road curved, and the grade sloped upward to the crossing. Immediately to the south, on the first and second tracks, there were stationary coal cars extending some distance below the crossing. The plaintiff's horses were struck by a north-bound express train as they got upon the third track. The deceased was thrown from his wagon and killed. There was evidence by the witnesses who saw the accident that they heard no whistle blown or gong sounded. The question to be considered is whether or not his death was due to contributory negligence. He was shown to stop, look, and listen at a point 363 feet from the crossing, which is too remote to comply with the rule of law. He was next seen to stop at a point 109 feet from the crossing and 12 feet below the grade. There is no testimony to show that he had a view of the tracks from this place. On the contrary, Harry Nippes and Thomas E. Murry testified that it was necessary to walk up to the tracks in order to see an approaching train. In the opinion of the court, if the deceased had looked at a proper place before driving upon the track, he would have seen the train approaching. As his view of the tracks was obstructed by the coal cars, it was his duty to alight from the wagon and lead his horses to a point where he could see. If he had done this, he would have seen the train. He must, therefore, either have seen the train and driven directly in front of it, or he must have tried to cross the tracks without looking. In either case he was negligent. The nonsuit is granted."

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and DEAN, FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, and ELKIN, JJ.

Frank M. Cody, for appellant. Gavin W. Hart, for appellee.

ELKIN, J. This is an action of trespass to recover damages for the death of the plaintiff's husband, who was struck and killed by a train of the defendant company at a grade crossing. At the place of the accident the railroad tracks run approximately north and south, a short distance west of, and parallel with, the Schuylkill river. Between the river and railroad is a public road, also running north and south, on which the deceased was driving. An icehouse 739 feet, and a battery wall 363 feet, both south of the crossing, are located between the public road and railroad. From the battery wall there is a downgrade until the road reaches the bridge which crosses a small stream 109 feet south of the crossing. The road at the bridge is 12 feet below the level of the railroad tracks. There are five tracks at the crossing. The deceased was driving a team north on this road. At the icehouse he stopped his team and looked for trains. He again stopped at the battery wall, got off his wagon, walked around his horses, then stood on the wheel of his wagon, and once more looked for trains. He then proceeded on his way until he reached the bridge, where he stopped and looked another time. He was not seen by any one, so far as the testimony discloses, from the time he stopped at the bridge until he was struck and killed by a train running north on the third track. In the court below a nonsuit was granted; the learned trial judge holding that, "if the deceased had looked at a proper place before driving upon the tracks, he would have seen the train approaching. As his view of the tracks was obstructed by the coal cars, it was his duty to alight from the wagon and lead his horses to a point where he could see. If he had done this, he would have seen the train. He must, therefore, either have seen the train and driven directly in front of it, or he must have tried to cross the tracks without looking. In either case he was negligent."

The question therefore arises whether, under the testimony offered by the plaintiff, it was the duty of the court to hold as a matter of law that the deceased was guilty of such contributory negligence as to preclude a recovery in this action. The evidence does not disclose what the deceased did immediately before starting over the crossing. It does show that he had stopped and looked at the icehouse, again at the battery wall, and still again at the bridge. These facts conclusively show that he had exercised the greatest care possible under the circumstances until he reached the bridge. What he did after leaving the bridge is only a matter of conjecture or inference. Under these circumstances he is entitled by the settled rule of law to the presumption that he did his duty, and this presumption can only be overcome by testimony showing that he failed to observe the precautions required by law. Penna. Railroad Co. v. Weber, 76 Pa. 157, 18 Am. Rep. 407; Weiss v. Penna. Railroad Co., 79 Pa. 387; Longenecker v. Penna. Railroad Co., 105 Pa. 328; Schum v. Penna. Railroad Co., 107 Pa. 8, 52 Am. Rep. 468; Cromley v. Penna. Railroad Co., 206 Pa. 445, 57 Atl. 832.

The learned counsel for appellee admits the force and effect of this rule as applied to the present case, but contends that the presumption of the deceased having done his duty is rebutted by the testimony offered by the plaintiff. The answer to this position is that there is no evidence in the case showing what the deceased did immediately before going on the crossing. The learned counsel argues that under the circumstances it was the duty of the deceased to lead his horses to a place where he could see the approaching train, and, if he had been leading his horses, he could and would have been seen by Mrs. Nippes. This does not necessarily follow. In the first place, it is doubtful whether under the facts proven and circumstances established the court was justified in holding as a matter of law that it was the duty of the deceased "to alight from the wagon and lead his horses to a place where he could see." The testimony did not clearly show that the view of the deceased was so obstructed as to require him to alight, nor does it show just what position of danger the deceased was in as the train approached, and whether he exercised such care as was required of him under the circumstances. But, even if it be conceded that it was his duty to alight and lead his horses, in the absence of evidence showing that he did not do so, the presumption is that he did perform whatever duty the law required of him. The testimony of Mrs. Nippes is not sufficient to overcome this presumption. In answer to questions by counsel and court, she testified: "I didn't see the man." At another time this witness said she did not see the man either before or after the accident. It requires a degree of ingenuity, not convincing to the court, to support the contention that the negative testimony of this witness is to be construed into affirmative testimony showing that the deceased had failed in the performance of a legal duty. The witness does not say whether deceased was leading his horses, or walking beside, or sitting upon, his wagon. She does not know where he was, nor has any other witness testified to the whereabouts of the deceased at the time of the accident. Certainly such negative, uncertain, and unconvincing testimony as this cannot be held to overcome the legal presumption in his favor. On the other hand, the presumption that the deceased did his duty before going on the tracks is strengthened by his course of action on his way to the crossing. He stopped three times to look for approaching trains, and may or may not have stopped a fourth time. These facts, added to the legal presumption that he exercised due care, make a particularly strong case in favor of the plaintiff.

It is earnestly contended that this case is ruled by Kinter v. Penna. Railroad Co., 204 Pa. 497, 54 Atl. 276, 93 Am. St. Rep. 795. We think not. In that case it was held to be the duty of Kinter to stop, look, and listen at a place where he could see the approaching train. The evidence showed that he did not stop at such a point; and, it being conceded that he could not see where he did stop, it was for the court to say that he had not observed the rule requiring him to look. In the present case there is no evidence to show that the deceased did not stop at a place where he could see the approaching train, or that there was a better place of view where he should have stopped, or that he failed in the performance of any duty required of him by law. On these vital questions the evidence discloses nothing. The legal presumption, in the absence of evidence, is that he did stop at a place where he could see, that it was the proper place to stop, and that he performed his duty. It is clear, therefore, that the rule in that case is not applicable to the one at bar.

The question of defendant's negligence has not been raised here, nor was it considered by the court below. When, however, the case is again tried, it should not be overlooked that the first and primary question to be determined is the negligence of the defendant. The contributory negligence of the deceased is predicated upon and presupposes the negligence of the defendant. If the testimony does not show negligence by the defendant, there can be no recovery, no matter how free from negligence the facts show the deceased to be. The defendant is entitled to the benefit of the presumption that through its agents and employees it did its duty in approaching the crossing. There must be affirmative evidence to rebut this presumption, else there can be no recovery. If the case stands on presumptions alone, no evidence having been offered either as to the defendant's negligence or the contributory negligence of the deceased, the presumptions would be equal, and the action to recover damages could not prevail. The burden of showing negligence by the defendant rests on the plaintiff, and must affirmatively appear from the evidence. It is true there is some evidence, negative in character, of the failure to blow the whistle and ring the bell as the train approached the crossing. Whether this evidence is sufficient to rebut the presumption that these duties were performed is a question not raised by this appeal, and it is therefore unnecessary to review this branch of the case.

Judgment reversed, and a procedendo awarded.

DEMPWOLF v. GREYBILL.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1906.)

1. EJECTMENT — EVIDENCE — BINDING INSTRUCTION.

Defendant executed a deed for certain milling property, and deposited it in escrow, under an agreement that he was to receive money and stock of a corporation which was to take title to the property. On notice that the agreement had been carried out the trust company delivered the deed to the purchaser, and forwarded the money and stocks to the defendant, who had about the same time executed a lease to operate the mill as lessee for a certain time. At about the same time he stated to many persons that he was in possession of the property as a tenant, and after the organization of the company he acknowledged his liability to it for the rent. The company executed a mortgage on the property, of which defendant had notice. Subsequently the mortgage was foreclosed and the property sold. In ejectment by the purchaser against defendant to recover the property, he claimed that no title had passed, because of the failure of the trust company to see that certain conditions of the escrow agreement had been complied with. Held, that a binding instrument for plaintiff in ejectment was proper.

2. DEED—EXECUTION—DELIVERY — PRESUMPTIONS.

A purchaser for value has a right to act on the faith of a deed, that the deed has been signed, sealed, acknowledged, and delivered as it purports to be, and the presumption is that it has been so executed and delivered by proper parties.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 16, Cent. Dig. Deeds, §§ 564-567, 574.]

3. SAME—CONSTRUCTION—COVENANT.

Where words in a deed can be construed either as a condition, reservation, or covenant, the latter construction is favored.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 16, Cent. Dig. Deeds, §§ 469, 471.]

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Cumberland County.

Action by Charles H. Dempwolf against John D. Greybill. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

At the trial the court refused, under objection and exception, to admit various offers of testimony by defendant relating to the matters connected with promotion, organization, and financing of the Eastern Milling & Export Company:

"Mr. Woods: It is proposed to prove by O. W. Yost, of Steelton, Dauphin county, Pa., that in the year 1903 he had a conference with Mr. Dempwolf, plaintiff in this action, in which he informed him that the conditions under which the properties in the combination of the Eastern Milling & Export Company of New Jersey had been taken contrary to the conditions of purchase, in the following particulars: That money had been taken from the bond issue of $800,000 to pay for said properties, and had thereby reduced the working capital to such an extent that the scheme would be a failure; that the said Dempwolf and H. O. Niles were directors at the time of the Security Title & Trust Company of York, Pa. This for the purpose of bringing notice home to Mr. Dempwolf, the plaintiff in this action, and for the further purpose of proving that Mr. Dempwolf is not an innocent purchaser, bona fide purchaser, for value received. Mr. Niles: Objected to as not proper legal evidence to sustain the issue on part of the defendant, or to affect adversely the rights of the plaintiff in this action, as irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial. The Court: Objections are sustained, offer refused, defendant excepts, and bill is sealed."

The court charged as follows: "The defendant in this action, alleging as a defense that he was the victim of a fraud by which he was induced to make a conveyance of his mill property, we allowed the widest latitude in the admission of testimony, which might tend, in the opinion of his counsel, to establish the truth of his contention, reserving, however, the effect which we would give to the same. The offers and declarations made on his behalf at the beginning and early stages of the trial led us to think it to be our duty not to reject the offers there made and admitted. We are now, however, at the conclusion of the case, and of the opinion that no such relevant, competent, and material evidence has been adduced on the part of the defendant, John D. Greybill, as will avail against the claim of Charles H. Dempwolf, the plaintiff, to recover, and you are therefore directed to render a verdict in his favor for the land described in the writ."

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and DEAN, FELL, BROWN, and ELKIN, JJ.

R. W. Woods and Frank B. Sellers, Jr., for appellant. Henry C. Niles and Wetzel & Hambleton, for appellee.

ELKIN, J. The plaintiff stands on his record title, the documentary evidence of which, introduced at the trial, made out a prima facie case in his favor. After an exhaustive examination of all the questions raised by this appeal we are of opinion that no testimony produced at the trial, or offered and refused, was sufficient in law to overcome the prima facie case made out by the plaintiff. The theory upon which the learned counsel for appellant bases his contention is that the terms and conditions of the option or agreement with Jackson, under which the deed was held in escrow, had not been complied with before it was delivered by the Union Trust Company, the depository, to Murphey, the grantee, and, by reason of the alleged failure to comply with the terms and conditions precedent to the delivery of the deed, no valid title passed.

The first seven assignments allege error in the learned trial judge refusing to admit testimony offered by defendant, relating to and bearing upon matters connected with the promotion, organization, and financing of the Eastern Milling & Export Company. The general purpose of these offers was to show such a violation of the conditions upon which the deed was held in escrow as to be a fraud on the rights of appellant, by reason or which no title passed. Whether in a suit between appellant and Jackson, or between appellant and the Eastern Milling & Export Company, this testimony should be admitted for any purpose, it is not necessary to consider and determine, but as between the parties to this litigation, under the admitted and undisputed facts, it is clearly incompetent for the purpose of affecting the validity of plaintiff's title.

It appears from the uncontroverted evidence in the case that appellant executed a deed for the milling property in dispute, and deposited it with the Union Trust Company of Philadelphia in escrow, under the terms and conditions of the agreement with Jackson; that said deed was to be delivered by the depository to the grantee therein named when the consideration agreed upon, in money and stocks, had been deposited with said trust company and the other conditions had been complied with; that on April 5, 1901, appellant was notified that the Eastern Milling & Export Company had exercised the option to purchase the property; that the amount of money and stocks agreed upon as a consideration therefor had been received by and deposited with said trust company; that a mortgage had been placed on said property to secure a temporary loan; that he should transfer his insurance to the mortgagee; and that he would be expected to enter into a lease, under the terms of which he should operate the mill for a period of 60 days as lessee. A few days after receiving this notice he executed a lease whereby he covenanted to operate the mill for a period of 60 days as lessee, and surrender the same on five days' notice thereafter. Some delay in closing up the transaction was occasioned on account of the failure to deliver a deed for a railroad siding, which it was alleged should be included in the conveyance. The deed for the siding was delivered May 31st, and subsequently the Union Trust Company forwarded the money and stocks deposited with it to appellant as consideration for the transfer under the terms of the agreement by which the deed was held in escrow. On June 20th he acknowledged in writing the receipt of $6,250 and 375 shares of the preferred and 375 shares of the common stock of the Eastern Milling & Export Company, which he accepted as consideration in full for his mill property. Before and after the receipt of the cash payment and stocks appellant asserted at different times and to different persons that he was in possession of the property as a tenant under the lease. As late as July 5th, after the organization meeting of the Eastern Milling & Export Company, he acknowledged his liability for rent due the company as its tenant, and asked that it be charged to him as a set-off in the settlement to be made on account of the company taking over certain personal property belonging to him. On the same day he deposited the stock held by him in a pool with other stockholders of the company, but withdrew it a few days later.

On the other hand, it cannot be doubted that the grantee and his assigns treated the delivery of the deed as an absolute transfer of the property on and after April 5, 1901. On that day Murphey, the grantee, acting under the direction of the Eastern Milling & Export Company, executed a mortgage on the milling property, the title to which is in dispute in this suit, to secure a temporary loan of money. The appellant had notice of the execution of this mortgage because he was notified to transfer the insurance to the mortgagee. On July 1st a general mortgage covering all the constituent properties of the new corporation, including the property of the appellant, was executed and recorded.

This mortgage secured a bond issue in a large sum of money. The corporation defaulted in the payment of interest on the bonds, and the mortgage was foreclosed by a decree of the United States Circuit Court, under which the property in dispute, and all other properties covered by the mortgage, were sold and conveyed to the plaintiff, who brought this action in ejectment.

It is thus apparent that the appellant, the new consolidated milling company, and all other parties in interest, treated the delivery of the deed by the trust company to Murphey, April 5, 1901, as an absolute transfer of the property. Against this array of concrete facts it is of no avail to assert abstract principles of law wherein it is held that a deed takes effect only from the time of its delivery; or, where a deed is placed in the hands of a third person as an escrow, the grantee is only entitled to a delivery upon a strict compliance with the conditions precedent to such delivery; or that if the depository delivers the deed without authority from the grantor, or if the grantee obtains possession of it fraudulently, without performing the conditions, the deed is void; or that where the future delivery of a deed depends upon the payment of money, or the performance of some other condition, and the grantee obtains possession of the deed without performing the condition, he acquires but a voidable title. These are recognized and settled principles of law, and will not be questioned by any one familiar with the rules of property; but it would do violence to every rule of construction to hold them applicable to the facts of the case at bar.

The appellant does not deny that he received the full consideration for his property, as provided in the agreement with Jackson, to wit, the cash in hand and stocks, but contends that the stocks are depreciated in value because of the failure to comply with certain other conditions of the agreement, and that it was the duty of the depository to see that all the terms and conditions of said agreement were carried out before the delivery of the deed. The position is not tenable under the facts of the present case. Such a rule would impose a higher standard of legal requirement on the agent than on the principal. It will not be seriously contended that in this respect the Union Trust Company can be required to exercise greater care and diligence in the enforcement of the conditions of the escrow than the appellant, who, with Jackson, constituted the trust company depository for the receipt of the consideration and delivery of the deed. When the appellant, who was as familiar with the facts connected with the organization of the new milling company as the common agent, the depository, accepted the money and stocks in full consideration for his property, and thereafter acquiesced in the mortgage of said property as a security to third parties and bondholders, who had advanced their money for the uses and purposes of the new corporation, he cannot now be heard to say that the depository had been unfaithful in not enforcing the alleged conditions of escrow precedent to the delivery of the deed. If a title may be avoided under such circumstances, no purchaser is safe. The learned court below was clearly right in the construction placed upon the escrow agreement. The rule is that, where words can be construed either as a condition, reservation, or covenant, the latter construction is favored. Methodist Church v. Old Columbia Public Ground Co., 103 Pa. 808; In re Sellers M. E. Church, 139 Pa. 61, 21 Atl. 145, 11 L. R. A. 282. A purchaser for value has a right to act on the faith that a deed has been signed, sealed, acknowledged, and delivered as it purports to be, and the presumption is that it has been so executed and delivered by proper parties. Blight v. Schenck, 10 Pa. 285, 51 Am. Dec. 478. A mortgagee is regarded in law as a purchaser for value. Logan v. Eva, 144 Pa. 312, 22 Atl. 757.

In the view we take of the case it is not important to consider the question of notice at the foreclosure sale, raised by the eighth assignment of error. The appellant had executed a conveyance of his property, and had received the consideration agreed to be paid him, and the delivery of the deed under the circumstances was binding upon him. Having parted with the title to his property, and the rights of third parties having intervened, it was immaterial what notice he gave at the sale.

The ninth and tenth assignments, for reasons hereinbefore stated, are without merit. The agreement with Jackson may have been an improvident one. The plan for the combination and operation of the smaller milling properties in a large operating company may have been unwise and unprofitable, like many other promising enterprises floated for speculative purposes; but the matters complained of must be raised, if at all, in a proper proceeding between the parties, and cannot be set up as a defense for the purpose of avoiding a deed solemnly executed and duly recorded.

This opinion was not handed down with others in cases heard at the same time, for the reason that it was originally assigned to our late Brother, Mr. Justice DEAN, and after his death it was reassigned too late to hand down with others in June.

Judgment affirmed.

MERRILL et al. v. AMERICAN BAPTIST MISSIONARY UNION et al.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire. Hillsborough. Dec. 5, 1905.)

1. WILLS—ESTATE CREATED—FEE TAIL—INVALIDITY—ABSOLUTE FEE.

A will bequeathing to testator's children and their heirs, forever, the use of certain real estate, and providing that, if testator's heirs and the heirs of the children should cease to

2. CHARITIES—PERPETUITIES.

The fact that an annuity given by a will to a charitable corporation may continue perpetually does not affect its validity.

3. WILLS—CONSTRUCTION—TRUSTS.

Testator's will bequeathed certain real estate to his children and their heirs forever, providing that they should keep the property insured and pay all taxes and claims, and pay annually a certain sum to a specified corporation, and it was provided that, if testator's heirs and the heirs of the children should at any time cease to exist, the property should go to the corporation in question. Held, that though the attempt to create a conditional fee or fee tail was void, whereby the children took an absolute fee, they took the property impressed with a trust to pay the annuity specified from the income.

Transferred from Superior Court; Pike, Judge.

Suit by John C. Merrill and others against the American Baptist Missionary Union and others for the interpretation of the will of Calvin Merrill, deceased. Case transferred from the Superior Court. Case discharged.

The plaintiffs are the four children of the testator named in the beginning of the clause requiring interpretation, which in substance reads as follows: "I give, bequeath, and devise to my four children, John C. Merrill, Arthur W. Merrill, Hattie E. Ware, and Walter B. Merrill, the use, income, and occupancy of my coal-yard property [describing it], to them and their heirs, forever, by their keeping the buildings insured and in good repair, paying all taxes and claims against said property, including any deficiency arising in the settlement of my estate, making such improvements from time to time as the business seems to warrant and require, and paying annually the sum of fifty dollars to the American Baptist Missionary Society, fifty dollars annually to the American Baptist Publication Society, * * * fifty dollars annually to the American Baptist Home Missionary Society, * * * and the balance of the net annual income from this property shall be paid to my beloved wife, Elizabeth W. Merrill, during her lifetime annually. Should my heirs and their heirs cease to exist, and the time ever come when there was no lineal descendant to occupy and care for said property as above directed, I would then give, bequeath, and devise the same to the three societies mentioned and their successors, forever, in equal shares." The two children first named are executors of the will. Besides the plaintiffs, six grandchildren survived the testator. His wife also survived him, but died in 1904. The societies named are charitable corporations formed for the promotion of religion. The "coal-yard property" consists of a tract of land situated near the tracks of the Boston & Maine Railroad, in Milford, upon which there are coal and wood sheds, a grain elevator, and two cottages.

Edward L. Kittredge, for plaintiffs.
George B. French, for defendants.

CHASE, J. The terms of the devise are. "I give, bequeath, and devise to my four children [naming them] the use, income, and occupancy of my coal-yard property [describing it], to them and their heirs, forever, by" their doing the acts specified. The right to exercise and enjoy the use, income, and occupancy of material things constitutes ownership; and a conveyance of these powers over particular things is ordinarily a conveyance of the things themselves. "A devise of the income of lands is, in effect, a devise of the lands." Reed v. Reed, 9 Mass. 372. See, also, Sampson v. Randall, 72 Me. 109; Hopkins v. Keazer, 89 Me. 347, 355, 38 Atl. 615; Diament v. Lore, 31 N. J. Law, 220. It is evident that "use, income, and occupancy" were used by the testator in this sense, and that he intended thereby to devise the ownership of his coal-yard property, or, expressing the idea in still briefer terms, to devise the property itself. The devise is to the four children, "to them and their heirs, forever." These are apt words to devise the property in fee. But there are other provisions in the will which seem to qualify the meaning of these words. Passing by, for the moment, the provisions relating to the care of the property and the disposition of its income, this provision is reached: "Should my heirs and their heirs cease to exist, and the time ever come when there was no lineal descendant to occupy and care for said property as above directed, I would then give, bequeath, and devise the same," etc. This provision conveys the idea that the property should continue in the lineal descendants of the testator so long as there were any. Reading the first provision above considered and this provision together, it seems that the testator's intention was to give his four children a conditional fee in the property, or an estate in fee tail, instead of an absolute fee. But such intention conflicts with public policy relating to restrictions upon the alienation of real property.

Prior to the passage of the statute de donis, conditional estates of this kind were not considered with favor by the courts, because they tied up property indefinitely. The courts adopted that Blackstone characterizes "subtile finesse of construction, * * * in order to shorten the duration of these conditional estates," and held, among other things, that the birth of issue to the first taker fulfilled the condition and converted the estate into an absolute fee. To prevent the courts from thus controlling the law, the statute of Westminster II, commonly called the "Statute De Donis," was passed. It "revived in some sort the ancient feudal restraints which were originally laid on alienations, by enacting that from thenceforth the will of the donor be observed," thus paying "a greater regard to the private will and intentions of the donor than to the propriety of such intentions, or any public considerations whatsoever." 2 Bl. Com. 110-112. At first it seems to have been understood that the statute de donis was in force in this state, and that estates tail might be created; but in 1837 it was held that the statute had been impliedly repealed by the state statutes relating to the descent and devise of property, and consequently that such estates no longer exist here. Jewell v. Warner, 35 N. H. 176; Crockett v. Robinson, 46 N. H. 454. A statute was passed in 1837 enabling a tenant in fee tail to convey the land by deed, and thereby bar all remainders and reversions expectant on the estate tail. Laws 1837, p. 316, c. 340, § 1. This provision was continued in the Revised Statutes (chapter 129, § 1), but was dropped upon the enactment of the General Statutes in 1867, no doubt because of the intervening decisions above cited. The policy of the state, now well established, is that real estate shall not be tied up indefinitely by entailment. Attempts to do so in a case like this result in the transmission of an estate in fee, instead of in tail. Crockett v. Robinson, supra. A primary object of the testator in this case appears to have been to insure the payment to the three societies named of the annuities given to them. As will be seen later on, this object is not defeated, nor is its fulfillment imperiled, by following the policy of the state in the interpretation of this devise. It follows, also, from what has been said, that there was no remainder or reversion for the devise over to the societies to operate upon, in case of the failure of the testator's issue.

Further than this, it is plain that the failure of issue referred to was not a failure at the death of the first taker, but a failure at some indefinite time in the future. The language is, "Should my heirs and their heirs cease to exist, and the time ever come when there was no lineal descendant," etc. This language removes all doubt on this point. The devise over to the societies, being limited upon an indefinite failure of issue, conflicts with the public policy above mentioned, and is void for remoteness. Downing v. Wherrin, 19 N. H. 9, 49 Am. Dec. 139; Hall v. Chaffee, 14 N. H. 215, 221; Pinkham v. Blair, 57 N. H. 226; Edgerly v. Barker, 66 N. H. 434, 459, 31 Atl. 900, 28 L. R. A. 328. The estate which the four children got by the devise "to them and their heirs, forever," was an estate in fee, notwithstanding the subsequent provision in the will above considered. But the four children, and all others who succeed them in title to the property, are charged by implication with a trust in respect to it, to a certain extent. New Parish in Exeter v. Odiorne, 1 N. H. 232, 236; Hutchins v. Heywood, 50 N. H. 491, 496;

Tappan's Appeal, 55 N. H. 320, 321. The devise "to them and their heirs, forever," is "by their keeping the buildings insured and in good repair, paying all taxes and claims against said property, including any deficiency arising in the settlement of my estate, making such improvements from time to time as the business seems to warrant and require, and paying" the annuities to the societies named, and the balance of the net annual income from the property to the wife annually during life. By the death of the widow she has ceased to be a beneficiary under the trust. No suggestion has been made that there are any claims outstanding against the property or the testator's estate. Apparently the only beneficiaries of the trust now left are the three societies. They and the plaintiffs are the only parties interested in the property. It clearly appears that the testator's intention was that the annuities should be paid from the income of the property, not from the property itself. This appears from the fact that, after making provision for the payment of the taxes, insurance, and other incidental charges against the property, and the annuities to the three societies, the testator provides that "the balance of the net annual income" shall be paid to his wife annually during life. The provision for the payment of taxes and other incidental charges appears to have been made for the purpose of preserving the body of the property to produce income to meet the payments to the annuitants and the widow. The presence of this idea in his mind is also shown by the devise over of the property, should the time ever come when there is no lineal descendant to occupy and care for the property as directed. The annuities are charged upon the income, and not upon the corpus of the property. Nudd v. Powers, 136 Mass. 273; Delaney v. Van Aulen, 84 N. Y. 16; Irwin v. Wollpert, 128 Ill. 527, 21 N. E. 501; DeHaven v. Sherman, 131 Ill. 115, 22 N. E. 711, 6 L. R. A. 745; Baker v. Baker, 6 H. L. Cas. 616. The duty is placed upon the plaintiffs and their successors in the legal title to the property to pay the taxes and other incidental charges upon it for the time being, and to pay from its net income the annuities, whether the income be derived from tenants or from use of the property by themselves. So long as they faithfully perform this duty, the primary object of the testator is fulfilled. The personal interests of those in whom the legal title to the property is lodged for the time being (they being entitled to the income of the property, except the sum required to pay the annuities) operate as a guaranty that the taxes and other incidental charges will be seasonably paid and that the property will be properly improved. But should they fail to perform the duty in any particular, and the interests of the societies be affected or prejudiced thereby, the court of equity, in the exercise of its powers relating to trusts, will afford the beneficiaries an adequate remedy.

It does not appear, other than from the very general description of the property given in the case, what its income-producing capacity is. As described, the property is quite extensive in quantity, and appears to be favorably located for business purposes, and to have acquired a particular business character by prior use. It would seem probable that its net income will be sufficient at all times to pay the annuities and something to the general owners. It is unnecessary to consider at this time what would be the effect upon the annuitants in case the net income should be insufficient at any time to pay them in full—a question that may never arise. An annuity may be perpetual, or for life, or for a period of years. A gift of an annuity to a person, without a limitation or qualification as to duration, would generally be understood as designed to continue during the life of the annuitant. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1065a, and notes; Bates v. Barry, 125 Mass. 83, 28 Am. Rep. 207; Yates v. Madden, 3 Macn. & G. 532; Blight v. Hartnoll, 19 Ch. Div. 294. Here the annuitants are corporations, and all the evidence tends to show that the intention was that each annuity should continue so long as the corporation to which it is given exists and fulfills the purposes designed by the corporation's charter. That it may continue perpetually does not affect its validity. Charitable trusts are not within the rule against perpetuities. Rolfe & Rumford Asylum v. Lefebvre, 69 N. H. 238, 45 Atl. 1087.

LYMAN v. BROWN.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire. Carroll. Dec. 5, 1905.)

1. TRESPASS—DISPUTED BOUNDARY—PLEADING—GENERAL ISSUE.

In trespass quare clausum, where the location of a boundary line was in dispute, the title to the disputed territory may be determined under a plea of the general issue.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Tresp., § 104.]

2. PLEADING—AMENDMENT TO CONFORM TO PROOF.

Where, in trespass, the title to land was litigated under a plea of the general issue, defendant was entitled, after verdict, if necessary, to amend his plea to conform to the proof, by filing a special plea of soil and freehold in the disputed territory.

3. APPEAL—VERDICT—MOTION TO SET ASIDE—QUESTIONS OF LAW.

The denial of a motion to set aside a verdict because it was alleged to be against the law and the evidence raises no question of law reviewable on exceptions.

4. TRIAL—MISCONDUCT OF JURY—WAIVER.

Where plaintiff had knowledge of certain misconduct of the jury, but failed to call the matter to the court's attention until after a verdict had been rendered for defendant, plaintiff thereby waived the right to insist on such conduct as a ground for setting aside such verdict.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trial, §§ 751, 972.]

5. NEW TRIAL—GROUNDS—MISCONDUCT OF JURY.

Where, in trespass quare clausum, the boundary line of the land was in dispute, and plaintiff moved to set aside a verdict for defendant because a juror expressed an opinion in favor of the line claimed by defendant before the evidence was fully heard, and because certain persons made remarks as to the case within the hearing of the jury, while they were taking a view, but it was not shown that the opinion so alleged to have been expressed was made by a juror, nor what the remarks alleged to have been made in the presence of the jury were, the denial of the motion for such reasons was not error.

6. APPEAL—STATEMENTS OF COUNSEL—PREJUDICE.

In trespass, where a boundary line was disputed, the statement of a conceded fact by defendant's counsel, in answer to an inquiry of the court, having no tendency to prove where the line in question was located, was not prejudicial.

Transferred from Superior Court; Stone, Judge.

Trespass quare clausum by Frank E. Lyman against Alphonzo D. Brown. Verdict was rendered in favor of defendant, and the cause was transferred to the Supreme Court on exceptions to the overruling of defendant's motion to set the verdict aside. Exceptions overruled.

The plaintiff moved that the verdict be set aside and that judgment be ordered in his favor, for the following reasons: (1) The verdict is against the law and the evidence; (2) the jurors did not keep together at the view, and were spoken to for that reason by the sheriff who had them in charge; (3) during the view of the line claimed by the parties, some of the jurors drank cider as it was offered to them; (4) before the evidence was fully heard, one of the jurors expressed an opinion in favor of the line claimed by the defendant; (5) during the trial the defendant's counsel, in the hearing of the jury, made a statement, to which exception was taken, relative to the boundaries of a lot of an adjacent owner, after evidence upon that point had been offered and excluded by the court; (6) during the trial certain persons, in the hearing of the jury, made remarks relative to the case which were not objected to by him, and continued until stopped by the sheriff. A hearing was had upon the motion, and certain facts were found which appear in the opinion. The motion was denied, and the plaintiff excepted.

Josiah H. Hobbs, for plaintiff. Arthur L. Foote, for defendant.

BINGHAM, J. The plaintiff owns a lot of land situated in Madison, and the defendant's wife owns a lot in Tamworth, adjoining the plaintiff's lot on the west. The title to both lots was derived from the same grantor. The boundary between the towns is a straight dine. It is also the division line between the lots. The plaintiff claimed at the trial that the town line was located on the ground about seven rods west of where the defendant claimed it to be. The territory upon which the alleged trespass was committed is located between the lines thus claimed. The defendant justified the acts complained of as the agent of his wife. The jury were instructed that the only contention between the parties was in respect to the location of the original boundary line between the towns; that if it was located where the plaintiff claimed it was, the defendant was a trespasser; but if it was located where the defendant claimed, he was not. No exception was taken to this instruction, and none properly could have been. The defendant pleaded the general issue. Under that plea, as it is now understood in this state, the title to the disputed territory could be determined. Tabor v. Judd, 62 N. H. 288, 290. Since the decision in Tabor v. Judd, the necessity of a special plea of soil and freehold to try the title to disputed territory seems to have been done away with; but if this is not so, and the defendant should have pleaded specially, he may now be permitted to do so by amending his pleadings in the superior court to conform to the issue actually tried.

The first reason assigned in support of the motion to set aside the verdict raises no question of law. The second and third reasons assigned are not sufficient to justify setting aside the verdict, when considered in connection with the facts found at the hearing upon the motion. It seems that the plaintiff and his counsel were present at the view taken by the jury, and knew what took place there. They made no objection at the time, and failed to call the matter to the attention of the court until after a verdict had been returned for the defendant. If they regarded the conduct of the jurors as irregular and prejudicial to the plaintiff's rights, they should have so informed the presiding justice when they returned to court after finishing the view. Instead of so doing, they chose to go on with the trial and obtain a favorable verdict if they could. By so doing they waived any right the plaintiff might have had to insist on these objections. Tabor v. Judd, 62 N. H. 292, 293; Noyes v. Gould, 57 N. H. 20, 25.

The fourth reason assigned is not supported by the facts, for it is not found that the person who expressed an opinion in favor of the line claimed by the defendant, after the view was taken, was a juror. And the answer to the sixth reason is of a like character. It is not found what the remarks alleged to have been made in the presence of the juror were; and although the juror thought they related to the case, he did not know who the persons making them were, nor what they said.

The fifth reason is likewise without merit. It was conceded at the trial that the division line between the lots was the boundary line between the towns. The controversy concerned the location of that line. The reply of the defendant's counsel to the inquiry of the court—"I want to say that it (the land of the witness Bickford) is bounded by the Madison town line on the east"—simply tended to show that the division line between the lots was the town line, a conceded fact. Standing alone, the reply had no tendency to prove where the line was located, and, if incompetent, it was not prejudicial.

We think it unnecessary to say more concerning the exceptions taken to the argument of counsel, than that we are of the opinion they are not well founded.

Exceptions overruled. All concur.

HOOD v. MONTGOMERY et al.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire. Rockingham. Dec. 5, 1905.)

1. PARTITION—APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE—REVOCATION.

Under Pub. St. 1901, c. 243, §§ 10, 20, making it the duty of the judge of probate to appoint "suitable persons" as members of a committee to make partition, where the judge of probate made an appointment, relying upon an alleged agreement of the parties as to the suitability of the appointees, when in fact there had been no such agreement, the court had power, on objection by one of the parties to the action, to correct the error by revoking the appointment.

2. SAME—TIME FOR HEARING OBJECTION.

Where, after the appointment of a committee to make partition, defendants objected to the committee as constituted, and the court in its discretion postponed the consideration of the objection until after the return of the committee's report, such action did not as a matter of law amount to a waiver of defendant's objection seasonably made, nor was the nonaction of the court equivalent to the order overruling the objection, and it was proper for the court to sustain the objection after the committee made its report.

3. SAME—REVIEW.

Where the probate court revoked the appointment of a committee to make partition, for the alleged reason that the committee was appointed upon representation made by counsel for the petitioner that the adverse parties had consented to the appointment, which representation was false, it was error for the superior court to dismiss the appeal, inasmuch as a hearing by such court was necessary to determine the truthfulness of the allegations.

Exceptions from Superior Court; Stone, Judge.

Petition by Fannie M. Hood against Mary W. Montgomery and another in the probate court for the partition of real estate. From an order setting aside the report and revoking the appointment of the committee to make partition, plaintiffs appealed to the superior court. From an order sustaining defendants' motion to dismiss the appeal, plaintiff brings exceptions. Exceptions sustained.

Upon the petition of the plaintiff for the partition of certain real estate, the probate court appointed a committee to make the partition, the members of which the court understood at the time had been agreed to by the parties. Afterward, but before the time for taking an appeal had elapsed, the defendants objected to the committee as constituted, claiming that they did not agree to the appointment of one of the members. At the suggestion of the court, the consideration of the defendants' objection was postponed until the committee should make a report. When the report was returned, the defendants objected to it, and asked that it be set aside and for the appointment of another committee. The court thereupon entered a decree or order setting aside the report and revoking the appointment of the committee, for the reason that the committee was appointed "upon the representation made to the court by counsel for the petitioner that the counsel for the petitionee had agreed upon and consented to the appointment of the committee as herein named," which representation was not in fact true. Thereupon the plaintiff took an appeal to the superior court, assigning, among other reasons of appeal, the legal positions that the probate court had no authority to set aside the report of the committee and that the remedy of the defendants was by an appeal. The defendants' motion to dismiss the appeal was granted, and the plaintiff excepted.

G. K. & B. T. Bartlett, for plaintiff. Butnam, Brown, Jones & Warren, for defendants.

WALKER, J. It was the duty of the judge of probate to appoint "suitable persons" as members of the committee. Pub. St. 1901, c. 243, §§ 10, 20. If unsuitable persons were appointed, it was the right of the defendants to object and to seek to have the appointment revoked, if they presented their objection in a reasonable time after they were informed of the facts authorizing that conclusion. The fact that parties agree that certain persons may be appointed upon the committee is evidence that in that proceeding they are "suitable." It appears that the judge of probate made the appointment in this case, relying upon the alleged agreement of the parties as to the suitability of the appointees, but that the defendants upon learning of the appointment objected thereto, because there was no agreement as to the appointment of one of the men. Having been misled in this material respect, the court had the power to correct the error by revoking the appointment, when the matter was seasonably and properly called to its attention. Ayer v. Messer, 59 N. H. 279, 280; Reed v. Prescott, 70 N. H. 88, 46 Atl. 457. The appointment of the committee was a preliminary proceeding, which did not have the effect of a final decree upon the rights of the parties. Pub. St. 1901, c. 200, § 1; Parker v. Gregg, 23 N. H. 416, 423. The plaintiff acquired no right to have the partition made by a committee composed of unsuitable men; and, if the revocation had been made when the defendants first made their objection, it is apparent that the rights of the parties would have been amply protected. The fact, however, that the court did not see fit to pass upon the matter at that time, but, in the exercise of its discretion in effect postponed its consideration until after the return of the committee's report, did not as a matter of law amount to a waiver of the defendants' objection seasonably made. Nor was the nonaction of the court equivalent to an order overruling the objection. The decision of the question thus raised was merely held in abeyance; and, when the objection was finally sustained and the appointment revoked, the legal effect of the order of revocation was the same as though it had been made in the first instance. The proceedings before the committee and its report, therefore, necessarily became invalid.

This result is reached upon the assumption that the facts set forth in the appeal are true. As the case is understood, however, the defendants' motion to dismiss the appeal presents merely the question of the legal sufficiency of the reasons assigned for the appeal, which was taken from the decree finally made setting aside the report, and not from the previous action of the court. A hearing in the superior court is necessary to determine the truthfulness of the allegations. Whether the division recommended by the committee was just and equitable will become immaterial, if it should appear that the committee was not such a committee as the parties were legally entitled to. The other reasons of appeal do not appear to be important.

Exceptions sustained. All concurred.

NORTHWESTERN MUT. LIFE INS. CO. v. COLLAMORE et al.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine, Dec. 23, 1905.)

1. GIFTS—INTER VIVOS OR CAUSA MORTIS— WHAT CONSTITUTES.

To constitute a gift inter vivos or causa mortis, there must be a transfer of possession under circumstances indicating an intention thereby to at once transfer title as well as possession irrevocably. Inclosing the article in a sealed envelope, and handing the package to another with instructions to keep, but not to open it until after the death of the depositor, does not indicate such intention.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 24, Cent. Dig. Gifts, §§ 28-42, 122-132.]

2. TRUST—DECLARATION—SUFFICIENCY.

A declaration of trust, to be effective, must be explicit, absolute, and complete, vesting the equitable title in the beneficiary at once, though the transfer of the legal title may be deferred till the happening of some event sure to happen, as the death of the declarant. If the transfer of the legal title is to be contingent on an event which, though expected, may not happen, the declaration is ineffective. Thus a declaration made in contemplation of suicide, and to direct the disposition of the property after death by suicide, is ineffectual, since the intention to commit suicide may be abandoned.

3. SAME—EVIDENCE.

The evidence in this case does not satisfy the court that the property in the insurance policy in question was effectively transferred, either by delivery or by a declaration of trust. (Official.)

Report from Supreme Judicial Court, Knox County, in Equity.

Bill by the Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Company against Charles H. Collamore and others. Case reported. Decree in favor of Josie Collamore, defendant.

Bill of interpleader to determine whether the amount of a life insurance policy, issued by the plaintiff company to Ellison C. Collamore, should be paid to his estate, he being deceased, or to his brother, Charles H. Collamore. After the death of the said Ellison C. Collamore, the said Charles H. Collamore claimed that payment of the insurance policy should be made to him, alleging that the policy had been assigned to him by the deceased in his lifetime. Thereupon the said Josie Collamore, widow of said deceased, who was afterwards appointed his administratrix, brought a bill in equity to have the plaintiff enjoined from paying said insurance policy to said Charles H. Collamore pending the determination of the bill and decree thereon. An injunction was granted, as prayed for in said bill. The said Charles H. Collamore also brought an action at law against the plaintiff to recover from it the amount of said insurance policy. The said Josie Collamore, after her appointment as administratrix of the estate of said deceased, likewise brought an action at law against the plaintiff to recover from it the amount of said insurance policy. Thereupon this bill of interpleader was brought. At the hearing on the bill of interpleader in the court of the first instance the facts were submitted in the form of an agreed statement, and the case was reported to the law court, with the stipulation that "upon so much of the agreed statement as is legally admissible" the law court determine the rights of the defendants and make decree in accordance therewith.

Agreed Statement.

On September 22, 1899, Ellison C. Collamore took out with the Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Company a tontine policy of insurance upon his life for the sum of $1,500, payable to his estate.

At the time of taking out such insurance, and at the time of his death, he had living a wife and one son.

Clause 6 of the policy provides: "If this policy shall be assigned, a duplicate of the assignment shall within thirty days be given to the company, and due proof of interest shall be produced on making claim."

On March 6th, 1900, he signed an assignment of said policy, recited to be in consideration of love and affection, running to Charles H. Collamore, his brother, but therein reserving to himself the right to make choice of options contained in the policy, and to receive the whole benefit thereof himself, without the consent of the assignee; and, in event of the death of the assignee before the policy became payable on account of the death of the insured, the same was to be payable to his estate.

This policy and assignment was in the possession of the insured on January 6, 1904, on which date he delivered a sealed envelope to Charles H. Collamore, which it finally turned out contained the insurance policy and assignment, with some other papers; but the contents of the envelope was unknown to Charles H. Collamore until after the death of the insured.

The insured died by his own hand on March 16, 1904. Just prior to committing suicide the insured sent a letter to Charles H. Collamore, which was received after his death, in an envelope postmarked March 16th, and which letter read as follows:

"Rockport, Feb. 9, 1904.

"Well, Charles, as I shall not see you again I will send you this receipt, you will have it, show, and Joe cannot make enny trouble about it. I told Geneva that I would fix my board bill on that note; I have fixed it by making the interest four per cent, and I thought that would satisfy you for what trouble and my board, and the trouble while I was with you. You will have the money to pay this note when you collect the Insurance, but don't pay it too fast, for they will spend it if you do; and you can take the interest on some of the other money and pay them their interest. You will know what I — about the other money when you open the envelope I gave you. Don't wait too long before you attend to it either. It is no need of me telling you my troubles for it will do you no good or me either, but I think that, I am tired of living, and have been for the past three years, I cannot stand and strain enny longer, so I hope you will do all you can for Harry. I have fixed my things as I thought best for you and Harry and our sister, and I hope you will do what I have asked you to do, for I have left it as I thought best. I shall take a dose of poison which I have had ready for a long time, and hoping I will meet you all in a world where trouble never comes, Good bye.

"From your brother,

"E. C. Collamore,

"Rockport, Maine."

In the sealed envelope, which after receiving the above Charles H. Collamore opened, was contained the two following letters, one of them in a smaller envelope:

"Rockport, Oct. 13, 1903.

"To Charles H. Collamore from E. C. Collamore:

"Charles: If enny thing happens to me I want you to collect my Life Insurance and divide it between yourself and Harry and your sister. Take Five Hundred Dollars for yourself; Five Hundred Dollars for Harry P. Collamore and the rest for your sister, Syreno A. Andrews. I want you to take care of Harry's until he is 17 years old before you give him enny of it; then I want you to give it to him, or put it where he can get it, to finish his schooling with; don't give it to all at one time so Joe can get it and go through with it. I want you to help him all you can; he is not to blame for what he has done, his mother is to blame for it all. You will have to use your own judgment about Syreno's money; you will have to let her have a little at a time when she needs it the most. You will have to get her plaster for her when I am gone. Be shure and keep enought of her money to bury her when she dies, for they will not have enough in the family. If there is enny of her money left when she dies you divide it between yourself and Harry. I have fixed your note so it will be four per cent interest. This is the last favor I shall have to ask of you and I want you to have me buried with mother, at West Rockspout.

"E. C. Collamore."

"Rockport, Jan. 31, 1904.

"Charles:

"You will notify C. R. Dunton, of Bangor Exchange, of my death, for he is the Insurance Agent for the North Western, and will see that you get the money that will fall due there. You use it as I have asked you to in the other letter I have left you. Be shure and do the best you can for Harry, and God will bless you.

"Good bye, from your brother,
"E. C. Collamore."

Instructions in relation to the envelope, as given orally to Charles H. Collamore, were at different times said by him to have been as follows:

"You keep it, and, if anything happens to me, you open it." And: "Keep that; don't open it unless something happens to me."

This was all of the communication made at the time of the delivery of the envelope, and nothing further was said about the envelope, or in relation to property matters, after the delivery.

Other envelopes had previously been left in a similar way; but the contents of envelopes so left were never known to Charles H. Collamore and might or might not have contained the insurance policy and assignment Charles H. Collamore had received; but he drew the inference that said packages did contain these papers among other things, but no direct statement to that effect was made, and the packages held previously were returned to the insured.

Prior to the death of the insured's mother in 1899, the insured had been in the habit of giving her similar matters to keep for him.

The insured was not indebted to said Charles H. Collamore, but, on the other hand, Charles H. Collamore was indebted to his brother for borrowed money, and is still indebted to his estate; he having given his note therefor.

The assignment had no relation to any business transaction between the brothers.

Josie Collamore, the widow of Ellison C. Collamore, was appointed administrator of his estate. Charles H. Collamore claims the insurance under the assignment in question. Josie Collamore claims to collect the same as administratrix, to be disposed of as provided by statute.

On the bill decree was made that the money should be paid into court and the defendants were ordered to interplead. Decree was complied with, and each of the defendants in the bill of interpleader make answer, setting up their respective claims upon the facts above stated.

Argued before EMERY, WHITEHOUSE, STROUT, POWERS, PEABODY, and SPEAR, JJ.

L. F. Starrett, for plaintiff. L. M. Staples, for defendant Charles H. Collamore. C. E. & A. S. Littlefield, for defendant administratrix.

EMERY, J. The question submitted on this bill of interpleader is whether the amount of a life insurance policy, issued by the plaintiff company to Ellison C. Collamore, is payable to his estate, he now being deceased, or to his brother, Charles H. Collamore. The policy is admittedly payable to his estate, unless the court shall find from the agreed statement of facts that the legal or equitable title to it was effectually transferred by him before his death to his brother, the other claimant.

There certainly does not appear to have been any such delivery of the instrument of assignment, or of the policy itself, to the brother, as was necessary to constitute a transfer of any title, legal or equitable. Although he placed them in the hands of his brother, there was nothing said or done indicating that it was an irrevocable gift, or intended as such. The papers were in a sealed envelope. No statement was made of what the envelope contained, or that the contents were a gift. He simply told his brother to keep it, and not to open it unless something happened to him. The brother did not know the contents of the envelope until he opened it after the death of Ellison. Other envelopes had previously been left by Ellison with the brother in a similar way and had been taken back, but the contents of those envelopes are unknown. Prior to his mother's death in 1899, Ellison had been in the habit of giving her similar packages to keep for him.

All that can be reasonably inferred from the agreed statement is that Ellison intrusted the envelope to his brother as ballee, to be kept for him (Ellison), and not to be opened unless something happened to him. Had Ellison called for the envelope before his death, the brother would have been obliged to give it up. He clearly had acquired no title to it or its contents by its being thus placed in his hands. Indeed, the brother frankly concedes no completed gift, either inter vivos or causa mortis, can be inferred from the facts stated.

He urges, however, that a declaration of trust by Ellison, in favor of his brother and others, can and should be inferred. For this he relies upon two letters of Ellison found in the envelope with the policy, and another sent by him through the mail just before his death by suicide.

A declaration of trust, to be effectual, must be explicit, unconditional, and complete. If it be tentative, or conditional, or made subject to reservation, it is not a perfected declaration of trust, and will not be enforced by the courts. True, a future time or event may be fixed for the legal title to vest in the beneficiary, such as the death of the donor; but the declaration must be of a present trust, vesting the equitable title in the beneficiary thereby and irrevocably. One may dispose of property during his life by gift or declaration of trust, but to do so he must divest himself of the ownership of what he gives. If he desires to retain ownership during his life, and yet fix its disposition after or in case of his death, he must do so by will. The foregoing legal principles are established by the decisions of this court in Bath Savings Inst. v. Hathorn, 88 Me. 122, 33 Atl. 836, 32 L. R. A. 377, 51 Am. St. Rep. 382, and Norway Sav. Bank v. Merriam, 88 Me. 146, 33 Atl. 840, and buttressed by the numerous authorities there cited, as well as by the reasoning of the opinions.

Turning now to the letters, and reading them in the light of the other facts, it is clear they do not constitute an effectual declaration of trust. Whatever statements he made of his wishes, he had not gone so far that he could not recall them. The envelope was still unopened. Even after sending the letter, dated February 9th, but mailed March 16th, he could have repented of his design, and, notwithstanding his letters, could have enforced the return of the sealed envelope and its contents.

The deceased evidently desired to retain ownership to the last, and yet deprive his widow of her interest in his estate. This under our law he could not do. Brown v. Crafts, 96 Me. 40, 56 Atl. 213.

It must be decreed that the money due on the policy be paid to the administratrix, Josie Collamore, less the costs and reasonable counsel fees of the plaintiff, which may be deducted by the plaintiff from the fund.

Decree to be made accordingly.

WYMAN v. PISCATAQUIS WOOLEN CO.
(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. Dec. 9, 1905.)

WATERS AND WATER COURSES — COMPLAINT FOR FLOWAGE—PROCESS—SERVICE.

A complaint for flowage, not inserted in a writ of attachment, may, under the statute, be presented to the court in term time or be filed in the office of the clerk in vacation; but before it can be served there must be an order of service by the court in term time or by some justice thereof in vacation. The delivery of a copy of the complaint, attested by the clerk of court, by a sheriff to the respondent, without such an order, is not a sufficient service.

(Official.)

Report from Supreme Judicial Court, Somerset County.

Action by Flavel Wyman against the Piscataquis Woollen Company to recover for flowage of land. Motion to dismiss for want of legal service. Case reported, and complaint dismissed.

Argued before WISWELL, C. J., and EMERY, WHITEHOUSE, STROUT, SAVAGE, and PEABODY, JJ.

J. S. Williams, for plaintiff. D. D. Stewart and David R. Straw, for defendant.

WISWELL, C. J. This is a complaint for flowage. Upon the second day of the term to which the complaint was made returnable, counsel for respondent appeared specially and filed a motion that the complaint be dismissed for want of legal service. There was no officer's return of service of any kind upon the complaint, but these facts as to the manner in which service was made are admitted. The complaint was filed in the office of the clerk of this court for Somerset county in vacation, a copy thereof was made by the clerk, certified by him as such, and returned by him to the counsel for the complainant with the original complaint. The original and certified copy were then given by complainant's counsel to a deputy sheriff for service, and the deputy sheriff gave the copy to the treasurer of the respondent corporation 30 days before the return term named in the complaint. The complaint was not inserted in a writ of attachment, and there was no order of notice by the court in term time nor by any justice thereof in vacation.

Was this a sufficient service of a complaint for flowage? We think not. The statute in relation to the commencement of a proceeding of this nature and the service of the complaint is as follows: "The complaint may be presented to the court in term time, or be filed in the clerk's office in vacation; and the proper officer shall serve the same, fourteen days before the return day, on the respondent, by leaving a copy thereof at his dwelling house, if he has any in the state; otherwise, he shall leave it at the mill in question, or with its occupant; or the complaint may be inserted in a writ of attachment and served by summons and a copy." Rev. St. c. 94, § 6.

What is the purpose of this requirement of the statute? That the complaint, if not inserted in a writ, should be presented to the court in term time, or filed in the office of the clerk in vacation? Clearly, we think that the court in term time may fix the term and order service of the complaint upon the respondent, or that a justice of the court, in vacation, may make such an order; the justices of the supreme and superior courts having authority, under Rev. St. c. 84, § 1, to order notice concerning any civil proceeding in term time or vacation. When such a complaint is inserted in a writ of attachment, the writ contains an order, authorized by statute and signed by the clerk of the court, directed to the proper officer, commanding the service of the process, and the summons contains an order commanding the respondent to appear and answer at the time named. Without such an order, contained either in the writ and summons or in the special order of court, or of some justice thereof in vacation, there is no command to a defendant or respondent to appear and defend, and this command is not to be given to a defendant by a plaintiff, but by the court at the instance of the plaintiff.

Unless authorized by statute in direct terms, or by clear implication, the complaint or petition in any civil proceeding should have thereon an order of court as to service before it can be served. In a petition for partition, for instance, authority for service without order of court is given by the statute in direct terms. Rev. St. c. 90, § 3. But in that section the petition is filed with the clerk in order that the clerk, as provided by the section, may make a certified copy of the petition, which is to be served, but the section in regard to a complaint for flogage, above quoted, contains no authority for the clerk to make a certified copy of the complaint for service, and the requirement that the complaint may be filed in the clerk's office is not for this purpose. Neither does this statute, in our opinion, by implication authorize service without an order therefor.

This insufficient service might have been called to the attention of the court in any way, however informal, and at any time. An inspection of the complaint itself by the court would have shown no return of any service, and, even after the officer had been allowed to make a return in accordance with the facts, such return would have failed to show a sufficient service. The complaint, therefore, should be dismissed for want of service, with costs for the respondent, since, although the respondent only appeared by counsel for the special purpose of calling the attention of the court to the want of service, it was still a party, and the prevailing party, under Rev. St. c. 84, § 132, as decided in Thomas v. Thomas, 98 Me. 184, 56 Atl. 651.

The court is asked to decide whether or not, if the respondent's motion to dismiss should prevail, the complainant may be allowed to amend. We do not see how the question of amendment arises. We have not considered the sufficiency of the complaint, although a question concerning it was raised by counsel for the respondent; but, as the complaint must be dismissed for want of service, it is unnecessary to decide this question, and no question of amendment is left.

Complaint dismissed, for want of service, with costs to the respondent.

GLOVER et al. v. O'BRIEN et al.
(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. Dec. 11, 1905.)

1. COVENANTS—ACTION FOR BREACH—PLEADING.

It is a well-settled general rule respecting the assignment of breaches of covenants that the plaintiff may allege the breaches generally by simply negating the words of the covenant; but the exception to this rule is equally well recognized that, when such a general assignment does not clearly and necessarily show a breach, special averments are required.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Covenants, §§ 197, 199.]

2. SAME—SPECIAL AVERMENTS.

The covenant against incumbrances and that of general warranty comes within the exception, and breaches of those covenants must be specifically set forth, showing in the case of the former the nature of the incumbrance complained of, and in case of the latter a disturbance of title or possession by a paramount title equivalent to an eviction.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Covenants, § 197.]

3. SAME—PLEADING AND PROOF.

In the case at bar, the covenant that the defendant was lawfully seised in fee of the premises and the covenant that she had good right to sell and convey the same to the plaintiffs fall within the rule, and it was only incumbent upon the plaintiffs to negative the words of the covenants. But the plaintiffs were not content to rely upon such a general assignment of the breaches of these covenants, but supplemented it with a specification of the grounds upon which they relied to establish the breach of these covenants, and, having elected to do so, they are confined to the ground stated in the specification, and the defendant would be warranted in relying upon the facts thus stated in the specification as the only cause relied upon by the plaintiffs.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Covenants, § 210.]

4. SAME — ASSIGNMENT OF BREACHES — CONVEYANCE—DELIVERY — NATURE OF INCUMBRANCES.

The specification in this case sets forth that the defendant before the date of her deed to the plaintiffs, by her deed "duly sealed, executed, and acknowledged, did convey said premises to one Charles Steere, of Boston, Mass., and did convey and part with the title which she, before the deed to said Steere, held and possessed in the premises, and that before making her deed to the plaintiffs with the covenants aforesaid she was not the owner of and had no right to convey said premises." This specification does not allege that the prior deed was either delivered or recorded. Held:

(1) That although all the facts stated in the specification may be true, yet, if it does not necessarily follow that either of the covenants has been broken, the assignment of breaches is not sufficient.

(2) Assuming that the averment of a conveyance by necessary implication includes a delivery, still the specification is defective, because it does not allege that the deed to Steere was recorded.

(3) All that is stated in the specification may be true, and yet the plaintiffs may have received a good title, and it does not appear, either by express words or necessary implication, that any covenant had been broken.

(4) If this specification could be construed to apply also to the general covenant of warranty, it would be equally unavailing. If it does not apply to this covenant, there is no specification of the breach of it.

(5) Neither does the declaration specify the nature of the incumbrance alleged to constitute a breach of the covenants against incumbrances. Therefore the breaches of these last-named covenants are not well assigned.

(Official.)

Exceptions from Supreme Judicial Court, Knox County.

Action by William H. Glover and others against Clara E. O'Brien and another on an alleged breach of covenant of warranty in a deed under seal. Demurrer to the writ and declaration overruled, and defendants except. Exceptions sustained.

Argued before EMERY, WHITEHOUSE, POWERS, PEABODY, and SPEAR, JJ.

C. E. & A. S. Littlefield, for plaintiffs. D. N. Mortland, for defendants.

WHITEHOUSE, J. The plaintiffs declared in a plea of debt that the defendant conveyed to them a certain piece of land by deed of warranty, and "did therein covenant with the plaintiffs, their heirs and assigns, that she was lawfully seised in fee of the premises, that they were free from all incumbrances, and that she had good right to sell and convey the same to the plaintiffs to hold as aforesaid, and did also covenant that she and her heirs would warrant and defend the same to the plaintiffs, their heirs and assigns, against the lawful claims and demands of all persons."

"But the plaintiffs aver that in fact at the time of making and executing said deed the said defendant was not seised in fee of the premises, that they were not free from all incumbrances, and that she did not have good right to sell and convey the same as in her said deed set forth, and that she has not made good her covenant to warrant and defend the same to the plaintiffs against the lawful claims and demands of all persons. But the plaintiffs aver that the said Clara E. O'Brien before that time, viz., on the 30th day of April, 1884, by her deed of that date, on that day duly sealed, executed, and acknowledged, did convey said premises to one Charles Steere, of Boston, Mass., and did convey and part with the title which she, before the deed to said Steere, held and possessed in said premises, and that before making her deed to the plaintiffs with the covenants aforesaid she was not the owner of and had no right to convey said premises. And so the said Clara E. O'Brien her covenant aforesaid hath not kept, but hath broken the same, to the damage of the said plaintiffs (as they say) the sum of $800."

To this declaration the defendant filed a general demurrer, which was joined by the plaintiffs. The presiding judge overruled the demurrer, and the case comes to the law court on exceptions to this ruling.

In support of the demurrer the defendant contends in the first place that, inasmuch as the distinguishing feature of the action of debt is the fact that it lies for the recovery of money or its equivalent, in sums certain or that can readily be made certain by computation, if this action is to be deemed one of debt, the declaration is wholly insufficient for want of any allegation of an agreement on the part of the defendant to pay any such sum, or of any failure on his part to pay money. Again it is insisted that if, as the substance of the averments indicates, it was as an action for covenant broken, it is demurrable, first, because the defendant is summoned to answer in a plea of debt and not of covenant broken, and, second, because the action is fatally defective for want of a proper and necessary assignment of the breaches of the covenants.

Whether the objection that the plaintiffs declared in a plea of debt, instead of covenant broken, is open to the defendant upon a general demurrer, or can be taken advantage of only by special demurrer, it is unnecessary to determine; for it is the opinion of the court that, considered as an action for covenant broken, the declaration does not contain a sufficient allegation of a breach of any of the covenants declared upon.

It is undoubtedly a well-settled general rule respecting the assignment of breaches of covenants that the plaintiff may allege the breaches generally by simply negating the words of the covenant; but the exception to this rule is equally well recognized that, when such a general assignment does not clearly and necessarily show a breach, special averments are required. In Marston v. Hobbs, 2 Mass. 433, 3 Am. Dec. 61, cited with approval in Wait v. Maxwell, 4 Pick. 87, and Blanchard v. Hoxie, 34 Me. 376, the different covenants are critically distinguished, and the reasons for the rule and the exceptions above stated fully considered and explained. According to the doctrine there laid down, the covenant against incumbrances and that of general warranty come within the exception, and breaches of those covenants must be specifically set forth, showing in the case of the former the nature of the incumbrance complained of, and in case of the latter a disturbance of title or possession by a paramount title, equivalent to an eviction.

On the other hand, the covenant that the defendant was lawfully seised in fee of the premises and the covenant that she had good right to sell and convey the same to the plaintiffs fall within the rule, and it is only incumbent upon the plaintiffs to negative the words of the covenants. But it has been seen that the plaintiffs were not content to rely upon such a general assignment of the breaches of these covenants, but supplemented it with a specification of the grounds upon which they relied to establish the breach of them. Their declaration proceeds as with a videlicet to state the particular facts constituting the breach. It avers that the defendant, before the date of her deed to the plaintiffs, "by a deed duly sealed, executed, and acknowledged, did convey said premises to one Charles Steere, of Boston, and did convey and part with the title which she held in the premises, and that before making her deed to the plaintiffs she was not the owner and had no right to convey said premises."

The plaintiffs were not compelled by the rules of pleading to specify the cause of the breach of these covenants; but, having elected to do so, they are confined to the ground stated in the specification, and the defendant would be warranted in relying upon the facts thus stated in the specification as the only cause relied upon by the plaintiffs. If, therefore, the facts stated in the specification may all be true, and still it does not necessarily follow that either of these covenants has been broken, the assignment of breaches is not sufficient. 5 Ency. of Plead. & Pr. p. 369, and cases cited. It will be noticed that the specification does not state that the prior deed was either delivered or recorded. It does allege, however, that the defendant "did convey the premises to one Charles Steere," etc. Assuming that the deed could not operate as a conveyance of the title to Steere without a delivery, and that the avowment of a conveyance by necessary implication includes a delivery, still the specification is defective, for the reason that it does not allege that the deed to Steere was recorded. It is provided by Rev. St. c. 75, § 11, that "no conveyance of an estate in fee simple, fee tail, or for life or lease for more than seven years, is effectual against any person except the grantor, his heirs and devisees, and persons having actual notice thereof, unless the deed is recorded as herein provided." All that is stated in the plaintiffs' specification may therefore be true, and yet the plaintiffs may have received a good title, and it would not appear either by express words or necessary implication that any covenant had been broken. If this specification could be construed to apply also to the general covenant of warranty, it would be equally unavailing. If it does not apply to this covenant there is no specification of the breach of it. Neither does the declaration specify the nature of the incumbrance alleged to constitute a breach of the covenant against incumbrances. The breaches of these last-named covenants are therefore not well assigned, and the entry must be:

MEDOMAK NAT. BANK v. WYMAN.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. Dec. 19, 1905.)

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—NEW NOTE FOR INTEREST—EFFECT.

When one of the makers of a joint and several negotiable promissory note, after the same has become barred by the statute of limitations, gives his negotiable promissory note to the payee of the barred note in payment of interest on the barred note, it constitutes a new promise on his part to pay the barred note, and revives the barred note as to himself.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 83, Cent. Dig. Limitation of Actions, § 624.]

(Official.)

Report from Supreme Judicial Court, Lincoln County.

Action by the Medomak National Bank against Fannie L. Wyman. A note given by defendant's intestate. Case reported. Judgment for plaintiff.

Argued before EMERY, WHITEHOUSE, STROUT, POWERS, PEABODY, and SPEAR, JJ.

Heath & Andrews and W. H. Miller, for plaintiff. C. E. & A. S. Littlefield, for defendant.

SPEAR, J. This is an action of assumpsit upon seven promissory notes, only four of which are in controversy, and comes up on report. The four notes in question were all substantially in the same form, as follows: For value received, we jointly and severally promise to pay the Medomak National Bank of Waldoboro or order $500 on demand, and interest. They were all signed by the Medomak Ice Company and indorsed upon the back before delivery by L. L. Kennedy the defendant's intestate. These notes were all intended for the benefit of the ice company and in no respect for the benefit of the indorser. In the report "it is admitted that all the indorsements upon the last-described four notes except the last indorsement on each were made from funds delivered to the plaintiff by the Medomak Ice Company."

"The plaintiff admits that the said four notes are barred by the statute of limitations against Lincoln L. Kennedy defendant's intestate, unless the bar in the statute was removed by the note for $152.61 above offered under the sixth count."

This note was as follows: "$152.61. Waldoboro, Maine, May 8, 1902. For value received, we jointly and severally promise to pay the Medomak National Bank of Waldoboro or order one hundred fifty-two ²¹/₁₀₀ dollars on demand, and interest"—and was signed by the Medomak Ice Company and indorsed by L. L. Kennedy, precisely as the four notes in controversy were signed and indorsed. It will also be observed by comparison that it was in the same form as the other four notes. "It is further admitted that said note for $152.61 is made up of the aggregate of the last indorsements appearing upon the aforesaid four notes, and that said note for $152.61 was entered upon the books of the bank as 'Note, Medomak Ice Company' and that entry was balanced by a credit of the same amount to profit and loss." The last indorsements appearing upon these notes show that the note for $152.61 was given to pay the interest upon them to June 5th, March 16th, March 25th, and March 28th, 1902, respectively.

The only question presented by this case is whether the payment of interest upon the four notes by giving the note of $152.61 removed these four notes from the operation of the statute of limitations with respect to the indorser L. L. Kennedy; whether the payment was such an acknowledgment by him of the debt created by these four notes as to warrant the inference of a new promise on his part to pay them. This is not a question as to whether these notes were revived as to the ice company, but whether they were revived as to the indorser. While the name of L. L. Kennedy appears upon the note in the usual place of an indorser, his legal relation to it under our decisions was that of an original promisor. It will therefore appear that the defendants' intestate stood in the capacity of original promisor upon each of the four notes, and also upon the note which was given for the payment of interest.

After the four notes became outlawed, Mr. Kennedy was relieved by the operation of the statute from payment. At this juncture he was free from any liability, and it was absolutely within his privilege to decline to make himself further liable for the payment of these notes. But he did not do this. On the other hand, he became a joint and several promisor with the ice company upon the note and gave it to the bank in payment of interest as above stated. As a matter of law he gave his own individual obligation for the payment of the interest, the note given being joint and several. Here it may be remarked that the peculiar wording of this note makes the apparent indorser an original promisor in fact as well as law. The only name upon the face of the note is that of the Medomak Ice Company. It could not be joint and several as to the company, a single signer. It must therefore have reference to the indorser as one of the joint and several promisors. This is also true with respect to the relation of Mr. Kennedy to the four notes upon which the interest was paid. They were, in fact as well as law, his individual notes. There can be no presumption, under the wording of these notes, either in fact or law, of any other relation of L. L. Kennedy to all of them than that of an original promisor, individually liable.

It would therefore affirmatively appear from the form of these notes that Mr. Kennedy by the note given was not only making a payment of interest upon the notes of the Medomak Ice Company but upon his own notes as well. He gave no notice to the bank that he did not intend to revive his liability upon the barred notes, and no evidence in the case tends to show that his relation to the notes was other than that shown by the notes themselves. It therefore seems clear that the natural inference from the facts disclosed by this transaction is that Mr. Kennedy intended this note at the time it was given as a payment of interest upon these four notes as much as if he had made the payment with his own money or his own check in lieu of the notes. We think that instead of requiring evidence to show that the payment of interest by the note was intended to acknowledge and revive the debt, it would rather require some evidence to overcome the inference that it was not.

In view of the above construction of the relation of the defendant's intestate to the notes in controversy, it becomes unnecessary to consider her contention that the note given for the payment of interest was the note of the Medomak Ice Company only, the payment of which was guaranteed by the indorser as surety provided the company failed to pay.

The principles of law applicable to the removal of the bar of the statute of limitations are well settled. Payments on a note already barred remove their bar. Sinnett v. Sinnett, 82 Me. 278, 19 Atl. 458; Manson, Ex'r v. Lancey, 84 Me. 380, 24 Atl. 880, Pond v. French, 97 Me. 405, 54 Atl. 920.

Payments of interest take the case out of the statute with like effect as payments of principal. Fryeburg Parsonage Fund v. Osgood, 21 Me. 176.

A partial payment by note is as effectual to take the original debt out of the operation of the statute as payment in any other manner. Hisley v. Jewett, 2 Metc. (Mass.) 168; Sigourney v. Wetherell, 6 Metc. 553; Wenman v. Ins. Co., 13 Wend. 267, 28 Am. Dec. 464; Bowman v. Downer, 28 Vt. 532.

In Sigourney v. Wetherell, 6 Metc. 553, it was held that a note given by a guarantor, in payment of the interest due upon the guaranteed note, takes the debt out of the operation of the statute of limitations.

The above decisions follow and rest upon the well-settled rule in Maine that the giving and acceptance of a negotiable note is presumably payment. Varner v. Nobleborough, 2 Greenl. 121, 11 Am. Dec. 48; Bunker v. Barron, 79 Me. 62, 25 Atl. 253, 1 Am. St. Rep. 282. But in the case at bar it is unnecessary to rely upon the presumption of payment as it is admitted that the note was given for the express purpose of paying and did pay the last indorsements on the four original notes. Our conclusion is that the note given in payment of interest upon the four notes, removed the bar of the statute upon these notes as to the defendant's intestate, and that she is liable in this action for their payment.

The plaintiff is entitled to judgment upon the first count in its writ for $3,300 and interest at 6 per cent. from October 1, 1902; under the second count for $500 and interest at 6 per cent. from June 5, 1902; under the third count for $336.95 and interest at 6 per cent. from March 16, 1902; under the fourth count for $135 and interest at 6 per cent. from March 25, 1902; under the fifth count for $300 and interest at 6 per cent. from March 28, 1902; under the sixth count for $152.61 and interest at 6 per cent. from May 8, 1902, and under the seventh count for $250 and interest at 6 per cent. from April 1, 1904.

HURD v. CHASE.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. Dec. 21, 1905.)

1. MORTGAGES—ABSOLUTE DEED AS MORTGAGE.

The court, now having full equity powers, has the power to treat a conveyance or a reservation in a conveyance absolute in terms, as made solely for security for some obligation, if it finds such to be the fact from extrinsic evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 35, Cent. Dig. Mortgages, §§ 60-94.]

2. SAME—DEBT SECURED—EXTRINSIC EVIDENCE.

Having this power, the court also has the power in such case to determine from extrinsic evidence what the obligation is that was intended to be secured, including its nature, extent, and terms.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 35, Cent. Dig. Mortgages, §§ 97-107.]

3. SAME.

When the instrument made as security itself contains a description of the obligation to be secured, the court cannot add to nor take away anything from such description; but, when the instrument contains no description, the court can ascertain the full terms of the obligation from extrinsic evidence.

4. ACTION—FORM—EQUITABLE RELIEF IN ACTION AT LAW.

These equity powers of the court can now be exercised in an action at law for the possession of the estate thus conveyed or reserved. A separate bill in equity is not now necessary for that purpose.

5. APPEAL—REPORT OF CASE—TECHNICALITIES IN PLEADING—WAIVER.

Upon report of an action at law, technicalities in pleading are to be regarded as waived, unless otherwise stipulated, and, at least in the absence of such stipulation, the court can ascertain and decide upon its merits the real controversy in the case.

6. MORTGAGES—ABSOLUTE DEED—RESERVATION AS SECURITY.

In this case the plaintiff reserved in terms an absolute life estate out of a farm conveyed by her to the defendant, but the court finds that one consideration for the conveyance was the bond of the defendant to support the plaintiff on the farm, and that the reservation was made solely as security for the performance of the bond. Held, that the defendant is entitled to retain possession of the farm until a breach of his bond, and, no such breach being shown, the plaintiff is not yet entitled to possession.

Report from Supreme Judicial Court, Aroostook County.

Action by Mary F. Hurd against Fred W. Chase. Case reported. Plaintiff nonsuit.

Argued before EMERY, STROUT, SAVAGE, PEABODY, and SPEAR, JJ.

Willis B. Hall, Wm. P. Allen, and Louis O. Stearns, for plaintiff. Ira G. Hersey and A. B. Donworth, for defendant.

EMERY, J. This is a real action. The plaintiff formerly owned the demanded land (a farm) in fee, subject to a mortgage, but conveyed it to the defendant with the following habendum clause: "To have and to hold to the said Fred W. Chase [the defendant], his heirs and assigns, to and for the following uses, viz.: To the use of me, the said Mary F. Hurd [the plaintiff], during my natural life, and after my decease or other determination of said estate to the use of the said Fred W. Chase and his heirs and assigns, forever." The consideration for this conveyance was the agreement by the grantee (the defendant) to assume and pay the mortgage debt on the land and his bond to the plaintiff for her support in the house on the conveyed premises during her life. This bond was executed and delivered at the same time as the deed, was a part of the same transaction, and furthermore recites the deed. Under these instruments the defendant at once took possession of the demanded premises, in order to take care of the plaintiff as stipulated in his bond, and she went upon the premises to receive the stipulated support, and remained there ten days. She then brought this real action to recover her life estate. There is no suggestion in the report of any failure of the defendant to perform his bond.

It may be conceded that the plaintiff has the legal title to a life estate in the land, but to maintain this action (ignoring technicalities in pleading) she must be entitled to possession as well. Rev. St. c. 106, § 5. One may retain his title to real estate, while debarring himself from right of entry and possession. We think the plaintiff has done so in this case. It is evident that she reserved a life estate simply and solely as security for the performance of the defendant's bond to maintain her on the premises. It is as if the defendant had mortgaged to her a life estate for the same purpose. It is clearly implied in the instruments that the defendant was to have possession of the farm and its revenues to enable him to perform his bond, and as long as he performed it. This bars an action for possession until there is a breach of the bond, which is not yet shown. Lamb v. Foss, 21 Me. 240; Norton v. Webb, 35 Me. 218; Brown v. Leach, 35 Me. 39; Davis v. Poland, 99 Me. 345-348, 59 Atl. 520.

True, the reservation of the life estate in the deed is not in terms conditioned or otherwise than absolute; but, since this court has possessed full equity powers, it has had full power to go beneath the terms of a conveyance or reservation of an estate to ascertain whether it is in fact unconditional or only for security for some obligation. Reed v. Reed, 75 Me. 264; McPherson v. Hayward, 81 Me. 329, 17 Atl. 164. And for this purpose the court may even resort to oral evidence. Knapp v. Bailey, 79 Me. 195, 9 Atl. 122, 1 Am. St. Rep. 295.

True, again, there are cases holding that the right of possession by the mortgagor must be expressed or necessarily implied in the deed itself, and cannot be sustained by oral evidence, nor even by written instruments not referred to in the deed. Those cases, however, were cases of deeds of mortgage in form, and were decided before the court had the power to go beyond the terms of the deed to get at the truth of the transaction. If the court has power to ascertain and declare that a deed absolute in terms is in fact a mortgage, it necessarily has power to ascertain in the same way what is the obligation the deed is to secure.

There are also cases holding that the conditions expressed in the deed, the statement in the deed itself of what it is intended to secure cannot be enlarged by parol, nor even by the language of other writings between the parties not referred to in the deeds. See Mason v. Mason, 67 Me. 546.

Those cases, however, are not applicable to this case where no conditions are expressed in the deed, and where there is no description whatever of the obligation to be secured. When the parties to a deed undertake to describe therein the obligation to be secured, the court cannot enlarge or limit it; but when no description is given, and yet the deed is unquestionably to secure some obligation, the nature and extent of that obligation are to be ascertained from sources outside of the deed.

Of course, the court should not declare a conveyance or reservation of an estate absolute in terms to be for security only, unless fully satisfied upon clear, convincing evidence that such is the truth. In this case, however, the inference from the evidence is irresistible. It is to be noted, also, that the action is by the original party to the deed.

True, this suit is an action at law; but now, since the enactment of Rev. St. c. 84, §§ 17-21, inclusive, the court can use its equity powers to apply equitable principles in the defense to an action of law. A separate bill in equity is not now necessary for that purpose.

The defendant pleaded nul disseisin only, without any plea of equitable matter; and it is suggested that by that plea he denies her title, and thus enables her to maintain this action to establish her title. By reporting the case the parties must be held to have waived technical questions of pleading, there being no stipulation otherwise. Pillsbury v. Brown, 82 Me. 455, 19 Atl. 858, 9 L. R. A.

94. It is evident that the only issue between the parties and the only issue that needs decision is the right of present possession. That issue we are authorized by the report to decide.

Plaintiff nonsuit.

KEATING v. HULL

(Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut. Dec. 15, 1905.)

1. DRUGGISTS — NEGLIGENCE — ACTIONS — PLEADING—NOTICE OF PROOF.

Plaintiff in the third paragraph of her complaint alleged that defendant, a druggist, delivered to her a package which he stated contained salts, for which she paid the customary price, and in paragraph 4 charged that the package so delivered did not contain salts, but contained sulphate of zinc, by which plaintiff was poisoned. Held, that no notice that defendant on a hearing in damages would give evidence to disprove paragraph 3 was necessary to enable defendant to prove that plaintiff negligently picked up the wrong package under a notice that evidence would be given in denial of paragraph 4.

2. APPEAL—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—REVIEW— NEGLIGENCE.

Where, in an action for injuries, no bill of exceptions was filed, the question of defendant's negligence under the facts could not be reviewed.

Appeal from Superior Court, New Haven County; Joel H. Reed, Judge.

Action by Mary C. Keating against William H. Hull. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff for nominal damages, she appeals. Affirmed.

Jacob P. Goodhart and Robert C. Stoddard, for appellant. William H. Ely, for appellee.

BALDWIN, J. The plaintiff entered a drug store kept by the defendant and asked one of his clerks for a pound of Sprudel salts. It was weighed out, put up in a package, and placed on the counter in front of her so as to be under her control. While she was chatting with the clerk another customer, who stood close by her, ordered of the defendant a pound of sulphate of zinc. This is a poisonous article. It was weighed out, put up in a package, and placed on the counter before the purchaser; the defendant then going off to get a "poison" label to put upon it, and telling him, at the same time, to wait till he returned with this. Before he returned the plaintiff picked up the latter package, negligently mistaking it for that which she had bought, and carried it home; the other customer shortly afterwards taking the remaining package and going off with it, without waiting for the label. Afterwards the plaintiff used some of the sulphate of zinc (which looks very much like Sprudel salts) for medicinal purposes, and was poisoned by it. The trial court found the defendant guilty of negligence in leaving the poison, unlabeled, where the plaintiff might take it by mistake for her own parcel, but that she was negligent in so taking it, and therefore awarded her only nominal damages.

In the plaintiff's complaint she alleged, in paragraph 3, that the defendant delivered to her a package which he stated to contain a pound of Sprudel salts, and that she paid him therefor the customary price of that quantity of that article. In paragraph 4 she alleged that the package so delivered did not contain such salts. The defendant filed a notice that on the hearing in damages he should offer evidence to disprove the allegations in paragraph 4. No such notice was given with respect to paragraph 3, nor was it necessary. The defendant did not dispute the truth of that paragraph. He simply sought to show that the statements of his clerk as to the contents of the package were true; and, if true, paragraph 4 was necessarily shown to be untrue.

The plaintiff asks for a correction of the finding in several respects. The only one as to which she has any plausible ground for such a claim is that there was no evidence that the plaintiff took any other package than that delivered to her. There was, indeed, no direct testimony to that fact, but it was a fair inference from other facts which were established by proof to the sufficiency of which no exception is taken.

It is open to question whether the facts stated in the finding justified the conclusion that the defendant was negligent; but, as no bill of exceptions was filed, no examination of this point is necessary.

There is no error. The other Judges concurred.

CRONAN v. CORBETT.

(Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut. Jan. 4, 1906.)

1. MECHANICS' LIENS — CERTIFICATE — DESCRIPTION — SUFFICIENCY.

A claimant of a mechanic's lien bargained to do the plumbing work upon certain structures for a gross sum. They stood on one lot and were connected on the street line by a framework attached to each, and there was a door placed therein for the use of occupants of both structures, and in each there were cellar windows opening upon the passway. Held that, notwithstanding the adaptation of the structures to being used separately, the certificate of lien having claimed a lien on a certain "building" and upon the entire lot, the description was sufficient.

2. JUDGMENT — RES JUDICATA — SCOPE OF JUDGMENT.

The fact that the superiority of a mortgage to other incumbrances was determined in a suit to foreclose it, and the order of redemption for working equity established as between other incumbrances with reference to the mortgage foreclosure, did not of itself determine the relative priorities of those who might thereafter hold the liens which were made the subject of the foreclosure; but the priorities were with reference to that particular proceeding.

Hamersley, J., dissenting in part.

Appeal from Superior Court, New Haven County; George W. Wheeler, Judge.

Suit by P. J. Cronan against Thomas W. Corbett. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Talcott H. Russell and James P. Pigott, for appellant. John K. Beach and William B. Stoddard, for appellee.

BALDWIN, J. The defendant on January 7, 1898, filed a certificate claiming a mechanic's lien on "a certain building" in New Haven owned by Maier Arick, "and the lot on which it stands," described as 150 feet square. The land is the same described in the case of Halsted & Harmount Co. v. Arick, 76 Conn. 382, 385, 56 Atl. 628, and the term "building" was used to denote the structures upon it, which are also described in that case. It is now found by the trial court that each of these structures has a cornice projecting several inches over the adjoining passway; that, in each, cellar windows, through which coal and wood are put in, open upon the passway; that another passway runs from Admiral street a few feet in the rear of these structures, which is used in common by the tenants in each; and that the rear of the lot was, when the structures were originally built, fenced off into three back yards, each appertaining to one of them. The defendant's lien arose out of a parol bargain to do the plumbing work upon said structures for a certain gross sum, according to written specifications entitled "Specifications for Plumbing of Three Brick Blocks." No separate tenement was specified in this paper, but it called for 24 sinks and 36 bathtubs, with all piping and connections; and the defendant and Arick both treated their agreement as constituting a single contract. The amount due on the mechanics' liens which were the subject of Halsted & Harmount Co. v. Arick was paid by the plaintiff, who was one of the defendants in that proceeding, on the day limited for redemption in the final judgment. These liens dated by relation from May 4, 1897. The defendant's lien dated from June 18, 1897.

The complaint in the present action is predicated both upon the Halsted & Harmount Company liens and upon a mortgage originally given by Arick to one Kaiser on August 20, 1897. The cross-complaint was predicated both on the original lien of the defendant and on his redemption of a prior mortgage of March 30, 1897, by Arick to Matz and Brown, which was the subject of the litigation in Matz v. Arick, 76 Conn. 388, 56 Atl. 630. In the original finding of facts in Halsted & Harmount Co. v. Arick it was stated that the "three buildings are adapted to be used and disposed of separately." The trial court in the present proceeding refused to insert this statement in its finding, deeming it to have been a conclusion from the evidence in the former suit, which that in the present one showed to have been unwarranted. Exception was taken to this ruling, but it is unnecessary to inquire whether it was erroneous; since, had the insertion which was requested been made in the finding, it would not have followed that the defendant's lien was invalid. He had performed work and furnished materials under a single contract upon a parcel of land belonging to a single owner. The structures placed upon it were so connected that they could, not unfairly, be described as together constituting one building, notwithstanding their adaptation to being used or disposed of separately. They were also so far disconnected that they might not unfairly be described as three buildings. The defendant's services and materials had gone to the benefit of the entire structure or structures, and not of any particular portion. The sum to which he was entitled for them was an entirety, definitely fixed, and insusceptible of apportionment. The contract on which the Halsted and Harmount liens was based was for the supply of materials, without any stipulations as to their price. This left the owner liable to pay a reasonable price; and, as the amount of material supplied to each of the three structures could be closely estimated, it was not difficult to compute the proper charge upon each of them, considered separately.

It is settled that the statute relating to mechanics' liens is to be construed with reasonable strictness, but it is certainly not to be construed with unreasonable strictness. It would be putting upon it an unreasonable construction to hold that, under the circumstances which have been detailed, the defendant could not claim a single and entire lien upon the whole lot and the improvements placed upon it, provided a proper certificate were filed. Brabazon v. Allen, 41 Conn. 361. We have no disposition to relax the wholesome rule that no one can impose a statutory lien on another's land, without complying with all the terms and conditions which the statute may prescribe. The defendant, both in venturing to describe the premises as a unit and in the mode of that description, went to the verge of the law, but in our opinion he did not go beyond it. The certificate of lien which he filed is for a lien upon "a certain building" on the lot in question, and upon the entire lot. In one point of view each of the three principal structures on the lot could be styled a building; but that the defendant used that word to denote the aggregation of the three structures was sufficiently apparent from the accompanying claim of a lien on the whole of the land. No one who looked at the premises could fail to see that the whole lot could not reasonably be claimed as appurtenant to any single one of the structures, and would therefore be warned by the terms of the certificate that it related to all of them considered as one entire edifice, for the convenient use of which the entire lot was required. Nor could it fairly be assumed by any one who might subsequently acquire an interest in the land that the words of the certificate referred to one only of the three structures, since it was clear that they described no one of them in such a way as to distinguish it from the others.

The mechanic's lien claimed by the defendant is therefore valid, and as it dates from June 18, 1897, he was properly granted a foreclosure upon it as against the Kaiser mortgage, which was not given until the following August, unless there is something in the plaintiff's contention that the order of priority between him and the defendant was conclusively settled as respects both that mortgage and the Matz and Brown mortgage by the judgment rendered in 1903 in the case of Matz v. Arick et al. By the terms of that judgment the incumbrancers against whom a foreclosure of the Matz and Brown mortgage was decreed were so arranged that Corbett, the present defendant, was required to redeem the first of any, and given another opportunity, 16 days afterward, in case of the failure to redeem of several intervening claimants, among whom was the plaintiff, as assignee of the Kaiser mortgage; but, should Corbett fail to redeem on either of his law days, then the Halsted & Harmount Company were allowed to redeem 4 days later. The record (by reference in the judgment file to the accompanying finding of facts) shows that the first law day fixed for Corbett was given to him as owner of a judgment lien for a judgment of $4,000 and costs which he had recovered against Arick in 1900, and his second law day given to him as owner of the mechanic's lien, the foreclosure of which is claimed by the cross-complaint in the present action. It does not, however, follow that the order of redemption established for the purpose of working equity in that cause forever determined the relative priorities of those who might thereafter hold the liens which were made the subject of foreclosure. The superiority of the Matz and Brown mortgage to any of the other incumbrances was thus settled, but their relations between themselves were determined solely with reference to its foreclosure in that particular proceeding.

In 1901, during the pendency of this suit by Matz and Brown, Arick conveyed the equity of redemption to the defendant, Corbett, by a quitclaim deed containing a provision that its acceptance should not merge the latter's claim under his mechanic's lien. This fact was not put in evidence, and the judgment file shows that Corbett was dealt with simply as an incumbrancer, and Arick as still sole owner of the equity of redemption. It is, however, now urged that, as Corbett in fact owned it at the time when he redeemed the Matz and Brown mortgage, he must be considered as having redeemed as the owner of the equity, and so that, in favor of every incumbrancer, that mortgage became extinguished. This claim was not made on the trial, but, on the contrary, both parties acquiesced in the position that the plaintiff as a second mortgagee might redeem the first, or Matz and Brown, mortgage, and thus united in affirming the continued existence of the latter. Corbett, then, having redeemed the Matz and Brown mortgage in the capacity of a junior incumbrancer, stepped into the shoes of Matz and Brown and acquired the first lien upon the land in controversy. As holder of that lien, he was properly granted the foreclosure claimed in his cross-complaint, of the plaintiff's interests both under the Kaiser mortgage and the Halsted & Harmount liens. He was also properly granted, as owner of his mechanic's lien, a foreclosure of the plaintiff's interest under the Kaiser mortgage, since he had shown to the satisfaction of the trial court that the former incumbrance antedated the latter, and since the evidence by which he showed it was, for reasons already stated, not excluded or overcome by any estoppel of record.

There is no error. The other Judges concurred, except HAMERSLEY, J., who dissented in part.

PUROTO et al. v. CHIEPPA et al.

(Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut. Dec. 15, 1905.)

1. EASEMENT—LIGHT AND AIR—PRESCRIPTION.

Under Gen. St. 1902, § 4046, providing that no occupant of real estate shall acquire by adverse occupation the right to keep any window or light, so as to prevent the adjoining owner from erecting any building on his land, an easement of light and air, which will render it unlawful for an adjoining owner to erect a building on his land, cannot be acquired by prescription.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 17, Cent. Dig. Easements, § 34.]

2. SAME—IMPLIED GRANT.

The projection of the eaves of a house, and the extension of the window blinds a few inches over the divisional line, is not sufficient proof of such a visible adverse use of the adjoining land as to warrant the presumption of an implied grant, and thereby prohibit a bona fide purchaser of the adjoining land from building on the divisional line.

3. TRESPASS—NOMINAL DAMAGES.

The extension of a flashboard one inch over a divisional line in the erection of a building is a trespass on the adjoining owner, entitling him to nominal damages, though no specific damage results from such injury.

Appeal from Superior Court, New Haven County; William S. Case, Judge.

Action by Alfonso Puroto and another against Salvino Chiappa and another, in the nature of trespass quare clausum fregit. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

George E. Beers and Carl A. Mears, for appellants. Philip Pond and Paul Russo, for appellees.

HALL, J. The complaint alleges that on December 10, 1903, the defendants wrongfully entered upon the plaintiffs' land on Grand avenue in the city of New Haven, and cut off a portion of the eaves and cornice of the plaintiffs' house, and erected and maintained a building projecting over the plaintiffs' land, constituting a trespass thereon, and by building the wall of their house interfered with the plaintiffs' right to have unobstructed light and air through the windows of their house over the defendants' land. These averments were denied by the answer. The material facts found are these: The plaintiffs and defendants own adjoining lots on the south side of a business street in New Haven; the plaintiffs' premises being west of those of the defendants. Both tracts belonged to one Nicholson, who on September 23, 1851, conveyed to one Gunn that now owned by the plaintiffs, and on the 31st of October, 1851, to certain McCuens that now owned by the defendants. Through several mesne conveyances the defendants acquired their title in October, 1898, and the plaintiffs their title in October, 1900; all the conveyances being by warranty deed, and none of them containing any reference to any easement of light or air. Before said Nicholson conveyed said land, as above stated, and until December 10, 1903, there was upon the land now owned by the plaintiffs a two-story wooden building, the east side of which was about a foot west of the divisional line between said two tracts, upon the west side of each of the two floors of which were two windows with swinging blinds, one room upon each of said floors receiving all its light from a window or windows upon said east side; and upon the land now owned by the defendants there was a wooden building, the west side of which was 8 or 10 feet east of said divisional line. On or about December 10, 1903, the defendants built a three-story brick addition to their house, occupying the 8 or 10 feet between their old house and the divisional line, and extending about 12 feet above the plaintiffs' house, and having no windows upon its west side. At the front of the building the base of the wall of the addition is upon the divisional line, and elsewhere a little east of the divisional line. The lower floors of both of said buildings are used for stores, and the upper floors as tenements. The erection of said brick addition diminished the light and air, which had always before passed unobstructed over the portion of defendants' land occupied by it, through said east windows of the plaintiffs' house. There still remains an open space, varying from 12 to 18 inches, between the brick addition and the plaintiffs' house, which space is darkened by the projecting eaves of the plaintiffs' house, which at nearly all points touch the wall of the defendants' addition. The erection of said addition also prevents the swinging of the blinds upon said east windows as they had before been swung; 2 or 3 inches more space being required for that purpose. Before the erection of said brick addition the cornice of the plaintiffs' house had, near the front, overhung the divisional line about 8 inches, and in erecting said addition the molding of said cornice was cut off by the defendants some 2 or 3 inches, for a distance of about 12 feet from the front of the building, but in no way injuring the plaintiffs' building. A flashboard, which can be readily removed, was placed by the defendants upon the upper part of the west wall of the addition, so that at the front end of the wall it extended over the plaintiffs' land an inch beyond the divisional line. The court finds that the only damage suffered by the plaintiffs arises from the shutting off of light and air, as aforesaid, by the erection of the defendants' addition on the divisional line.

The principal question in the case is whether the plaintiffs had an easement of light and air which rendered it unlawful for the defendants to erect the brick addition, as they did, upon the strip of land 8 or 10 feet wide, between the defendants' old house and the divisional line. They acquired no such right by prescription. Section 4046 of the General Statutes of 1902, which has been in force since 1847, provides that "no occupant of real estate shall acquire by adverse occupation the right to keep, sustain or enjoy any window or light so as to prevent the owner of adjoining premises from erecting and maintaining any building thereon." There was no implied grant of such an easement. If the ancient law of implied grants or easements of light and air, which is a kindred doctrine to that of prescriptive rights to such easements, has any existence in this state, its force is recognized only to a very limited extent, and it is rarely, if ever, applied against bona fide purchasers of the land over which such easement is claimed. The law as to implied easements of this character is very fully discussed in the case of Robinson v. Clapp, 65 Conn. 365, 32 Atl. 939, 29 L. R. A. 582, in which the facts bearing upon the claimed easement of light and air were quite similar to those in the case at bar, and which we regard as decisive of the plaintiffs' claim to such an easement in the case before us. Of the existence of such an easement the court says (page 384 of 65 Conn., page 944 of 32 Atl. [29 L. R. A. 582]): "It must be of a character so evidently necessary to the reasonable enjoyment of the granted premises, so continuous in its nature, so plain, visible, and open, so manifest from the situation and relation of the two tracts as to fairly and clearly indicate to a prospective purchaser of the reserved portion the intention of the parties to the previous sale that it should remain, and to make such purchaser chargeable with knowledge that the law, based on justice, that equity, founded on good conscience, would forbid him, in case of his purchase, to so occupy the lot as to interfere with such easement."

The fact that the blinds, which had been on the windows of the east side of the plaintiffs' house for more than 15 years prior to the erection of the defendants' addition, would, when opened or closed, swing two or three inches over the divisional line, and that the cornice on the eaves of the plaintiffs' house, the molding of which was removed by the defendants, had extended during that period over said line for two or three inches, was properly regarded by the trial court as not sufficient proof of such an open, visible, adverse use of another's real estate as must be presumed to have been with the knowledge and acquiescence of the owner (School District v. Lynch, 33 Conn. 330-334), or of such an easement in the plaintiffs, by either prescription or implied grant, as prohibited the defendants from building their addition on the divisional line as described in the deeds. The placing of the flashboard on the west wall of the addition, so that it extended an inch over the divisional line, was a trespass upon the plaintiffs' land, which entitled them to a favorable judgment upon one of the issues raised by the pleadings, as well as to a judgment for a nominal sum for the damage which the legal injury, arising from the trespass, necessarily imports, even when no specific damage results from such an injury. Parker v. Griswold, 17 Conn. 288-302, 42 Am. Dec. 739.

For the reason, among others, that the plaintiffs' property has been found to be of the value claimed by them, the exclusion of some of the plaintiffs' evidence to prove that value was not harmful. The conclusions reached by us render other rulings upon evidence unimportant.

There is error, and the case is remanded, with directions to correct the judgment in accordance with the views above stated, but without direction as to the judgment for costs in the superior court. The other Judges concurred.

CAMPBELL v. CITY OF NEW HAVEN.

(Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut. Dec. 15, 1905.)

1. EVIDENCE—OPINION EVIDENCE—CONDITION OF STREET.

In an action against a city for injuries from a defective sidewalk, a policeman whose beat included the place of the accident, and who had testified fully as to the conditions, was competent to testify as to whether in his opinion the walk was in a reasonably safe condition for public travel.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — ACTION FOR INJURIES—FINDINGS—CONSTRUCTION.

PRENTICE, J. The plaintiff sued to recover for personal injuries sustained by a fall upon a sidewalk in one of the defendant's streets alleged to have been defective and out of repair by reason of snow and ice thereon. Upon the hearing in damages, after a default, the condition of the walk on February 18, 1904, the day before the accident, became the subject of inquiry and a material one. The defendant presented as one of its witnesses a policeman within whose beat the place of accident was, and whose duty it was to see that property owners kept their walks in proper condition. He testified to the conditions which had existed with respect to the walk in question for several days prior to said February 18th and especially upon that day. After stating these conditions in detail and fully as he observed them, he was asked whether or not the walk when he saw it on February 18th was in a reasonably safe condition for public travel. Upon objection that the question called for the expression of an opinion, it was excluded. This ruling was accompanied by the observation on the part of the court that the question put to the witness was one for it, and the direction that the witness' testimony be confined to a statement of what he saw.

The objection and ruling were made under a misapprehension of the rule in this jurisdiction. Whatever may have been elsewhere held, it has been well settled by long practice and repeated decisions in this state that the defendant was entitled to have its question answered. Porter v. Pequonnoc Mfg. Co., 17 Conn. 249; Dunham's Appeal, 27 Conn. 192; Sydleman v. Beckwith, 43 Conn. 9; Taylor v. Town of Monroe, Id. 36; Ryan v. Town of Bristol, 63 Conn. 26, 27 Atl. 309; Dean v. Town of Sharon, 72 Conn. 667, 45 Atl. 963. It is quite possible that the answer of this witness, if received, would not have influenced the conclusion of the court. In fact the finding contains an intimation that by reason of the large extent of sidewalk which came under the witness' oversight, and of the fact that his recollection of this particular walk was one for which he was largely dependent upon his memorandum book entries, such might have been the case. But we cannot, nevertheless, for reasons well stated in Peck v. Pierce, 63 Conn. 310, 28 Atl. 524, so far enter into the mind of the court and forecast its possible operations as to say that it would not have been influenced by an opinion from the witness which it never heard and weighed. Rooney v. Woolworth, 74 Conn. 720, 52 Atl. 411. Neither can we say that the defendant was not by the ruling, and possibly others of the same character not repeated upon the record, deterred from presenting opinion evidence of such convincing character that the action of the court would have been controlled thereby. We cannot, therefore, regard the ruling as a harmless one.

The defendant further complains that judgment was rendered against it upon a finding that it failed to prove that the walk was safe, and upon the theory that it was liable if the injury arose from its failure to keep it safe. An argument is drawn from the finding that the court held the defendant to the high duty of maintaining the walk in a safe condition, and did not content itself with applying the lower standard of duty applicable to the situation. This claim is made with much earnestness, and with the accompanying comment that the action of the court furnishes only one illustration of a growing tendency on the part of trial courts to hold municipalities to a duty with respect to their miles of sidewalks which is unwarranted in law and unjust in its burden. If the defendant is correct in its interpretation of the finding, it is certainly aggrieved. Municipalities are not insurers of the safety of travelers upon their highways, whatever the season or whatever the cause which renders them dangerous. The herculean task of making such ways safe at all times and under all circumstances is not imposed upon them. This is especially true in our climate in respect to accumulations of ice or snow thereon. Some duty is imposed in such cases, but it is a limited one, in that it takes into account a variety of conditions and circumstances, including the difficulties attending situations as they are created by the rigors of our winters. In our leading case of Congdon v. Norwich, 37 Conn. 414, this subject, with especial reference to sidewalks, had a thorough discussion. The rule of duty was there carefully stated, and the limitations upon it forcibly expressed. See, also, Landolt v. Norwich, 37 Conn. 615; Cloughessey v. Waterbury, 51 Conn. 405, 50 Am. Rep. 38. The language of the finding, which contains no other conclusion of negligence than that which is to be drawn from the statement that the walk had not been made safe for travel, lends some color to the interpretation the defendant gives to it. We are, however, unprepared to accept that interpretation as conveying the court's meaning. Not infrequently even in judicial opinions the word "safe" and its cognates have been inadvertently used where "reasonable safety under all the circumstances" was intended. Such doubtless was the case here, and we have little doubt that the court tested the defendant's conduct in the case of the walk in question by the true rule of duty. It is, however, unnecessary to pursue the inquiry further, since a new trial must be granted for another reason, and an opportunity will thus be afforded the defendant to have any possible error in this regard rectified.

There is error, and a new trial is granted. The other Judges concurred.

FOOTE v. BROWN et al.

(Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut. Dec. 15, 1905.)

1. QUIETING TITLE—STATUTES—APPLICATION.

Gen. St. 1902, § 4053, provides that an action may be brought by a person claiming title to or an interest in land, against any person or persons who claim to own the same or any part thereof, or have an estate in fee, for years, for life, in reversion, or in remainder, or to have any interest therein, or any lien or incumbrance thereon, adverse to plaintiff, for the purpose of determining such adverse estate, interest, or claim, and to clear up all doubts and disputes, and to quiet title to the land, etc. Held, that a suit in equity could not be maintained under such section by the owner of land who had been in possession, to recover possession and damages against defendants alleged to have unlawfully entered and occupied the land.

2. APPEAL—REVIEW—THEORY OF CASE.

Where, in a suit to quiet title under Gen. St. 1902, § 4053, authorizing such a suit under certain circumstances, one of the defendants claimed that judgment for costs could not be rendered against him, and both defendants denied that such section authorized the court to render judgment for possession or for money damages in favor of plaintiff, and an exception was taken to such judgment, it could not be sustained, after trial, on the theory that the parties voluntarily submitted their controversy to the court for the purpose of obtaining such a judgment.

3. PLEADING—DEMURRER.

A demurrer covering a general claim that the facts alleged in the complaint were insufficient to support the action against defendants was too general.

4. QUIETING TITLE—STATUTES—DISCLAIMER—Costs.

Under the express provisions of Gen. St. 1902, § 4053, authorizing a suit to quiet title to land under certain circumstances, costs cannot be adjudged against a defendant who by his answer disclaims all estate or interest in or incumbrance on the property.

Appeal from Superior Court, New Haven County; Silas A. Robinson, Judge.

Suit by Eliza S. Foote against Chester A. Brown and others to quiet title to certain land. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

The plaintiff, under the will of her husband who died in 1878, had a freehold estate in a small bit of land bounded by the sea. The defendants entered upon this land, occupied the same, built a boathouse thereon, and thereafter continued in occupation of the land. The plaintiff, claiming this entry and occupation to be wrongful, sought redress by an action which is set forth in the complaint as follows: "(1) That she has an interest in certain land in said town of Guilford [describing the land] which is a part of the estate of the said George A. Foote. (2) Her interest in said land is the right to lease the same, and enjoy the rents and income thereof, pursuant to the will of her late husband, the said George A. Foote. (3) Said defendants, Chester A. Brown and James Garfield Brown, have wrongfully entered on said land, placed a building thereon, claiming some interest or estate in said land adverse to the plaintiff, and continue in the occupation thereof. (4) Said land is worth $1,000. The plaintiff claims: (1) That each defendant be required to state the nature and extent of his interest in said land and the source through which the same was derived; (2) judgment settling the title; (3) judgment for the possession of said premises; (4) $300 damages. A demurrer to the complaint was overruled. The defendants filed separate answers. Each answer denied the first three paragraphs of the complaint, but the answer of the defendant Chester A. Brown contained also a disclaimer of all estate or interest in the land described in the complaint, and that of James G. Brown stated the denial of the third paragraph of the complaint in the form of an allegation that the land described was common land belonging to the town of Guilford, and that said town had authorized him to place a building on said land and occupy the same, and that in pursuance of said authority and not otherwise he had occupied said land; and further alleges that his interest and occupation of said land is not adverse to any title, interest, or claim that the plaintiff may have in said land. The case was tried to the court upon the issues raised by these pleadings. The court made a finding from which it appears that the following facts were found: (1) The land was not common land belonging to the town of Guilford, but was included in a farm belonging to the plaintiff's husband at the time of his death. (2) At the time of the entry by the defendants the plaintiff was in possession of the land in pursuance of a valid title in her. (3) The defendants made wrongful entry upon the land, placed a building thereon, and have ever since continued in occupancy of said land. (4) Neither of the defendants has any title, right, or interest in the land—and thereupon rendered judgment for the plaintiff. The judgment describes the action as claiming judgment settling the title to the land described, possession of said land, $300 damages. It then states that the court finds the issues for the plaintiff and finds the facts as follows—reciting the facts substantially as above stated, with the additional fact that the plaintiff is entitled to nominal damages in the sum of $5. "Whereupon it is adjudged that the defendants deliver to the plaintiff possession of said premises, and that the plaintiff recover of the defendants five dollars ($5) damages and her costs." The material errors assigned in appeal are: In overruling the demurrer; in treating this case as an action of ejectment and not one of quieting title to said premises; in refusing to grant costs to the defendant Chester A. Brown upon his filing a disclaimer; in holding that under section 4053 of the General Statutes of 1902 the plaintiff could maintain an action of ejectment and recover possession of the premises and money damages; in holding that the complaint sets forth an action of ejectment.

Robert C. Stoddard, for appellants. Henry C. White, for appellee.

HAMERSLEY, J. (after stating the facts). The disposition of this appeal depends upon the meaning and legal effect of section 4053 of the General Statutes of 1902. This section contains unchanged the provisions of "An Act concerning Civil Actions," passed in 1893 (Pub. Acts 1893, p. 237, c. 66). The terms and language of the act are suggestive of doubt as to its meaning in some particulars, and, in ascertaining its meaning where thus doubtful, the act should be read in view of the evil it was passed to remedy. What this evil was had been shortly before brought to public attention by certain opinions delivered by this court. In 1890 one Ernest Strong Miles was in possession of certain land devised to him by the will of Selah Strong (who died in 1879) and then conveyed said land to his father, Samuel A. Miles, in trust for purposes specified in the deed. The entire estate of Selah Strong had in 1882 been duly distributed to the devisees, and the estate had then been finally settled. When Samuel Miles attempted to sell the land conveyed to him in trust, he found himself hindered in making a sale, by reason of certain claims of heirs of Selah Strong that the land devised to Ernest Miles was not thereby vested in him absolutely, but that these heirs had a remainder interest contingent upon the happening of events named in the will. Whether or not Ernest Miles when he executed the trust deed had an absolute estate in the land conveyed depended on the meaning expressed by the language of the will independently of extrinsic circumstances. For the purpose of obtaining a judicial construction of this language, so that he might be able to make a sale beneficial to his cestui que trust, Samuel Miles, who was also executor of the will, brought an action as such executor for the construction of the will. We held that upon these facts an executor could not maintain such an action, and the complaint was dismissed. Miles v. Strong, 60 Conn. 393, 22 Atl. 959. Immediately afterward Samuel Miles, as trustee under the deed above mentioned, and Ernest Miles brought an action for quieting the title of said Ernest or his grantee, stating in the complaint the facts above mentioned. We held that the real question between the parties, as stated in the complaint, related wholly to the legal title to land, involving only legal questions, and as such the defendants were entitled to litigate them in a trial at law, and that under our practice an action in equity for that purpose could not be maintained, and the complaint was accordingly dismissed. Miles v. Strong, 62 Conn. 95, 25

Atl. 459: As a result of these decisions it appeared that an owner in possession of land was prevented from making a beneficial sale thereof by claims of others to a contingent remainder interest in the land, that the validity of these claims depended solely on the legal effect of language used in a will, that the owner could not have this question determined in a court of equity, because it was solely a legal question relating to the title to land, and being in possession he could not compel a trial at law until the claimants should see fit to assert their claim through a legal action or some illegal act, and that in the meantime there was no redress for the injury to his property rights caused by the existence of these claims. We recognized in our opinion the force of the dilemma in which an owner of land under such circumstances was placed, and indicated that it arose from the fact that such actual present damage did not constitute under our common law and existing statutes a present legal injury.

Immediately after the rendition of this decision had called attention to this state of our law in reference to such damage, the act of 1893 was passed. The act provided that it should take effect from its passage, and the day after it went into effect Samuel and Ernest Miles, plaintiffs in the last-mentioned action, commenced an action in pursuance of the new act, stating in their complaint substantially the same facts alleged in their prior complaint, and upon this action we held in effect that the present damage caused the plaintiffs by existing claims adverse to their ownership in fee simple of the land which before the passage of the act was practically damnum absque injuria had become, through the operation of the act, a legal injury for which they were entitled to redress through a judgment settling the title in them as against the defendants. It seems to us apparent that this act was passed for the purpose of remedying an evil such as that disclosed by the decisions above mentioned, and that, as we have before said, it was evidently intended to provide a remedy for such a wrong and hardship as that thus disclosed, for which there was, under the previously existing law, no plain and adequate remedy. Miles v. Strong, 68 Conn. 273, 288, 36 Atl. 55. This evident intent and purpose of the Legislature in passing the act must be an influential element in determining its meaning and legal effect as expressed in the language used. In Miles v. Strong, 68 Conn. 287, 36 Atl. 55, we said that the act was in some respects very loosely and carelessly drawn and might require amendment, but that its purpose was tolerably clear and that effect ought to be given to its provisions. The act has now remained unchanged for 12 years. There has been misconception as to its scope, and abuse as to its application. The exigencies of the present case justify, and indeed require, such a definite construction of the act in respect to the questions involved as will serve the purpose of its enactment and give reasonable effect to its provisions.

Since the last-mentioned decision in Miles v. Strong, several actions brought upon this statute have been before us on appeal. The case of Lawlor v. Holohan, 70 Conn. 87, 38 Atl. 908, was similar to that of Miles v. Strong. The plaintiff, in possession as owner in fee, brought an action against the defendant claiming to own a contingent remainder, praying for an adjudication of these conflicting claims. In Curtis, receiver, v. Lewis, 74 Conn. 387, 50 Atl. 678, the action was in reality brought by the receiver of an insolvent estate to set aside a mortgage deed as fraudulent and void as against creditors. Upon the pleadings and finding of facts by committee, it was reserved for the advice of this court. No question as to pleading was raised. In the opinion we say: "The pleadings in this action are unnecessarily framed for the purpose of taking advantage of the provisions of 'An act concerning civil actions' (Pub. Acts 1893, p. 237, c. 66), and for this reason the real cause of action is not set forth in the complaint and no material issue is raised by the answer. The reply alleges the cause of action, and the rejoinder serves the purpose of an answer." In Cahill v. Cahill, 76 Conn. 542, 546, 57 Atl. 284, the complaint stated facts showing that the controversy was one concerning title to land; the plaintiffs being out of possession and claiming title as heirs of one party, and the defendants who were in possession claiming title as devisees of another. The defendants filed a plea in abatement alleging the pendency of another suit, to wit, an action of ejectment between the same parties for the same cause of action. In sustaining this plea in abatement, we said: "If under any circumstances one who has been dispossessed may bring an action under section 4053, for the purpose of having his title determined as against his dispossessors, he cannot properly do so while another suit in the nature of an action of ejectment to try the title to the same land is pending in the same jurisdiction between the same parties." In Layton v. Bailey, 77 Conn. 22, 30, 58 Atl. 355, the pleadings subsequent to the complaint showed that in substance this was an action of ejectment brought by an alleged owner out of possession against the person in possession. In refusing to reverse the judgment of the trial court on account of the errors assigned, we avoided deciding whether or not a cause of action which is in substance an action of ejectment is properly stated in a complaint framed to meet the requirements of the special equitable remedy provided by section 4053, because the parties had not raised that question in the case, and we intentionally left open the question whether the conflicting claims to the ownership of land can properly be tried in an action brought under that section by an owner out of possession against his alleged dispossessor. In Dawson v. Orange, 78 Conn. 98, 61 Atl. 101, the plaintiff claimed to be the owner and in possession of a narrow strip of land, and alleged that the defendant claimed to own an interest in that land adverse to the plaintiff. The defendant in its statement of claim described substantially three claims, viz., that as a town corporation it owned the land described, that the land was a public highway, that the land was a public beach. We held that section 4053 authorized an action only against claimants to the ownership of a property interest in the land, and that a town as such did not own land within its limits used as a highway or as a public beach by reason of its appropriation to such public use, and therefore the validity of the two last-mentioned claims could not be tried in this action and the claims were properly expunged. We also held that, when in this statutory action an owner in possession of land seeks to try the validity of his title as against one out of possession claiming ownership, the issue thus presented is in its nature one arising upon legal, as distinguished from equitable, claims, and that such an issue in this case was properly tried to the jury.

Upon a careful study of the circumstances attending the passage of the act of 1893, of the terms and provisions of the act itself, and of the effect of our former decisions, we have reached the following conclusions as to the construction and meaning of section 4053 in respect to the particulars involved in the appeal now before us. The Legislature found a defect in the existing law, whether substantive law or procedure or both, in that an owner of real property might suffer actual damage to his property rights through adverse claims of interest in the same property advanced by others, and yet had no adequate remedy at law or in equity for the redress of that damage as a legal injury. The act provides a remedy for that evil through the creation of a statutory equitable action in which all persons claiming such adverse interest may be made defendants, securing, however, to the parties a trial by jury of issues of fact which might properly arise in the action as incident to the equitable relief sought, but which are in their nature such as should entitle the parties to a jury trial. The action authorized by the statute implies an ownership of land or some interest therein by the plaintiff; a claim by the defendant of ownership of some interest in the same land adverse to the plaintiff's title, of such a nature that the defendant under the formerly existing law could not, or might refuse to, bring to the test of trial, and the judicial settlement of which the plaintiff cannot compel except through the statutory action; a damage to the plaintiff's property rights necessarily incident to such a state of things. The statement of the cause of action in the complaint and the subsequent pleadings should be in accordance with the principle of plain, direct, and truthful statement which underlies the practice act, and may follow the analogies, so far as they exist, to the manner of statement in an ordinary civil action. The essentials of a complaint are, a statement of the plaintiff's ownership in the land described and of his title thereto, and a statement that the defendant claims to have an interest in the same land adverse to the plaintiff. The complaint may also properly state the claim, if known to the plaintiff, made by the defendant, and, if it appears clearly from such a complaint that the plaintiff has adequate remedy through an ordinary action, it is demurrable. The statutory relief is equitable and consists in a judgment quieting and settling the title to the land through a determination of the questions and disputes properly submitted to trial by the pleadings. A claim that the defendant be required to state the nature of his interests, etc., cannot properly be included in the prayer for relief. Any obligation of the defendant in this respect is determined by the requirements of the statute relating to his answer. Where the defendant has made no claim, he may deny the plaintiff's allegation that he claims adverse interest, but ordinarily in such case he would answer by disclaiming any interest. Where the complaint states truly the plaintiff's ownership and the defendant's claim based on admitted facts showing the nature and extent of his title, the defendant's answer should simply admit the allegations of the complaint, and thereupon the question of law determinative of the conflicting claims of title would be in issue. In other cases the defendant must comply with the statute in stating the nature of the interest which he claims. This statement by itself puts nothing in issue; coupled with a denial of the plaintiff's allegation of ownership it puts the plaintiff to his proof or to a reply. The statement of claim may be coupled in the answer with a denial of the plaintiff's statement, or with such denial and affirmative statements proper to explain the denial or settling forth new matter. The duty of the parties in all cases is to state as simply and plainly as possible the material facts, which being admitted or found by the court, the court may lawfully render judgment settling the title as between plaintiff and defendant.

Applying these conclusions as to the construction and meaning of section 4053 to the present case, it is palpable from the complaint, subsequent pleadings, and all the proceedings in the trial, that the plaintiff's cause of action was one not included within the scope of section 4053. She had been an owner of land in possession. Her grievance against the defendants was an unlawful entry and occupation of her land. Her redress was possession and damages, and her remedy an action at law. The judgment of the trial court is plainly based on an erroneous view of the law. This case is not strictly analogous to one where the plaintiff in attempting to state one cause of action includes in the complaint certain allegations which, separated from the others, may substantially, although informally and inaccurately, set forth another cause of action; and the defendant, waiving the irregularities and defects of form, denies such allegations, and upon the trial both parties claim a judgment appropriate to the issues thus joined and a just judgment is thereupon rendered. In such a case we might properly refuse to set aside the judgment. Substantial justice has been done, and, in the absence of exceptions during the trial, the parties should not be permitted to challenge the judgment. Here, exception was taken during the trial; the action was admittedly brought under section 4053 and was so treated by the parties and the court; one defendant claimed that judgment for costs could not be rendered against him; and both defendants claimed that section 4053 did not authorize the court to render judgment for possession or for money damages in favor of the plaintiff. Under such circumstances we cannot say that the judgment was rendered in pursuance of the request of the parties and upon a voluntary submission by them of their controversies to the court for the purpose of obtaining such a judgment. The defendants, in specifying their grounds of demurrer, covered a general claim that the facts alleged in the complaint were insufficient in law to support the action against them. The demurrer in this respect was too general, and the plaintiff might properly have declined to argue, and the trial court might properly have declined to decide, whether or not the complaint stated a cause of action within the scope of section 4053. But this course was not followed. The court, in overruling the demurrer, plainly holds that the complaint sufficiently states the statutory action and for this reason overrules the demurrer, and this action of the court was accepted by the parties as determining the plaintiff's action to be one under the statute, and all further proceedings in the trial were controlled by this decision upon the demurrer. Under these circumstances we think the defendant's assignment of error that the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the complaint is well taken. Treating the action as one under the statute, the court erred in rendering judgment for costs against the defendant who disclaimed all interest in the land, and erred in holding that section 4053 authorizes the court in that statutory action to try the common-law action of ejectment and to render judgment appropriate to that action for possession and money damages.

No claim can be made in this case that by reason of the pleadings subsequent to the complaint and by the conduct of the parties there has been an abandonment of the statutory action, and issues have been framed in an action of ejectment which the parties have voluntarily submitted to the determination of the court, and therefore its judgment upon those issues should not be set aside. From first to last the parties and the court have treated this action as the statutory one. Several states have enacted statutes more or less similar in substance or form to section 4053. The courts of some of these states have treated the particular statute under discussion as a mere enlargement of common-law equity jurisdiction; and such statute has been treated by courts of other states as providing for a statutory action controlled in its scope and procedure by the provisions of the statute. These differences are due mainly, if not wholly, to differences in the statutes under discussion and in the existing law of the states enacting them. Where the statute has been treated as providing a statutory action, the decisions relating to its construction necessarily depend upon the provisions of each statute and the law and practice of the enacting state. We have, therefore, in reaching our conclusions as to the meaning and effect of section 4053, been deprived of that direct aid which might be derived from decisions in other jurisdictions, if the questions involved depended merely upon the application of general principles of equity jurisdiction. In Jersey City v. Lembeck, 81 N. J. Eq. 255, the court comments on a condition somewhat analogous to that which led to the passage of our act of 1893, and seems to assume that the evident purpose of the New Jersey act under discussion was not to provide an additional remedy for an existing ground of action, but rather to establish or recognize a ground of action not before existing, and to provide for this new legal injury a special statutory remedy, and holds that this inducing purpose of the act should control its meaning and limit its operation.

There is error. The judgment of the superior court is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings according to law. The other Judges concurred.

MCGARRY v. HEALEY.

(Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut. Dec. 15, 1905.)

1. EVIDENCE — HANDWRITING — SIMILARITY — DISGUISED WRITINGS.

Where, on an issue of similarity of certain handwriting, experts on cross-examination each testified that both the anonymous letters in controversy showed an apparent attempt at disguise, it was proper to show by such witnesses that attempts at disguise in handwriting did not eradicate from the product those peculiarities which indicate the producer.

2. TRIAL—REQUEST TO CHARGE.

Requests to charge may be properly refused, where the court sufficiently stated to the jury the issues presented for their determination and such principles of law as were necessary for their proper determination.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trial, §§ 651-659.]

3. LIBEL—PRIVILEGE.

Where, in an action for libel, defendant denied all knowledge of the alleged libelous letters, and did not claim that they were sent in good faith or under a sense of duty, it was proper for the court to refuse to charge on the subject of privileged communications.

Appeal from Superior Court, New Haven County; Ralph Wheeler, Judge.

Action by Daniel McGarry against Francis Healey. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Charles S. Hamilton, for appellant. David E. Fitzgerald and Walter J. Walsh, for appellee.

PRENTICE, J. The complaint is in two counts. Each charges the defendant with the willful and malicious publication of a libel concerning the plaintiff. The alleged publication and libel consisted of sending upon two occasions to the plaintiff's then employer an anonymous letter, in which the plaintiff was in the first instance accused of theft from his employer, and in the second of being a thief, conviction of theft, former discharge for theft, and drunkenness. Each count contains the usual allegations of falsity and malice, and an averment of special damage, including discharge from employment upon each occasion.

Upon the trial, which was to the jury, the defendant took exceptions to sundry rulings upon the admission of testimony which are assigned as error. All of these rulings were either inherently correct, or within the domain of the court's discretion, or harmless if not technically correct. Only two call for comment and these present the same question. For the purpose of showing that the defendant was the author of the two letters, the plaintiff offered certain writings admitted or shown to be in the defendant's hand, and thereafter two experts in handwriting who testified that the anonymous letters and the standards of comparison were in the same handwriting. Upon cross-examination each testified that in both the anonymous letters there was an apparent attempt at disguise. Upon redirect one of these witnesses was asked whether or not the same general characteristics would be likely to exist where one had attempted to disguise handwriting as in the undisguised hand: The other was asked as to the probability of the writer disguising the second letter in the same manner as the first. This question was ill framed, but the objection to it was general, and the trial court might well have considered it as addressed to its substantial object, rather than to its form. The purpose and intent of it was plain and could not well have been misunderstood when it was asked and answered. The interrogator was by both questions seeking to show from the experience an observation of the skilled witnesses that peculiarities mark the handwriting of an individual even in the presence of attempts at disguise, so that comparisons even as between disguised and undisguised writings, or as between different disguised writings, furnish intelligent bases for conclusions as to the identity of the writer. The disputed writings having been declared to be disguised, it was not only pertinent, but important that the plaintiff should show that attempts at disguises did not, as shown by experience, eradicate from the product those peculiarities which to the initiated especially indicate the producer. The questions were properly admitted.

The defendant presented to the court a number of requests to charge the jury covering more than four pages of the printed record. The failure of the court to comply with each of these requests is assigned as error. It was the duty of the court to state to the jury the issues which were presented for its determination upon the evidence and such principles of law as might be necessary for their proper determination upon the facts as they should be found to exist and to make this statement in as simple, orderly, clear, and precise a manner as it reasonably could under the circumstances. Rosenstein v. Fair Haven & W. R. Co., 78 Conn. 29, 60 Atl. 1061; Hartford v. Champion, 58 Conn. 268, 20 Atl. 471. An examination of the charge discloses that this duty was performed; nor was any subject involved in the requests omitted. The court was under no duty to notice the requests specifically, and the instructions given are to be commended, in that they were in the language of the court, and framed in an orderly manner and judicial spirit, and avoided what we have recently had frequent occasion to condemn as an unsatisfactory and dangerous practice. Rosenstein v. Fair Haven & W. R. Co., 78 Conn. 29, 60 Atl. 1061; Carney v. Hennessey, 77 Conn. 577, 60 Atl. 129; Shaller v. Bullock, 78 Conn. 65, 61 Atl. 65.

One of the requests asked the court to give to the jury certain somewhat extended instructions upon the subject of privileged occasions and privileged communications, with especial reference to occasions where the one making the communication is, as was the defendant in this case, a pure volunteer without interest, confidential relation, or duty, save such as might arise from a personal sense of social or moral duty. The court refused to comply with this request, and told the jury that in view of the volunteer capacity of the defendant, the nature and contents of the letters, and their anonymous character, they were not privileged communications. This action of the court is especially complained of. We are under no necessity of considering the bearing which the anonymous character of the communications in question has upon the question of privilege. It is sufficient that there is nothing disclosed in the facts and circumstances of this case upon which a claim of privilege could be made for them had they been signed by the writer. Defamatory communications made by a volunteer, without interest, confidential relation, or other duty than a moral or social one, are never privileged unless made in good faith, and in an honest belief in their truth, and with an honest intent to perform the duty. Atwater v. Morning News Co., 87 Conn. 504, 34 Atl. 865; Odgers on Libel & Slander, 213 et seq. This defendant was not heard to say nor did he claim to have proved that he sent the letters in good faith and under a sense of a duty. On the contrary, he strenuously denied all knowledge of them. The court was therefore quite right in giving the instruction it did, and in not sending to the jury an issue which was not in the case. The charge is complained of in three other minor particulars. It is sufficient to say of these passages that they are unexceptionable.

There is no error. The other Judges concurred.

DILTS et al. v. CLAYHAUNCE et al.
(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Jan. 16, 1906.)

WILLS — CONSTRUCTION — CONTINGENT DEVISE — TRANSMISSIBLE INTEREST.

A devise of real estate to a widow for life and to a stepson in fee is followed by a direction that, if the stepson should die without issue, the same should be divided among testator's brothers and sisters, with a provision that, if any brother or sister should die leaving children, his or her share should go to the children. Held:

1. That upon the happening of the contingency, the estate of the stepson was divested.
2. That by the direction to divide the persons indicated as intended by testator to share his bounty are any brothers or sisters then surviving, the children of any brother or sister who had died leaving children, and the grantee, devisee, or heir at law of any brother or sister who had died leaving no child.
3. The interest of children, substituted for parents under the direction, is transmissible to their heirs at law.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Bill by Anna M. Dilts and others against Elizabeth Clayhaunce and others. Motion to confirm masters report denied.

Richard S. Kuhl, for complainants. John S. Connett and Willard S. Parker, for defendants.

MAGIE, Ch. The bill in this cause was filed for the partition of lands in the county of Hunterdon which formerly belonged to one Asa Moore. By his will, dated April 21, 1858, and probated in Hunterdon county on the 4th day of May, 1858, the following residuary disposition of his estate (including the lands which are the subject of this suit) was made: "(4) I give and bequeath to my beloved wife, Permella, the residue of my estate, both real and personal, whatsoever and whosoever, during her natural life, and at her decease to go to my stepson, Daniel B. Ege, his heirs and assigns. (5) It is my will that in case my stepson, Daniel B. Ege, should decease without lawful issue, that my property, both real and personal, be equally divided between my brothers and sisters, and in case of the decease of either or any of them their several portions shall descend to their children." It appears by the proofs returned by the master to whom the matter was referred that the wife of testator survived him, and died in possession of the lands, about 1873, and Ege then went into possession, and continued in possession until his death, which occurred on the 19th of April, 1904. He had been married, but his wife had died before him, and he died without leaving issue. The bill seeking partition of the land has made parties many of the persons who, on any construction of the will, can claim an interest, and the master to whom it was referred to determine and report who of them had an interest has made a report, which the complainants now move to confirm. The defendants, or some of them, object to the confirmation of the master's report, on the ground that he has erred in his construction of the clauses of the will above quoted, and in his determination of the parties who now have an interest in the lands in question, and of the proportion of their respective interests. It would have been better practice, perhaps, to have presented these questions by exceptions to the master's report; but no objection was made to their being considered on a motion to confirm. As they have been fully presented and argued, I have considered them.

The facts disclosed by the proofs returned by the master, which must be taken into account in determining these questions, are the following: When Asa Moore died, he left 10 brothers and sisters surviving him. Of these only one survived Ege. That survivor was a sister, who has since died, leaving a husband and a son, her only heir at law. They are parties to the suit. Three of the surviving brothers and sisters died, leaving no children. Two others had children who died, previous to the death of Ege, leaving children. One other had children who survived Ege, and also grandchildren, children of a child who died before Ege. One of those who died without children had assigned his interest in the lands, during his lifetime, to one of his brothers. The division reported by the master is into five shares. One share he reports as belonging to the son and heir at law of the sister who survived Ege, subject to the curtesy of his father; one share he reports as belonging to the complainant and one of the defendants, in common, as children of a deceased sister; one share he reports to belong to three defendants, in common, as the children of a deceased brother; and one share he reports to belong, in common, to five children of another deceased brother, excluding the children of a daughter of that brother, who had predeceased Ege. The remaining, or fifth, share he reported to belong to a daughter of another deceased sister. The theory on which the master has proceeded in his report as to ownership is that, upon the true construction of the will, there was no interest vested in Asa Moore's brothers and sisters at his death, and that none was acquired by any of them until the death of Ege; that upon the death of Ege, without leaving issue, the estate vested in the sister who then survived and the children of such of the brothers and sisters as had then died leaving children who survived Ege; such children, if more than one, taking the shares their respective ancestors would have taken if living. He therefore ignores the three brothers and sisters of testator who died leaving no children. He pronounces against any claim of the grandchildren of one who died leaving a child, who died a few months before Ege, leaving two children. He pronounces against the children of a daughter of one of the brothers, which daughter died during the lifetime of Ege, and, as before stated, he excludes from any share, along with the five children of one of the brothers, the children of a previously deceased child of that brother. He also pronounces against the assignment of one share, and holds it wholly invalid.

Upon taking up for consideration the testamentary provision which is to be construed, there are two things which are obvious and not open to question. In the first place, it is clear that the stepson of testator, Daniel B. Ege, acquired by devise a vested estate in fee simple, subject, however, to be divested upon the happening of the contingency prescribed, viz., death without lawful issue. In the second place, it is clear that the testator prescribed that, upon the happening of the contingency named, the estate of Ege in his lands should be divested, and thereafter vest in other persons. It is true there are no words of express devise to those persons, but the testator directs his property, both real and personal, to be divided among certain persons, and that form, of testamentary direction is equivalent to a devise. Denise's Ex'rs v. Denise, 37 N. J. Eq. 163; Howell v. Gifford, 64 N. J. Eq. 180, 53 Atl. 1074; Outcalt v. Outcalt, 42 N. J. Eq. 500, 8 Atl. 532; Buzby v. Roberts, 53 N. J. Eq. 568, 32 Atl. 9; Seddel v. Willis, 20 N. J. Law, 223. It is also clear that the estate intended to vest in such persons upon the happening of the contingency of Ege's death without issue was not a contingent remainder, but a provision in their favor, of the nature of an executory devise, of the kind described by Mr. Fearne as occurring when an estate is limited by devise after a preceding vested fee simple. Fearne's Devises, 17; 8 Greenleaf's Cruise, 444; Den v. Allaire, 20 N. J. Law, 6; Den v. Snitcher, 14 N. J. Law, 58; Armstrong v. Kent, 21 N.

J. Law, 509; Seddel v. Wills, 20 N. J. Law, 223; Groves v. Cox, 40 N. J. Law, 40; Wilson v. Wilson, 46 N. J. Eq. 321, 19 Atl. 132; Brooks v. Kip, 54 N. J. Eq. 462, 35 Atl. 658; s. c., 55 N. J. Eq. 590, 39 Atl. 1113; Steward v. Knight, 62 N. J. Eq. 232, 49 Atl. 535.

These constructions of the testamentary clause in question were conceded to be correct in the argument. The contest made is as to the persons in whom testator intended his estate should vest upon the happening of the contingency whereby Ege's title was to be divested. If the clause in question directed the division of the property, at the death of Ege without issue, among testator's brothers and sisters, and omitted the provision for the children of a deceased brother or sister, I apprehend there could be no doubt of the nature of the interest acquired by each brother or sister at the death of Asa Moore. While their interest was not of the nature of a contingent remainder, but only a devise executory in its character, yet the interest thus acquired is one said to be transmissible by grant, devisable by will, or descendible to heirs at law. Fearnie's Devises, 529; 3 Greenleaf's Cruise, 512; Chauncey v. Graydon, 2 Atk. 616; King v. Withers, Cases temp. Talbot, 117-123; Tuttle v. Woolworth, 62 N. J. Eq. 532, 50 Atl. 445; Thornton v. Roberts, 30 N. J. Eq. 473; Brooks v. Kip, ubi supra; Van Dyke's Adm'r v. Vanderpool's Adm'r, 14 N. J. Eq. 198. If, on the other hand, the clause expressly, or by implication, evinces testator's intent to limit his bounty to brothers and sisters who might survive Ege, and to the children of such as had then died leaving children, no possible doubt could be raised. The difficulty arises from the fact that by the first part of the clause testator, by unmistakable language, discloses an intent to benefit all his brothers and sisters in case of the happening of the prescribed contingency. There is no express limitation to those of them who should survive Ege. Is such a limitation to be implied because of the direction that if any brother or sister should die leaving children, his or her share should descend to the children? As such a construction results in excluding from the bounty, which testator first declared should extend to all his brothers and sisters, each one who died before Ege leaving no children, it ought not to be adopted, unless the whole clause is incapable of a reasonable interpretation which will preserve the primary and the secondary objects of testator's bounty.

The master adopted the view that the direction for the substitution of children for deceased parents requires an implication that testator intended to limit his bounty to the brothers and sisters who should survive Ege, and the children, then living, of such as had died. Upon the argument this view struck me favorably, but upon mature consideration I am unable to adopt it. In my judgment, a reasonable interpretation of the language can be made without excluding from testator's bounty any of his brothers or sisters. Giving to every word of the clause in question its full force, it may be thus paraphrased, viz.: "Upon the happening of the contingency I have prescribed, my property of all kinds shall go to my brothers and sisters equally, and, if any have died leaving children, their share shall go to their children; but, if any have died leaving no children, their share shall go to their heirs at law or next of kin, according to the nature of the property." This construction, in my judgment, gives a reasonable meaning to the whole clause, and avoids an implication which is contradictory to the expressed intent to benefit all testator's brothers and sisters. Upon this construction, it is obvious that the report of the master cannot be confirmed. For it is clear that the brother who transferred his interest passed a title thereto, to come into possession upon the happening of the contingency, provided that before that time he had not died leaving a child or children. As he died without leaving a child, his transfer was effective. It is also obvious that those brothers and sisters who died without children transmitted their interest in their shares to their heirs at law or next of kin, to become vested in possession upon the happening of the contingency.

There remains to be considered the meaning of the clause respecting the portions of testator's brothers and sisters which thereby vested in their children upon their death. In its primary sense, the word "children" expresses the relation of parent and child, and is not extended to the more distant relations of grandchildren or descendants. When used in a will, it is, prima facie, to have its natural and primary meaning attributed to it; but a more extended meaning may be given to it in two classes of cases—one where the more extensive meaning will prevent the testamentary disposition from being inoperative, and the other where the language of the will indicates that the testator used the word in the more extensive signification. Steward v. Knight, 62 N. J. Eq. 232, 49 Atl. 535. Reading the whole clause, I strongly incline to the view that it indicates an intent on the part of testator to use the word "children" with a wider significance than exists in its primary meaning. The language of the testator is that the share of a brother or sister should descend to his children. This seems to disclose an intent to confer upon such children a descendible interest, which will not be lost by their death, but will be transferred, as to real property, to their heirs at law. But if the testator's intent to vest in the children of a deceased brother or sister the share intended for that brother or sister is limited by its own terms to the actual children, yet, upon the construction previously given to this clause the child or children of a deceased brother or sister would become invested with the interest of the parent in the property, which interest was transmissible, devisable, and descendible, and therefore descended to their heirs at law upon their death. It results, therefore, that the master erred in excluding from the division the children of a deceased child, who were heirs at law of the deceased child.

The matter will be referred to the same master, to make a report of the interest of the parties upon the construction of the will above indicated. If other parties are necessary, application for leave to amend may be made.

The motion to confirm will be denied.

COLLINS v. WEST JERSEY EXPRESS CO.
(Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey.
Nov. 20, 1905.)

NEGLIGENCE—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

An express wagon, driven by a servant of the defendant along a public highway, struck the hind wheel of a wagon that was being loaded from the sidewalk, forcing it against the horse, which was standing unhitched in the street, whereat the horse took fright and ran away. To avoid being struck by the runaway horse the plaintiff jumped aside, and broke his leg over a board pile in the street, whereupon he sued the defendant and was nonsuited. Held, that the nonsuit was erroneous.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Supreme Court.

Action by Daniel E. Collins against the West Jersey Express Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Matthew Jefferson, for plaintiff in error.
Joseph H. Gaskill, for defendant in error.

GARRISON, J. A servant of the defendant, while driving an express wagon along Central avenue in Atlantic City, struck the hind wheel of a wagon that was standing by the curb, and forced it against the horse, which was unhitched, whereat the horse took fright and ran away. The horse turned into New York avenue and ran up on the sidewalk, where the plaintiff was standing near some lumber that was piled up in the street. The plaintiff, to avoid being hit by the runaway horse, jumped aside and broke his leg over the board pile, and thereupon sued the defendant for damages and was nonsuited.

We think that this nonsuit was wrong. The striking of the standing wagon by the defendant's wagon was unquestionably the initial force that set in motion the train of circumstances by which the plaintiff was injured, none of which had their rise in any intervening force or other cause.

The board pile over which the plaintiff fell, while it was a condition of his injury, was not its cause. 21 Ency. Law, p. 494.

Likewise the circumstance that the horse was standing unhitched, while it was a condition that rendered its running away more likely, was not the cause of that occurrence.

Moreover, as the man in charge of this team was engaged in loading the wagon from a box that stood beside it on the curb, he may not have been negligent in allowing his horse to be unhitched. Belles v. Kellner, 67 N. J. Law, 255, 51 Atl. 700, 54 Atl. 99, 57 L. R. A. 627, 91 Am. St. Rep. 429.

Both the running away of the horse and the plaintiff's fall over the lumber relate back to the collision that caused the runaway, and whether that was a negligent act in the defendant's servant was clearly a jury question.

The cases upon intervening and concurring causes are collected in a series of notes in 21 Ency. Law, p. 492 et seq., and also in the annotations to Scott v. Shephard, Smith Lead. Cases, vol. 1, p. 754.

The judgment of the Supreme Court is reversed.

STATE v. TOLLA.

(Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey.
Nov. 22, 1905.)

1. INDICTMENT—AMENDMENT.

When, upon the trial of a person indicted for killing "John Sonta," it was disclosed that the name of the person killed was "Joseph Sonta," the trial court had power, under section 34 of the criminal procedure act (Rev. Laws 1898, p. 878), to direct an amendment of the indictment.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 27, Cent. Dig. Indictment and Information, §§ 514, 515.]

2. SAME—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

The statute permitting amendments of an indictment when the name of any person injured by the commission of an offense is misstated therein, if the court shall consider that the defendant cannot be prejudiced thereby, is not violative of the constitutional provision that no person shall be held to answer for any criminal offense, except on the presentment or indictment of a grand jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 10, Cent. Dig. Constitutional Law, § 755.]

3. HOMICIDE—THREATS BY DECEASED — EVIDENCE.

In a homicide case, testimony of antecedent threats or acts of violence by the deceased against the defendant are not admissible, when it appears that at the time of the homicide there was no threat or act by the deceased, which, even in the light of any previous threats or acts, could justify the homicidal act.

4. WITNESSES—COMPETENCY—INFANT.

The law fixes no precise age within which children are absolutely excluded from giving evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 50, Cent. Dig. Witnesses, §§ 97, 98.]

Garrison, Dixon, Bogert, Vredenburg, and Vroom, JJ., dissenting.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Court of Oyer and Terminer, Bergen County.

Antoinette Tolla was convicted of murder, and brings error. Affirmed.

Peter W. Stagg, for plaintiff in error.
Ernest Koester, for the State.

REED, J. On the 4th of March, 1904, Antoinette Tolla shot with a pistol Joseph Sonta, who almost immediately died. For this homicide she was indicted, tried, and convicted of murder in the first degree. The judgment entered upon this conviction is brought into this court by this writ of error.

The first assignment of error pressed on behalf of the defendant is that the court erred in permitting the indictment to be amended. The defendant was indicted for killing John Sonta. It appeared upon the trial that the name of the deceased was "Giuseppe," the Italian equivalent for the English "Joseph," instead of "John" Sonta. Being moved by the prosecutor, the court directed that the name of the deceased be changed from "John" to "Joseph." It is not denied that the terms of the thirty-fourth section of the criminal procedure act (Rev. Laws 1898, p. 878), if constitutional, conferred power upon the court to direct this amendment. This section provides that, if there shall appear to be a variance between the statement in any indictment and the evidence, in the name or description of any person alleged to be injured by the commission of the offense, it shall be lawful for the court, if it shall consider such variance not material to the merits of the case and that the defendant cannot be prejudiced thereby in his defense on the merits, to order the indictment to be amended. The insistence is that the Legislature had not the ability to equip the court with power to change an indictment which charged a crime upon one person into an indictment which charged a crime upon another person. If the legislation is invalid, it is because of the constitutional provision that no person shall be held to answer for any criminal offense except on the presentment or indictment of a grand jury. The grand jury presented the defendant for killing a person whose identity was certain. It was a person whose name was disclosed upon the trial to be "Joseph" instead of "John" Sonta. The grand jury knew that it was this person who was killed, and the defendant knew it. The amendment did not change the identity of the deceased, but only designated it in conformity with the facts developed. Nor was the man's name an essential part of the indictment in describing the crime. If the name of the deceased had been undiscoverable, the defendant could have been indicted for killing a person unknown. 1 Bishop, Criminal Procedure, § 495. There can be no doubt that, on the discovery of the real name, that name could have been inserted in the indictment by amendment. The point now under consideration was made in the case of People v. Johnson, 104 N. Y. 213-216, 10 N. E. 690, and it was held upon grounds entirely satisfactory that, the amendment being allowed under circumstances which assured to the accused party a full and fair hearing upon the only issue upon which the plea was material, the amendment was within the power of the court. There is a line of cases holding that, when permitted by a statute, a court has the power to change the name of the person upon whom injury has been inflicted or the name of the owner of property which has been the subject of larceny or other criminal act. State v. Hanks, 39 La. Ann. 234, 1 South. 458; People v. Herman, 45 Hun, 175; Garvin v. State, 52 Miss. 207; Miller v. State, 68 Miss. 221, 8 South. 273; State v. Craighead, 32 Mo. 561; State v. Casavant, 64 Vt. 405, 23 Atl. 636; Rough v. Commonwealth, 78 Pa. 495. There was no error in directing the amendment.

The remaining assignments of error are directed to the alleged erroneous exclusion of proffered testimony, to the reception of incompetent testimony, and to alleged errors in the charge of the trial justice. A proper appreciation of these assignments requires a brief statement of the homicidal occurrence. Joseph Sonta was a married man living near the family of John and Antoinette Tolla. The latter lived in two rooms over a store. They were all Italians, and were intimate. About 1 o'clock in the afternoon of March 4th, Joseph Sonta went to the rooms of the Tollas, where the Tollas, husband and wife, were. He sat down in a rocking-chair. After a little while the wife left the room and went over to the house of Sonta, where she saw Mrs. Sonta and her daughter Annie. After conversing with them a short time, she returned to her rooms and found Joseph Sonta still sitting in the rocking-chair smoking a pipe. She approached Sonta and shot him, killing him almost instantly. On her trial her defense was that she killed Sonta in defense of her honor and her life. She asserted that the reason she shot him was that he wanted to take her honor away from her, and that he wanted to kill her. For the purpose of showing the probability that she could have reasonably thought her honor or her life was in peril at the time she fired, testimony was tendered to show previous talks and conduct by Joseph Sonta, exhibiting a desire to dishonor her. The assignments from the sixth to the sixteenth inclusive, are directed to the exclusion by the trial justice of questions to the defendant inquiring if Sonta and she had had trouble, and what happened, and whether Sonta had asked her to have sexual intercourse, and whether Sonta, at one time when her husband was absent, had come into her house and attempted to drag her into the bedroom and have intercourse with her, and respecting statements she had made to the wife of Sonta. The last question was designed to show the probability of such antecedent conduct of Sonta, and such antecedent talk and conduct were designed to show that the defendant, having knowledge of the disposition of Son-ta, could have reasonably inferred from what occurred at the time of the homicide that her life or honor was in eminent danger.

This line of proffered testimony stands upon the same footing as offers to prove previous threats by the deceased in homicide cases, or, by the prosecutor in cases of assault where the defendant sets up that he acted in self-defense. That previous threats or acts of violence afford no justification for an assault or homicidal act is entirely settled. Wharton's Criminal Evidence, § 757; Wharton's Homicide, §§ 482, 606. If all the testimony inferentially possible, in the light of what was offered and overruled, had been introduced, it would not in itself have afforded the slightest ground of justification for this homicide. Such a justification must have arisen from what occurred at the time the shot was fired. The testimony of the previous acts and threats was only admissible to illustrate some possible feature of the actual occurrence, which might, if thus illustrated, have led the jury to believe that the defendant had reasonable ground to conclude that her life or her honor was so menaced as to excuse the shooting. If it had appeared that Sonta was asleep, and she, knowing him to be asleep, had shot him, it would be absurd to say that any previous act of his, however bad, would have justified the shooting or modified the degree of criminality. Under such a condition of affairs, the proof of such acts would have been legally worthless as a basis for a legal verdict, and so irrelevant. It seems to be the logical conclusion that, unless at the time of the homicide the deceased did something to indicate a present intention to harm the defendant, there is nothing upon which the precedent acts can cast any light. There must be some present word or movement to be interpreted in the light of this knowledge of the disposition of the deceased. This view is supported by a great weight of authority. State v. Reed, 137 Mo. 125-137, 38 S. W. 574; State v. Byrd, 121 N. C. 684, 28 S. E. 353; State v. McGonigle, 14 Wash. 594-599, 45 Pac. 20; State v. Jackson, 33 La. Ann. 1087; State v. Janvier, 37 La. Ann. 645; State v. Pritchett, 22 Ala. 39, 58 Am. Dec. 250; Harrison v. State, 24 Ala. 71, 60 Am. Dec. 450; Hughey v. State, 47 Ala. 97; Creswell v. State, 14 Tex. App. 1; West v. State, 18 Tex. App. 644; Myers v. State, 33 Tex. 525; Evans v. State, 44 Miss. 762; State v. Scott, 26 N. C. 409, 42 Am. Dec. 148. In the state of New York, where it is permissible to show the reputation of the assailant who was killed for quarrelsomeness and vindictiveness, it was held, in Thomas v. People, 67 N. Y. 222, that such testimony was only admissible when it was shown that the assault had been committed or threatened at the time when the homicide was committed, or immediately preceding it, or was intimately connected with it so as to justify the taking of life in self-defense. Such testimony was held to be rightly excluded in Abbott v. People, 86 N. Y. 460-470, because there was no ground for claiming that the act was committed in self-defense. To the same purport is a long array of cases cited by Mr. Kerr, in his article on homicide. Ency. L. (1st Ed.) 684, 685.

Turning to the evidence of what occurred at the time of this homicide, I am unable to discover any act or word by Sonta, which, whatever his previous conduct may have been, can be forced into a suggestion of then present harm to the defendant. The defendant herself gives the following account of the affair: She says that Sonta came to her house about half past 1 o'clock; that her husband was lying on a trunk and he went away at once. She says that Sonta asked what Tolla always went away for, when he (Sonta) came in; and she told him that it was on account of his (Sonta's) coming. Then Sonta said something about killing her husband or "my wife" and that she said to him: "You want to take these things out of your head, or I will let you go out of my house with your face broke." Then he said: "Being you are. I will have to post you some way, or shoot you. Then I do what I wish to, and shoot myself." She says that he had a revolver in one hand and a bunch of money in the other hand. At that moment Sonta's six year old son came in, and Sonta shoved the revolver in one pocket and the money in another pocket. She says that the boy began to cry because of some remarks of his father, and that she went into another room and got a cake for the child, and at the same time got a revolver and put it in her pocket. She went out of the room and met her husband coming in the house. She then went out of the house and over to Sonta's house, where she remained for some time talking with Mrs. Sonta and her daughter Annie. She returned and found Sonta sitting down alongside of a closet with his shoulder towards the bedroom door, smoking. She says that her husband was asleep, and little Rocco was playing with her children. She said that when she got to the table she stopped, and Sonta turned towards her, and "he was all of a color, and he put his hands to his prick, and he says, 'Look what I got to suffer! Look what I got to suffer!' His eyes were all mixed up, looked at one time he was red, and another time he was pale." Then she shot him, because if she did not do what she did he would have shot her and her husband. She said that he said one word after she shot him: "You done me before I done you." Immediately after the shots were fired, Sonta was found sitting in the rocking-chair with his legs crossed, with a briar pipe in his right hand, and with his head upon his breast. The autopsy showed four superficial wounds, two where a bullet had entered the temple, gone through the brain, and out under the left jaw. No pistol seems to have been found other than the one used by the defendant. Her account of Sonta's exhibiting a pistol, as well as her statement of his remark after he was shot through the brain, is manifestly fanciful. But, taking her story as she told it, it appears that, after Sonta's exhibition of the pistol, she procured her own pistol and went over to Sonta's house, where she remained for some time, and after she returned she shot Sonta as he was sitting crosslegged in the rocking-chair with his pipe in his right hand; her husband being present. The only act or word of Sonta's at that time was his placing his hand upon his person, coupled with the remark, "See what I got to suffer." From this account, nothing that he did at the time could afford a justification for her act; and it is impossible for me to conceive how any previous conduct could change the significance of what he did so as to afford such a justification.

It is insisted by counsel for the plaintiff in error that she should have been permitted to show that she bought the pistol for the purpose of defending herself against Sonta; and that the previous acts and words of Sonta were relevant to show that she had ground for believing her person was in danger. It seems sufficient to say that, it appearing that she did not employ the pistol in her self-defense, her motive in buying it became immaterial. As a support to the plea of self-defense, the offers were rightly excluded. Nor do I perceive that the offers were admissible to show the degree of her criminality. The offers excluded were directed entirely to the proof of self-defense. It could not operate to reduce the grade of crime to manslaughter. Nothing occurred at the time, even in the light of any previous words or conduct of the deceased, which would operate to so modify the degree of criminality. Neither words nor indecent actions, unless accompanied by actual or threatened assault, afford provocation sufficient to reduce an intentional killing to manslaughter. Nor would such proffered evidence be evidential in respect to the defendant's premeditation. The ground of the offer was to show that she bought the pistol to use in self-defense only; but, as already remarked, she did not use it in self-defense. She had just previously to the homicide armed herself with it, admittedly to use upon Sonta. She went to Sonta's house, remained there for some time, and then returned to her own house, and, without justification, shot him. Neither the previous conduct of Sonta, nor the fact that such conduct caused her to purchase the pistol, could in the least modify the significance of her conduct at the time.

It is also assigned for error that the trial justice improperly permitted a boy six years old to testify for the state. The boy appears to have been unusually precocious and to have been qualified by intelligence and by a knowledge of the sanction requisite to equip him with eligibility as a witness. The question whether he should be permitted to testify was within the discretion of the trial justice, and that discretion was not abused. The law fixes no precise age within which children are absolutely excluded from giving evidence. Taylor on Evidence, 1877; Roscoe, Crim. Ev. p. 106; Wheeler v. U. S., 159 U. S. 523, 16 Sup. Ct. 93, 40 L. Ed. 244.

In respect to the assignments directed to alleged errors in the charge, it is sufficient to say that the law was accurately and carefully charged. There is no assignment respecting it which is of sufficient importance to require an extended consideration.

The judgment should be affirmed.

DIXON, BOGERT, VREDENBURGH, and VROOM, JJ., dissent.

GARRISON, J. (dissenting). I think that the excluded testimony (1) as to antecedent sexual assaults and indignities, and (2) as to the purpose for which the defendant bought the pistol, should have been admitted, not as tending to justify the homicidal act, but because of the obvious bearing of such testimony upon the degree of the defendant's crime. The defendant was properly convicted of the crime of murder; whether she was guilty in the first degree depended upon her state of mind when she shot Sonta. The testimony that was permitted to go to the jury was entirely consistent with the conclusion reached by it, viz., that her state of mind on that occasion was one evincing deliberation and premeditation; but, had the excluded testimony been admitted, the verdict upon this vital point might have been different. What effect a prolonged and persistent course of efforts to debauch a woman will have upon her state of mind is one question; but to say that it is the same result that would follow from a single solicitation appears to me to be entirely unsupportable. Especially is this so if, in the course of such persecution, the woman, having armed herself, shoots her persecutor apparently upon such single solicitation.

As this case was tried, one strong element of premeditation, perhaps the strongest, was the purchase of the pistol; but I cannot agree that because the pistol was not used in self-defense it may not have been purchased with that object, and, if it was, then this strong element of premeditation drops out of the case, or at least is rendered doubtful.

I think also that the defendant should have been allowed to show the persistence of Sonta's antecedent solicitations and accompanying threats and assaults. Whether what occurred just at the time of the shooting was an isolated instance of indignity, or whether it was the climax of a long course of like assaults upon her chastity, to which the woman had been subjected, makes, in my opinion, a world of difference in reaching a correct estimate of the state of mind likely to be induced in her. In the latter case, the persistence of the debaucher, the constant repetition of the insult, the inability of the wife to put an end to the indignity even in her husband's presence, are of the very essence of the question as to the state of mind engendered in her upon that repetition of the offense that proved to be the last.

A judicial ruling that excludes that which is essential to a correct estimate of the woman's mental state, and admits only the culminating act—the last straw, as it were—is based upon a faulty psychology, and, as the distinction between the degrees of murder is at bottom a psychological question, such ruling must likewise be erroneous in point of law.

Upon these considerations I shall vote to reverse.

MAGUTH v. BOARD OF CHOSEN FREEHOLDERS OF PASSAIC COUNTY.

(Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey. Nov. 27, 1905.)

1. BRIDGES—DEFECTS—LIABILITY OF COUNTY—CULVERTS.

The twenty-first section of the road act of March 23, 1859 (Gen. St. p. 2844), and the supplement to the bridge act, passed March 15, 1860 (Gen. St. p. 307), apply only in cases where parties have sustained damage through the neglect of duties owed to the general public. They do not apply to a case where, by reason of the smallness of a culvert under a bridge, the water of the stream beneath is backed up on private property.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 8, Cent. Dig. Bridges, §§ 60–62, 64.]

2. APPEAL—ISSUES IN TRIAL COURT—LIMITATION OF REVIEW.

When, in opposition to a motion of nonsuit, the plaintiff expressly based his right of action on a particular ground, this court on error will confine its consideration of the merits of the judgment to that ground.

Pitney, J., dissenting.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Supreme Court.

Action by Anna Maguth against the board of chosen freeholders of the county of Passaic. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

William W. Watson and Robert R. Watson, for plaintiff in error. Harry Meyers, for defendant in error.

DIXON, J. In an action brought in the Supreme Court the plaintiff complained that the board of chosen freeholders of Passaic county, in building a public bridge over Weasel brook in said county, had made the culvert too small for the passage of the water after heavy rains, and consequently the water was backed up over the plaintiff's land. At the trial of the case in the Passaic circuit the plaintiff's counsel, in response to a motion for nonsuit, stated that he sought to recover under the supplement, passed March 15, 1860, to "An act respecting bridges" (Gen. St. p. 307), which enacts that "in all cases where a township or board of chosen freeholders of a county are chargeable by law with the erection, rebuilding or repair of any bridge or bridges, and the said township or board of chosen freeholders shall wrongfully neglect to erect, rebuild or repair the same, by reason whereof any person or persons shall receive injury or damage in his or their persons or property, he or they may bring an action," etc., "against said township or board of chosen freeholders, and recover judgment to the extent of all such damage," etc. A nonsuit being thereupon ordered, the plaintiff sued out the present writ of error to reverse that determination upon an exception taken thereto.

Under the settled rule of practice in this court, to consider, in favor of the party relying upon an exception, only those points which were presented on his behalf in the trial court, we must leave out of view the question whether the matter complained of would entitle the plaintiff to redress under the common law, and confine ourselves to the sight afforded by the statute. Van Alstyne v. Franklin Council, 69 N. J. Law, 672, 58 Atl. 818. In Freeholders of Sussex v. Strader, 18 N. J. Law, 108, 35 Am. Dec. 530, decided A. D. 1840, wherein the plaintiff sought to recover damages for an injury suffered because of the defective condition of a public bridge over which he was traveling, it was adjudged that the duty of the chosen freeholders respecting bridges was a public duty, and that, although a private action might be maintained against a public corporation for its violation of a duty owed by it to an individual, such an action could not be maintained for the violation or nonperformance of a public duty. The same doctrine was enforced in Cooley v. Freeholders of Essex, 27 N. J. Law, 415, decided in February, 1859. The propriety of these adjudications upon the principles of the common law has always been recognized by the courts of this state. To relieve the hardship of this legal situation, we think, the twenty-first section of the road act of March 23, 1859 (Gen. St. p. 2844), was passed, within a few weeks after the judgment in Cooley's Case, and in the following year the more comprehensive statute above set forth. The first of these enactments applied only to damage happening to persons or property while passing over a bridge, because of its insufficiency or want of repair (Livermore v. Freeholders of Camden, 29 N. J. Law, 245), while the later act extended to any person or property injured through the wrongful neglect of duty, and included the duty to build bridges as well as the duty to maintain them in proper condition. Ripley v. Chosen Freeholders of Essex and Hudson, 40 N. J. Law, 45.

Since the enactment of these laws many cases have come before our courts in which the plaintiffs have invoked the aid of the statutes. Livermore v. Freeholders of Camden, 29 N. J. Law, 245, and 31 N. J. Law, 507; Ripley v. Chosen Freeholders, 40 N. J. Law, 45; Jernee v. Monmouth, 52 N. J. Law, 21 Atl. 295, 11 L. R. A. 416; Freeholders v. Hough, 55 N. J. Law, 628, 28 Atl. 86; Mahnken v. Monmouth County, 62 N. J. Law, 404, 41 Atl. 921; Mattlage v. Freeholders, 63 N. J. Law, 583, 44 Atl. 756; Spencer v. Freeholders, 66 N. J. Law, 301, 49 Atl. 483; Weeks v. Freeholders, 68 N. J. Law, 622, 54 Atl. 826; Creighton v. Freeholders, 70 N. J. Law, 350, 57 Atl. 870. In the Livermore and Jernee Cases it was claimed that one or the other of these statutes created a private duty or was applicable to the breach of such a duty, but in each case the claim was denied. The other cases were all based upon an alleged breach of public duty, and in more of the judicial utterances, either of the Supreme Court or of this court, has it been declared that the Legislature had intended to do more than to provide private remedies for parties injured through the neglect of those duties which, but for the statutes, were owed only to the general public. So far as private duties were concerned, the common law afforded adequate relief. The mischief to be remedied was the lack of redress to those who sustained special damage through the neglect of public duty, and the reasonable inference is that it was the disclosure and emphasizing of this mischief, by the decision in the Strader and Cooley Cases, which forthwith resulted in these remedial statutes. We think they should not be extended beyond the scope thus indicated, and therefore it was rightly determined that they did not apply to the damage alleged by the plaintiff in this case.

The judgment of nonsuit is affirmed.

MARRIAGE—VALIDITY.

When a man and a woman intend to marry and live together as husband and wife, but their intent is frustrated by the existence of some unknown impediment, when the impediment is removed and it is shown that the same intent continues, their relations are lawful.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Court of Chancery.

Bill by Mary Chamberlain against Stroud H. Chamberlain. Decree for plaintiff (59 Atl. 813), and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Elmer King, for appellant. Peter J. McGinniss and John M. Ward, for respondent.

GARRETSON, J. The complainant filed her bill against the defendant under the twentieth section of the divorce act, alleging that her husband has left her and refuses to support her, and praying for support and maintenance.

The only defense which it is necessary to consider is that the defendant is not the husband of the complainant, and therefore is not liable to support her. The complainant, under her maiden name of Mary Walsh, married William Tissell March 29, 1871. William Tissell left Mary Tissell March 12 or 15, 1877, and went to St. Louis, and thence to Oak Grove, Tex. About July, 1877, a letter was received by Mary Tissell from William Tissell. Mary Tissell, under the name of Mary Walsh, was married to Stroud H. Chamberlain, April 4, 1880, by a clergyman in the city of Brooklyn. On May 8, 1880, the complainant under the name of Mary Tissell filed a petition for divorce upon the ground of desertion against William Tissell, and decree was granted thereon June 30, 1881. Prior to the marriage of the complainant and defendant, in 1880, they both believed that William Tissell was dead, and they continued in that belief until after the present suit was instituted, when there was evidence to show that he was still alive. If William Tissell was alive in April, 1880, when the complainant was married to the defendant, that marriage was invalid. When the impediment of her former marriage was removed by the decree of divorce, then the complainant might legally become the wife of the defendant. The complainant testified that, while she believed Tissell was dead when she married Chamberlain, she procured the divorce from Tissell for the reason that she and Chamberlain talked of getting a little property, and she was afraid that something might occur that might do harm in that way. After the complainant and defendant were married in 1880, they lived together as husband and wife until the separation which occurred shortly before the commencement of this suit. Each supposed that the relationship between them was lawful and that of husband and wife. He addressed her and introduced her as his wife. She addressed him and introduced him as her husband. They gave a mortgage upon property of the defendant June 25, 1885, in which she is described as his wife and which she acknowledged as his wife. From the time of the marriage, in 1880, to the commencement of the suit, it was the intention of both the complainant and the defendant, as they state, that their relations should be lawful, and not meretricious. They were by law, meretricious, however, down to the time of the divorce of Tissell, because of Tissell living; but, the impediment which rendered them meretricious having been removed and the lawful intent still continuing, it would be unjust not to give that intent effect if possible.

In connection with the intent of both parties as admitted by them, we have evidence to show that they manifested that intent to others after the divorce in such way as to fully establish the legality of their relationship. Emily J. Campbell testifies that the defendant on one occasion, in presence of his wife, said: "Here is Mary's divorce from her first husband. I would not have shown it to you, but you knew her first husband, and I want you to know she is my legal wife." Mary Booth testified to an occasion when both were present, and she had been told by one of the neighbors that Mrs. Chamberlain had been divorced, and says: "She felt so badly. They came down and said they had the divorce papers, and were willing for us to see them, because father made the lease. They were anxious for us to know they were married." And Mr. Chamberlain "said she was his wife, and she felt bad and cried, and he told her not to worry." This evidence was a manifestation of an intent to live together as husband and wife, and with the intention and the actual so living an actual marriage is established. In Collins v. Voorhees, 47 N. J. Eq. 315, 20 Atl. 676, 14 L. R. A. 364, 24 Am. St. Rep. 412, Chief Justice Beasley, in an opinion denying a motion for a reargument speaking of the opinion of Lord Westbury in the Breadalbane Case, said: "The doctrine of that case is supported by nothing that preceded or that has followed it, and is altogether anomalous and, as it seems to me, it was properly rejected by this court. In that case the court acted upon the principle that if a man and a woman agreed to live together adulterously, with a simulation of marriage, there should be an inference of a subsequent valid marriage from the fact that such simulation had been continued after the death of the husband of the adulteress. Why such an inference is to be thus deduced is not apparent, unless it be for the promotion of adultery. By its prevalence the adulterous purpose is converted into a matrimonial purpose without a particle of reasonable evidence in support of the alleged change of intention." "Lord Westbury strangely compares the case before him with those instances where the parties intended originally to marry, and not to commit adultery; their intent being frustrated by the existence of some unknown obstacle. And yet it is presumed that no one who will look with any care into the subject will have the slightest doubt that these two classes of cases with respect to the methods of their proof respectively rest upon entirely different foundations. for, when the parties have intended marriage, being ignorant of an existing impediment, all that is to be established by cohabitation apparently matrimonial, subsequent to the removal of such impediment, is the carrying into effect by the parties of their original purpose; but, when the original purpose was to live in adultery, the evidence under similar circumstances must be sufficient to show an abandonment of such purpose and the execution of a new one. These lines of cases can be confounded only by want of careful observation of the principles upon which they rest." We think that this reasoning of the Chief Justice abundantly sustains the complainant's contention in this case.

The decree below is affirmed.

GRAHAM et al. v. SECURITY MUT. LIFE INS. CO.

(Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey.
Nov. 28, 1905.)

1. INSURANCE—WAIVER OF CONDITIONS.

An insurance company may waive any condition of a policy inserted therein for its own benefit.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 28, Cent. Dig. Insurance, §§ 941, 942.]

2. SAME—FORFEITURES.

Forfeitures are not favored in the law, and courts are always prompt to seize hold of any circumstances to indicate an election to waive a forfeiture, or an agreement to do so, on which the party has relied and acted.

3. SAME—WAIVER OF CONDITIONS.

It is always open on behalf of the insured to show a waiver of the conditions, or a course of conduct on the part of the insurer from which might justly and reasonably be inferred that a forfeiture would not be exacted.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Supreme Court.

Action by Amelia M. Graham and E. Louise Kinne against the Security Mutual Life Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

This was an action brought on a policy of life insurance providing for the payment to the plaintiff of $10,000 upon receipt of satisfactory proofs of the death of the insured, Theodore Y. Kinne. At the trial at the Passaic circuit before Mr. Justice Pitney and a jury, he denied the defendant's motion to nonsuit, and on due submission of the case to the jury, a verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for $9,951.80. The policy was issued on or about November 16, 1903, and bore date August 17, 1903. The first annual premium thereon amounted to $429.60. It was paid in part by a credit of $97.90, the amount of the unearned premium on a policy previously held by the insured, and surrendered and canceled when the present policy was issued, and by the execution and delivery of the following note: "Paterson, N. J., 11—10—1903. $331.78. On February 15, 1904, after date I promise to pay to the order of Security Life Insurance Company three hundred and thirty ⁷⁰/₁₀₀ dollars, payable at H. O., value received, with interest at six per cent. per annum. This note is given in payment of premium. [Signed] Theodore Y. Kinne." On the 5th day of February, 1904, the following letter was sent to the insured from the home office of the company: "Binghampton, N. Y., Feb. 5, 1904. Dear Sir: Your note, dated November 10, 1903, for $331.76, with interest amounting to $5.19, will fall due on the 15th day of February, 1904, payable to Mr. C. Merwin Turner, 140 Times Bld., New York City. Kindly give the matter your prompt attention and send check at once. It is never safe to delay until the last day. Very truly yours, L. E. Turner." The insured, on February 15, 1904, wrote and sent the following letter: "February 15, 1904. Charles M. Turner, Sec. M. Life Ins. Co., 41 Park Row, N. Y.—Dear Sir: On opening this letter you will be as much disappointed as I by not finding a check contained. Certainly your disappointment cannot be greater. It is almost impossible to make collections of any amount here, and I must ask either extension, suspension, or the privilege of paying a part now and the balance next month. Yours very truly, Theo. Y. Kinne, P." On the following day the following letter was written by C. Merwin Turner to the insured: "New York, N. Y., Feb. 16, 1904. Theo. Y. Kinne, M. D., Paterson, N. J.—Dear Doctor: Your esteemed communication of the 15th to hand, and contents carefully noted. If you will forward your check for part of the amount, I will arrange for the extension of the balance, and in order to save time kindly sign the inclosed note and we will credit you with the amount of your check. I regret exceedingly that collections in your line are poor, but have heard other physicians make the same remark. Trusting that the condition is only momentary, I am, very truly yours, C. Merwin Turner, Cashier."

On the trial it appeared from the testimony of the secretary of Dr. Kinne, that she opened the letter in the doctor's presence, and there was no note inclosed, and nothing was done in reference thereto. Dr. Kinne died on March 4, 1904. The plaintiff then offered in evidence the following letter: "March 8, 1904. Security Mutual Life Association, 140 Times Building, New York, N. Y.—Gentlemen: March 4, 1904, Dr. T. Y. Kinne, of Paterson, N. J., died. Among his insurance policies we find one written by your company. Kindly send us papers for proof of death and oblige. [Signed] Mrs. T. Y. Kinne, Ex. T. Y. Kinne Est." Demand at the trial being made for the original of this letter, it was not produced; counsel for the insurance company stating that they had never received such a letter as that. On the 11th of March, 1904, the following letter was written: "New York, N. Y., Mch. 11, 1904. Dr. Theo. Y. Kinne, 25 Church St., Paterson, N. J.—My Dear Doctor: Your note of $331.76 is due on the 15th, with $5.19 interest, making a total of $336.95. Kindly give this matter your attention. Yours truly, C. Merwin Turner, Cashier." Subsequently, and on the 14th of March, 1904, Thomas P. Graham, the husband of one of the plaintiffs, went to the office of the company in New York, saw Mr. Turner, and told him he was ready to pay the note.

Turner did not seem to know whether the doctor was dead or not. Graham then told him that the doctor died on the 4th of March. Turner said he was sorry, as the doctor was one of their "star" insurers and their medical examiner at one time. He added: "I am sorry there is going to be any question about it, as I do not know whether we shall pay this claim or not. I shall have to communicate with the home office." On the following day Mr. Graham went back to the office and made a tender of the amount of the note to a young lady who stood behind the cashier's desk, who declined to receive it, because she had been instructed not to accept it. On the same day Mr. Graham offered to pay $336.95 to the defendant at its home office, through the Western Union Telegraph Company, and defendant refused to accept the money. To each of the letters above mentioned a stipulation was annexed in the same terms as the following: "It is hereby consented and agreed by and between the attorneys of the respective parties hereto, that the letter hereto annexed, dated March 11, 1904, to Doctor Theodore Y. Kinne, signed by C. Merwin Turner, Cashier, is the original written by C. Merwin Turner, Cashier of the defendant, on behalf of the defendant, and that on the trial of the above action it is agreed by said attorneys that said letter shall be received in evidence without proof of the signature or agency of said C. Merwin Turner, Cashier."

Eugene Emley (Horton & Tilton, on the brief), for plaintiff in error. Griggs & Harding, for defendants in error.

VROOM, J. (after stating the facts). The assignments of error are six in number; the first being to the refusal of the court to grant the motion for a nonsuit at the close of the plaintiff's case, and the remaining assignments were based upon the charge of the judge.

The first assignment was principally relied upon by the plaintiff in error in the presentation of the case before this court. It was as follows: "That at the close of the plaintiff's case the court before whom," etc., "refused to grant this motion for a nonsuit, made by the said defendant, upon the ground that the policy of insurance sued upon was not any longer in force, and that the said defendant was no longer legally liable under its terms, said policy having been forfeited in the lifetime of the insured, and upon the further ground that there was no evidence of a legal tender of the premium due thereon." In support of this position reliance is had upon condition 4, annexed to the policy of insurance, and which reads as follows: "Failure to pay any renewal premium, or nonpayment (when due) of principle or interest, on any note given in payment of a premium due under, or as a charge against this contract, or any breach of warranty discovered within two years from this date, will render it null and void, and all payments theretofore made thereunder will be forfeited to the company." And the contention thereunder was that the failure to pay the note when due rendered the policy, under the terms of the contract, absolutely null and void; that there was no longer any legal liability on the part of the defendant; and that the insurance upon the life of the deceased had then lapsed, and the rights of the latter under the policy were then forfeited and gone. The correctness of this position, as a general rule relating to forfeitures of policies, and which is held in the cases cited in this part of the brief of the plaintiff in error, will not be disputed. Knickerbocker Life Insurance Co. v. Pendleton, 112 U. S. 696, 5 Sup. Ct. 314, 28 L. Ed. 866; Thompson v. Knickerbocker Life Ins. Co., 104 U. S. 252, 26 L. Ed. 765; Pitt v. Berkshire Ins. Co., 100 Mass. 500.

But the facts of this case preclude the application of this strict rule as to forfeiture to this case. The contention of the defendants in error is that there had been a waiver of the forfeiture clause in this policy, and that the question whether all the acts of the defendant and the insured, occurring at different times, did not go to make up a course of dealing, respecting this contract, from which the waiver of strict payment of the note and forfeiture might be inferred, and that this question was one which should be left to the consideration of the jury. It has long been a settled rule of law that the provisions of a contract that are to work a forfeiture are to be strictly construed. Forfeitures are never favored in the law, and attention was called by counsel for defendants in error to the fact that the aversion of courts to the enforcing of forfeitures is emphasized in contracts for insurance for reasons usually existing peculiar to those contracts. An examination of the cases, and notably those upon the brief of the defendant in error, clearly demonstrates the correctness of the principle above stated. In Hartford Life & Annuity Co. v. Unsell, 144 U. S. 439, 12 Sup. Ct. 671, 36 L. Ed. 496, it was held that "it is always open for the insured to show a waiver of the condition, or a course of conduct on the part of the insurer, which gave him a just and reasonable ground to infer that a forfeiture would not be exacted, and the fact that defendant, without objection, had previously received from the insured monthly dues after the date on which, by the terms of the contract, they were payable, was properly left to the jury to infer waiver," and "that a waiver may arise by express language or by acts from which an intention to waive may be inferred, or from which a waiver follows as a legal result." Again, in Hastings v. Brooklyn Life Ins. Co., 138 N. Y. 473, 34 N. E. 289, a premium note, which contained a provision of forfeiture in case of nonpayment, was not paid, and a new note given. The renewal note was not paid when due, but it was held that "the act of the defendant in extending credit to the insured for premiums falling due upon the pledge of the policy established a course of dealing between the parties which it was necessary to terminate in some way before the policy could be treated as forfeited and void." In the case of Insurance Company v. Norton, 96 U. S. 244, 24 L. Ed. 689, the questions of waiver and forfeiture were fully discussed, and in delivering the opinion of the United States Supreme Court Mr. Justice Bradley said: "Forfeitures are not favored in the law. They are often the means of oppression and great injustice. And, where adequate compensation can be made, the law in many cases, and equity in all cases, discharged the forfeiture upon such compensation being made. It is true we held in Stat-ham's Case, 93 U. S. 24, 23 L. Ed. 789, that in life insurance time of payment is material, and cannot be extended by the courts against the assent of the company. But, where such assent is given, the courts should be liberal in construing the transaction in favor of avoiding a forfeiture." In the case of Insurance Company v. Eggleston, 96 U. S. 576, 577, 24 L. Ed. 841, Mr. Justice Bradley, again speaking for the court, says: "Forfeitures are not favored in law, and courts are always prompt to seize hold of any circumstances to indicate an election to waive a forfeiture, or an agreement to do so, on which the party has relied and acted." See, also, Kenyon v. K. T. M. M. A. Ass'n, 122 N. Y. 247, 25 N. E. 299; Spoeri v. Mass. Mut. Life Ins. Co. (O. C.) 39 Fed. 752; Meyer v. Knickerbocker Life Insurance Co., 73 N. Y. 516, 29 Am. Rep. 200; Church v. Lafayette Fire Insurance Co., 66 N. Y. 222. And in this state, in the case of State Insurance Company v. Maackens, 38 N. J. Law, 564, it was held that "any conduct on the part of the company or its agent, with respect to their liability on the policy, which may reasonably be supposed to have induced the claimant to believe that the time for delivering the proofs would not be relied on by the company, is competent evidence of a waiver of strict adherence to time in the presentation of proofs"—citing Basch v. Humbolt Fire Ins. Co., 35 N. J. Law, 429, and Jones v. Mechanics' Ins. Co., 36 N. J. Law, 29, 13 Am. Rep. 405. There is always a reluctance on the part of courts to take from the jury, as a matter of law, any facts or circumstances from which a waiver may be inferred, and this is shown in the charge to the jury in the case of Hartford Life Insurance Co. v. Unsell, quoted in Justice Harlan's opinion in 144 U. S. 439, 12 Sup. Ct. 671, 36 L. Ed. 496: "I do not think that any number of instances, one or more, can be said, as a matter of law, to make or not to make a waiver. It is for you, as reasonable men, to consider what the company did intend—what would its conduct make a reasonable man believe in reference to it?"

What are, then, the facts and circumstances surrounding this case, and which are to be considered in determining the intent of the plaintiff in error, to waive the forfeiture of this policy. The testimony showed certain facts and circumstances which were insisted upon by counsel for defendants in error as going to show the improbability of the company's intent to enforce the forfeiture against the insured. These facts were the friendly relations subsisting between Dr. Kinne and the company; that he had at one time been the medical examiner of the company, and was one of their "star" insurers; that the company had his note as security for the premium, which was drawing interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum. The contention of counsel was, as stated in their brief, that "these relations between them, and the improbability that the company would intend to enforce a forfeiture which would end these relations, are themselves indicia of an intention to waive the forfeiture, if that contingency should arise." While, perhaps, not conclusive in establishing an intention to waive the forfeiture, still, taken in consideration with the correspondence, it was a matter for the jury to consider them when determining the intention of the company. The denial of the motion to nonsuit was put by the learned trial judge upon the correspondence between Dr. Kinne and the company, and he held that there was a construction of this evidence which would warrant the jury in finding that there had been a waiver of the forfeiture on the part of the company.

The first letter was of the date of February 5, 1903, and was written to Dr. Kinne from Binghampton, and signed "L. E. Turner"; the printed heading showing that he was assistant superintendent of the company. It called Dr. Kinne's attention to the fact that his note would fall due on February 15th, and would be payable to Mr. C. Merwin Turner, 140 Times Building, New York City. The letter desired the doctor to give the matter prompt attention, and to send check at once, and added, "It is never safe to delay until the last day"; and in commenting on this letter the trial judge said: "But the letter does not say in terms that nonpayment before the last day, or nonpayment on the last day, will work a forfeiture, and, of course, this stipulation in clause 4 [of the policy] respecting premium payments—the stipulation that nonpayment when due will render the contract null and void—is intended for the benefit of the company and may be waived by the company." This letter was from the home office of the company, and, it seems to me, can have but one construction, and that is that C. Merwin Turner was the agent of the company to receive payment and to deal with Dr. Kinne, the insured, with respect to such payment. On the very day when the forfeiture would have taken place, in the absence of any waiver, February 15, 1904, Dr. Kinne wrote a letter to Mr. Charles M. Turner (undoubtedly, as appears from his reply, the C. Merwin Turner referred to in the letter of February 5th) as follows: "Dear Sir: On opening this letter you will be as much disappointed as I, not finding a check contained. Certainly your disappointment cannot be greater. It is almost impossible here to make collections of any amount, and I must ask for another extension, suspension, or the privilege of paying a part now and the balance next month." This letter was promptly answered the next day, February 16th, by C. Merwin Turner. He said: "Your esteemed communication of the 15th to hand, and contents carefully noted. If you will forward your check for part of the amount, I will arrange for extension of the balance, and in order to save time kindly sign the inclosed note, and we will credit you with the amount of your check. I regret exceedingly that collections in your line are poor, but have heard other physicians make the same remark recently. Trusting that the condition is only momentary, I am," etc. If, upon the failure of Dr. Kinne to pay the note on February 15th, no action whatever had been taken by the company or its agent, forfeiture under the clause of the policy would have taken effect, but on the day following, as seen above, the agent of the company sent the letter of February 16th, and in submitting the same to the jury the trial judge properly said: "It is for you to say whether it was not the duty of Mr. Turner to report to the company in the ordinary course of his duty the fact that Dr. Kinne had not made the payment strictly on the 15th of February. It is for you to say whether it is to be presumed he did so report. Now Dr. Kinne lived from then until the 4th of March, when, according to the evidence, he died. So far as the case discloses there was no letter subsequently received by Dr. Kinne from the agent or cashier in New York, or from the company's office in Binghampton, insisting on the forfeiture or waiving it, but merely silence on their part, as on the doctor's part, from the 16th of February until the 4th of March." Although in the letter of Mr. Turner of February 16th, in which he said "kindly sign the inclosed note," inadvertently, perhaps, no note was inclosed, and nothing was done by Dr. Kinne in the way of giving a new note or check from the receipt of this letter until his death, still this fact does not in any way affect the inference against the intent of the company to enforce the forfeiture; and this clearly is shown by the retention of the note by the company, and the holding it as a personal obligation. This is further made manifest by the letter of March 11, 1904, written after the death of Dr. Kinne by C. Merwin Turner and addressed to Mr. Theodore Y. Kinne. This letter notifies the doctor that his note for $331.76 is due on the 15th instant, with $5.19 interest, making a total of $336.95, and desires him kindly to give this matter his attention. While it would appear that, when this letter was written, Turner was unaware of the death of Dr. Kinne, nevertheless, it unmistakably shows that the company considered the note a live obligation.

The contention of plaintiff in error was that this letter contained what was termed a "patent error," that the words "is due" should have been "was due," and that the moneys represented the moneys due on the 15th of February, and not on the 15th of March; but I agree with the disposition of this question, made by the trial judge in refusing a nonsuit, when he said: "But, whether it refers to a date before or a date to come, it has reference to the note as a live obligation, and an obligation which had reference to the keeping alive of an insurance contract in the future. This letter may be taken as evidence that before Dr. Kinne's death O. Merwin Turner had been authorized by the company to deal with that note as a live note, implying a dealing with the contract as a live contract; and it seems to me that the correspondence, taken all together, and the terms of the letter of March 11th, taken all together, also with the fact that there was an omission to inclose with the letter of February 15th (if it be so) the note that was intended to be sent with it, seems to me to leave open a construction of evidence that would warrant the jury in finding that after the 15th of February, and before the Doctor's death, O. Merwin Turner had been authorized to deal with this note as a live note and enforce a payment, instead of enforcing a forfeiture of the contract, and thereby waiving the forfeiture in behalf of the company."

The plaintiff in error further contends that it is difficult to understand how an absolute waiver of a forfeiture can be inferred from the letters of February 16th and March 11th; that both of the letters were written after the forfeiture had occurred, and the latter one, in fact, after the death of the insured. So far as the letter of February 16th is concerned, written concededly after the due day of the note, it has as much force legally in effecting a waiver of forfeiture as if written before that day. To quote again from Justice Bradley in Insurance Company v. Norton, supra: "In either case the effect of the legal indulgence is this: The company say to the insured: 'Pay your note by such a time, and your policy shall not be forfeited.' If the agreement be made after the note matures, such agreement is itself a recognition on the company's part of the continued existence of the policy, and consequently of its election to waive the forfeiture."

The point was further taken by the plaintiff in error, under the first assignment of error, "that there was no evidence of a legal tender of the premium due on the policy," and consequently the offer to pay the note by Mr. Graham on March 14th, and the tender through the Western Union Telegraph Company at the home office on March 15th, would not avail, for the reason that the moneys tendered did not represent the amount then due, but was the sum due for principal and interest on February 15th, 30 days before the tender was made, and that, as the interest was not included to the date of the tender, the company was under no obligation to accept a part of the debt. It is questionable whether a tender of the unpaid premium was at all necessary after the rights of the parties had become fixed by the death of the insured, especially as the policy itself provides for offsetting the unpaid premiums against the amount due from the company on the policy. But we have not found it important to determine this point. If, as was suggested at the argument, the fourth clause of the policy means to say that nonpayment of premiums or notes given therefor works a forfeiture, it is difficult to perceive why it should not be held that the fifth clause of the policy, entitled "Grace in Payment of Premiums," makes no distinction between the grace given on failure to pay premiums and the nonpayment of a note given therefor. The amount due, in accordance with the letter of March 11th, was tendered to the defendant within the period of grace, 30 days, prescribed by the fifth clause aforesaid. On both occasions when made it was refused. The defendant refused to accept the amount tendered under any circumstances. Where a tender is refused, not on the ground that the amount is too small, but on some other ground, the objection to the deficiency is waived. Am. & Eng. Ency. vol. 28, p. 18; Lambert v. Miller, 38 N. J. Eq. 117. Had the objection to the tender been put on the ground that the amount was too small, there would be some justification for the claim now made by the plaintiff in error, that it was under no obligation to accept a part of the debt. But this ground was not taken at all. The company waived this objection when it placed its refusal of the tender on the grounds of denial of liability and a refusal to accept the amount tendered.

The other assignments of error were not pressed at the argument, and discussed then only so far as they were involved in the consideration of the assignment based upon the refusal to nonsuit; and no opinion is expressed upon the question whether the defendants below were entitled to a verdict in their favor, as a matter of law, on the construction of the policy and note. In my opinion, the motion to nonsuit was properly overruled, and the case submitted to the jury.

The judgment below should be affirmed.

WOOLSEY et al. v. WOOLSEY et al.

(Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey.
Dec. 6, 1905.)

EXECUTORS—ACCOUNTING—PAYMENTS.

A testator, after bequeathing two pecuniary legacies, devised and bequeathed the residue of his estate to his executors, in trust (1) to set apart a fund and pay the income to his daughter during her life; (2) out of the income derived from the remaining portion of his estate to pay annuities to his daughter and daughter-in-law, and apply a sum for the use of his grandson during minority. There was no income to pay the annuities, or the sum allowed for the grandson; but the executors paid moneys as annuities, and as an allowance for the grandson, and sought in their account to charge these payments against the corpus of the estate which was needed to pay the legacies and meet the trust fund for the daughter. Held, that they are estopped from denying that they had received income from which to make these payments, and are not entitled to an allowance for the payments as against the corpus of the estate.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Prerogative Court.

Frank Woolsey and James P. Northrop, executors of Charles A. Woolsey, filed their account, to which Alice M. Woolsey and Virginia M. Woolsey excepted. From an order overruling the exceptions, they appeal. Reversed in part.

See 59 Atl. 463.

Randolph Perkins and R. V. Lindabury, for appellants. Charles L. Carrick (Robert L. Lawrence, on the brief), for respondents.

SWAYZE, J. Charles A. Woolsey died July 4, 1895. By his will he bequeathed $5,000 to Sarah A. Newell and $10,000 to Virginia M. Woolsey. He devised and bequeathed the residue of his estate to his executors, in trust (1) to set apart $20,000 and pay the income therefrom to his daughter, Alice, during her life; (2) out of the income derived from the remaining portion of his estate to pay therefrom to his daughter, Alice, $1,000 per year, and to his daughter-in-law, Virginia M. Woolsey, $2,000 per year, and to pay and apply for the use of his grandson, Herbert W. Woolsey, during his minority, a sum not exceeding $1,000 per annum. Other provisions as to the disposition of the estate are not material to the present case. A large part of the apparent assets of the estate were invested in the C. A. Woolsey Paint & Color Company. The testator, in view of this fact, made the following provisions: "It is my will, and I do hereby direct that, with the exception of the funds necessary to pay legacies and create the trust estates hereby made, all surplus dividends and other moneys belonging to me and left by me at my death in the C. A. Woolsey Paint & Color Company shall be and remain therein as a surplus fund for the benefit of said business until the division of my estate in the manner herein provided. I direct that the amount to be paid to my daughter, daughter-in-law, and grandson, annually as herein specified, shall so far as practicable be paid out of the income of my estate other than that derived from the C. A. Woolsey Paint & Color Company, and that only so much shall be taken from said company as may be necessary to make up the deficiency, and that all surplus accruing shall be and remain in said business for the purpose of increasing the surplus moneys or working capital thereof. In the event of the income of my estate being insufficient for any current year to pay such annual amounts, I direct that the deficiency be drawn from the accumulation of surplus income left by me or my executors in said company. It is my will, and I direct, that during the minority of my grandson, Herbert W. Woolsey, and in case he shall so long live, the shares of stock owned by me in the C. A. Woolsey Paint & Color Company be not disposed of, but held by my executors and trustees as part of my estate, and that such of my executors as are individual stockholders therein be elected to positions of trust and equal profit therein. And I further direct that my executors and trustees shall not be held to account for any diminution in my estate by reason of continuing my investments in and holding the stock of said corporation as a portion of their trust property and of my estate." No inventory of the estate was ever filed by the executors. The paint company became insolvent in January, 1903, and one of the executors, who had been active in its management, died about the same time. Thereupon on July 30, 1903, the surviving executors filed an account, to which Alice Woolsey and Virginia M. Woolsey excepted. Some of these exceptions were sustained by the orphans' court, and an order was made requiring the executors to give security in the sum of $30,000 for the faithful performance of their duties under the will. Upon an appeal to the Prerogative Court, the Vice Ordinary advised the reversal of both decree and order. From the decrees of the Prerogative Court these appeals were taken by the exceptants.

The exceptions to the account which were sustained by the orphans' court and disallowed by the Prerogative Court were to the following claims for allowances to the executors: (1) For $507.87 for money paid by the executors to the paint company on September 25, 1905. (2) For $14,832.82 paid to Virginia M. Woolsey on account of annuity. (3) For $7,499.72 paid to Alice Woolsey on account of annuity. (4) For $4,450 paid to Virginia M. Woolsey, guardian of Herbert W. Woolsey. By an answer to the petition of appeal in the Prerogative Court the exceptants sought to question the adverse action of the orphans' court on certain exceptions, as is permitted by the rules of the Prerogative Court on appeal from a decree of an orphans' court on the settlement of accounts (rule 2). The petition of appeal in this court complains of the action of the Prerogative Court upon these exceptions, and they must therefore be considered. They are: (1) The allowance to the executors of $500 paid R. A. Simpson December 23, 1896. (2) The failure to charge the executors with a dividend of December 1, 1895, on the paint company stock. (3) The failure to charge the executors with a similar dividend of December 1, 1896.

To deal first with the four items which the orphans' court refused to allow as a credit to the executors. The item of $507.37 arose in the following way: Several small debts of the testator, amounting in all to the sum mentioned, were paid by the paint company and charged to Mr. Woolsey's account, and the amount was repaid to the company by the executors as soon as they were in the funds. We think the orphans' court was right in refusing to allow this payment. The paint company was at the time heavily in debt to the estate, and there was no reason why the amount paid by it and charged against Mr. Woolsey's account should be repaid. By taking this course, the executors ultimately lost this amount unnecessarily. The other three items may be disposed of together. In considering the propriety of the action of the orphans' court, it is to be borne in mind that these items concern only the allowance side of the account. The executors have not been charged with assets which they failed to collect, nor with any loss by reason of a continuance of the testator's investments in the paint company, nor with interest which they failed to receive through mismanagement. They were charged by the orphans' court only with the sums which by their own account they admitted having received. The case does not, therefore, involve a construction of the clauses of the will authorizing a continuance of the testator's investments in the paint company, nor does it involve the jurisdiction of the orphans' court to charge executors with assets which they may have failed to receive through negligence. The only question is as to the propriety of the claim for allowance of the items above specified.

To understand the controversy, it is necessary to set forth the state of the account between the testator and the corporation at the time of his death, and subsequent dividends and payments. There was standing to his credit on the company's books at his death $14,049.61. On August 1, 1895, a dividend was credited amounting to $6,599.20, and on November 30, 1895, a further dividend of $2,282.20. Beginning with October, 1895, payments were made by the company from time to time and charged to this account. At the time of the insolvency, the balance of the account was $5,192.26. The executors proved a claim for this amount with the receiver, and were paid a dividend of $2,336.52. As the payments were made from time to time by the company, they were paid to Virginia M. Woolsey, individually and as guardian for her son, and to Alice Woolsey, as payments on account of the annuities provided by the will. If these payments are allowed as claimed by the executors, the assets in their hands will fall short of meeting the amount required for the legacies to Mrs. Newell (who has had no interest in her legacy) and Virginia M. Woolsey, and nothing will be left to make up the trust fund of $20,000 for the testator's daughter, Alice. By the method of accounting adopted by the Prerogative Court, large sums will have been paid for the annuities which by the will were subject to the legacies, and these payments will have been made at the expense of the legacy to Virginia M. Woolsey and the trust fund provided for Alice Woolsey. It is not to the point that most of the moneys will have been received by the legatees. The testator was careful to distinguish between the legacies and the trust fund on the one hand, and the annuities on the other. The legacies and the trust fund were to be first provided for. The annuities were to be paid out of the income from the remaining portion of his estate. It is manifestly to the disadvantage of Virginia M. Woolsey and Alice Woolsey to have the legacy and the trust fund depleted by the payment of moneys which were paid and received on account of the annuities.

As was said by the Chief Justice in Appleton v. American Malting Co., 65 N. J. Eq. 375, 381, 54 Atl. 454, it is absurd to say that a person suffers no wrong who has been unwittingly induced to exhaust his principal by the mistaken or fraudulent representation of those to whom he had intrusted it that what has been paid to him is income. The annuities were payable only out of income derived from the estate after setting aside enough money to pay the legacies. By paying the annuities, the executors represented to the annuitants that they had income out of which to make these payments after paying the legacies. Having led the annuitants to act on this belief, the executors are estopped from asserting the contrary.

Since the executors are estopped from denying that they had income available for the annuities after payment of the legacies, it can make no difference whether they are surcharged with this amount and allowed for the payments on account of annuities, or whether they are disallowed these payments as a credit against the corpus of the estate which is needed to pay the legacies. The sum of $14,049.61 due the testator from the company at the time of his death was clearly a part of the corpus. The dividend of $6,599.20 declared within a month of his death must also have been a part of the corpus. Lang v. Lang's Executors, 57 N. J. Eq. 325, 41 Atl. 705. Although the dividend of November, 1895, may have been treated as earnings of the company after the testator's death and applicable to annuities, that dividend has never been paid; for all the payments have been treated by the corporation by the method of keeping the account, and by the executors by filing a claim with the receiver for the balance only, as having been made upon the open account, and therefore applicable to the earliest items of the account; and the balance still due after crediting the amount paid by the receiver exceeds the amount of the November dividend. Although the dividend paid by the receiver was based in part upon this November dividend, and may therefore be regarded as income to that extent, the executors are not entitled to the allowance as claimed, for they were allowed by the orphans' court $4,959.74 for moneys paid Alice and Virginia Woolsey as interest on the legacies, as distinguished from the sums paid as annuities. This sum was allowed, although the executors failed to charge themselves with any income on the securities or cash actually in hand, and it far exceeds the total dividend paid by the receiver. They have, therefore, actually had allowance for the amount received from the company, so far as it can be called income. The testator did, indeed, provide that the amount to be paid to his daughter, daughter-in-law, and grandson annually should, as far as practicable, be paid out of the income of his estate other than that derived from the paint company; but this provision related only to the annuities, or, as the testator said, "the amount to be paid annually," and this provision of the will became of no importance in the actual situation, as there never was an income out of which the annuities could be paid. If the executors had followed the directions of the will, the assets actually received by them would have sufficed for the legacies and the Alice Woolsey trust fund. They chose, instead, to assume to pay annuities which they had no income to meet. They are not entitled to reimburse themselves at the expense of the legacies which the testator said should be paid before the annuities. We think, therefore, that the orphans' court was right in not allowing the executors for these payments.

Of the exceptions to the account which were disallowed by the orphans' court, three only were complained of in the answer to the petition of appeal. Two of these were to the failure of the executors to charge themselves with certain dividends of the paint company. These exceptions are not sustained by the proofs, and the action of the orphans' court was right. The third complained of an allowance for $500 paid to Simpson, one of the executors. The claim of the executors is that the money had been paid by Simpson to Alice Woolsey, and that he was entitled to be reimbursed therefor. The testimony as to this payment is unsatisfactory, and no voucher from Alice Woolsey is produced. One of the executors testified that Simpson advanced the money in some way or other; that he must have paid the $500; that the witness never signed an estate check unless he was morally certain that it was all right. The other executor testified that he never signed an estate check without being thoroughly satisfied that the amount was correct; that Virginia was being paid $250 interest; that Alice was looking to Simpson, and he was taking care of her; that the witness must have known at the time; that it was a good while ago to recall. In the absence of a voucher from Alice Woolsey, we think the evidence insufficient to warrant a credit of $500 for money paid to the deceased executor. This exception should have been sustained.

The Prerogative Court also reversed the order of the orphans' court requiring the executors to give security. This order was made under section 140 of the orphans' court act (P. L. 1898, p. 767), which authorizes the court to require security whenever proof is made to its satisfaction that the property in the hands of the executor is unsafe, insecure, or in danger of being wasted. We think that the conduct of the executors in using money which should have been paid to the legatees, or invested to secure the trust fund for the testator's daughter, to pay annuities which should have been paid out of income received after paying the legacies and setting apart the trust fund, justified the conclusion that the property was unsafe in the hands of the executors. The amount of assets actually admitted to be still in their hands is a little less than $6,000. The additional amount with which they are chargeable is over $27,000. We think a bond of $30,000 is not excessive.

The decrees of the Prerogative Court should be reversed. The decrees of the orphans' court upon an accounting should be reversed, and the account restated in accordance with the views herein expressed. The order of the orphans' court requiring security should be affirmed. The executors are entitled to costs in both courts.

SHUSTER v. PHILADELPHIA, B. & W. R. CO.

(Supreme Court of Delaware. Jan. 16, 1906.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT—FELLOW SERVANTS—OPERATION OF RAILROAD.

A yardmaster in charge of a yard and a brakeman and conductor are fellow servants of a car inspector employed in the yard to examine cars and determine whether they are in proper condition for use.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 34, Cent. Dig. Master and Servant, §§ 494, 500.]

2. SAME.

The superintendent of a division of a railway company is not a fellow servant of a car inspector employed in a yard to examine cars and determine whether they are in proper condition for use, but is a vice principal.

3. SAME—INJURY TO SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE OF FELLOW SERVANT.

A superintendent of a division sent a message to a freight conductor, directing him to move a crippled car and "take it on next" to his cabin car. There was no evidence that the car was crippled, except at one end. Held, that the message directed the conductor to put the crippled car behind the cabin car, with its uninjured end attached to the cabin car by means of the usual coupling, making the conductor negligent in putting the car before the cabin car, thereby relieving the company of liability for injuries received by a car inspector in consequence of the conductor's act; the car inspector and conductor being fellow servants.

4. SAME—CRIPPLED CARS IN TRAIN—NOTICE—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action against a railway company for the death of a car inspector in consequence of the negligent placing of a defective car in a train, the evidence showed that it was the custom of the company to give notice of the existence of crippled cars by placing on them shop cards denoting that they were injured, and were to be taken to shops for repair, and that the crippled car in question had on each side of it in the usual place such a shop card. The injured car, at the time of the accident, was not used by the company in its business. It was empty, and was being carried to the shop for repairs. Held, that the company was not guilty of actionable negligence in failing to give further notice of the crippled car.

5. SAME—RULES.

Since the proper place in a train for a crippled car depends on the character of its injury, it is impracticable to prescribe by general rule the place in which all such cars should be placed, and a railway company is not guilty of actionable negligence toward a servant for failing to establish a general rule.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 34, Cent. Dig. Master and Servant, § 283.]

6. SAME.

Where it was usual for car inspectors to ride on trains run in on tracks for inspection, and to do so, if not absolutely necessary, was a convenience to them in the prosecution of their work, the failure of the company to establish a rule prohibiting car inspectors from riding on trains while they were run in on a track for inspection was not such negligence as to render it liable for injuries received by an inspector.

Error to Superior Court, New Castle County.

Action by Elsie D. Shuster, widow of Mahlon C. Shuster, deceased, against the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad Company. There was a judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Argued before NICHOLSON, Ch., and SPRUANCE and BOYCE, JJ.

William S. Hilles and William W. Knowles, for plaintiff in error. Ward & Gray, for defendant in error.

SPRUANCE, J. This action was brought by the plaintiff, the widow of Mahlon C. Shuster, for the recovery of damages for the death of her husband, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant company. Under instruction of the court the jury rendered a verdict for the defendant. To this instruction and the rulings of the court as to the admission and rejection of certain testimony, the plaintiff excepted. At the time of the accident which caused the death of Shuster, and for several years before that time, he was in the employ of the defendant as a car inspector. As such inspector, it was his duty to examine cars at the Edgemoor yard of the defendant, near the city of Wilmington, for the purpose of ascertaining whether they were in proper condition to be used in the business of the defendant. The yard contained 18 or 20 tracks, and was divided into two sections. As a train came in, it was run upon one of these tracks, inspected, and made up for its passage to the point of its destination. On July 22, 1903, a Pennsylvania Railroad box freight car, with the drawbar pulled out and part of the end sill off, was at Seaford, Del. On the same day Alfred Larimore, the conductor of a freight train from Delmar, bound north, received at Seaford from R. L. Holliday, superintendent of the Delaware Division of the defendant company, a telegram, giving the number of said car and directing him as follows: "Move this car from Seaford to Edgemoor. Take it on next to your cabin car." The conductor testified that he understood this to mean that he should place said car next ahead of the cabin car, and he, with the assistance of two of his train crew, did so place it in his train, and made it fast to the cabin car, which was the last car of the train, by means of a chain which he had found about the truck of the damaged end of the injured car. When, by whom, or for what purpose, the said chain had been put upon the injured car, is not disclosed by the evidence. The damaged car appears to have been attached to the cabin car as securely as was possible by means of said chain, and the journey from Seaford to the Edgemoor yard was made without accident, notwithstanding the fact that there was more slack or play between these cars than there would have been had they been connected by means of the usual coupling. Arriving at the Edgemoor yard, the yardmaster ordered the conductor to back his train on track No. 4, saying that everything was clear. This was in the evening after dark, about 8:05 according to one witness, and after 8:35 according to another. Thereupon the train was backed slowly in on said track, at the rate of between four and five miles an hour; the brakeman, Murphey, standing on the top of the disabled car as a lookout, and Shuster and another car inspector, who had boarded the train while backing in on said track, sitting on the platform of the cabin car next to the disabled car, when the moving train came in violent collision with a car or cars standing on said track, and the shop car, the sill of which was from four to eight inches higher than the sill or platform of the cabin car, rode over and demolished the cabin car, and so injured Shuster and the other car inspector that they both died shortly thereafter.

It is clear that the proximate cause of the accident was the negligence of the yardmaster in directing the conductor to run his train upon track No. 4, and informing him that it was clear, when there was standing upon it a car or cars with which the train was liable to collide. Whether there was negligence on the part of the brakeman standing on the top of the disabled car is not clear from the evidence. If the conductor misinterpreted the telegram of the superintendent, and placed the injured car before, when he should have placed it behind, the cabin car, and coupled them together by means of the chain, instead of the usual and uninjured coupling on the good end of the injured car, he was guilty of negligence, which, to say the least, materially contributed to the fatal accident. But the yardmaster, the brakeman, and the conductor were all fellow servants of the car inspector Shuster, and, if his death was the result of the negligence of any or all of these persons, the defendant would not for this cause be liable in this action. Wheatley v. P. W. & B. R. R. Co., 1 Marv. 305, 30 Atl. 660; Oreswell v. W. & N. R. R. Co., 2 Pennewill, 210, 43 Atl. 629. On the other hand, Mr. Holliday, the superintendent, was not a fellow servant of Shuster, but a vice principal, and, if the death of Shuster was caused by the negligence of the superintendent, the defendant would be liable. McKinley on Fellow Servants, p. 292; 3 Elliott on Railroads, § 1321; 4 Thompson on Negligence, § 4951. It therefore becomes important to determine whether the superintendent was guilty of negligence in sending to the conductor the telegram given above.

It is within the province of the court to construe written instruments, and it is our duty, with the aid of the testimony in the case, to determine, if we can, the meaning of said telegram. While the order of the superintendent was to take the disabled car on next to the cabin car, it did not state whether it was to be placed before or behind the cabin car. A fair interpretation of the order would be that the disabled car, being next to the cabin car, should be placed where it could be safely carried. There is no evidence that this car was crippled, except at one end, and we can see no reason why it should not have been put behind, and with its uninjured end next to the cabin car, and attached to it by the usual coupling. The uncontradicted testimony is to the effect that the accident would probably not have occurred had the shop car and the cabin car been coupled together with the usual coupling, and that the usual, safe, and proper place for a car with a broken coupler is behind the cabin car. Conductor Larimore testified that, if he had been using his own judgment, he would have put said car behind the cabin car, but that he understood the said telegram to mean that he should put it next before the cabin car, and for that reason he did so. We think that the said telegram was sufficiently explicit, and was not misleading, and that the conductor erred in his interpretation of it, and that in so doing, and in putting said car before the cabin car, and in attaching them together as was done, he was guilty of negligence; but, as before stated, he was the fellow servant of Shuster, and such negligence is not sufficient to charge the defendant in this action.

It is claimed by the plaintiff that the defendant was guilty of negligence in failing to give to its car inspectors proper notice of the dangerous condition of the injured car. It is in evidence that it was the custom of the defendant to give notice to all concerned of the condition and destination of crippled cars by placing upon them what were known as "shop cards," which denoted that they were injured and were to be taken to the shops for repair; and also that the crippled car in this case had on each side of it, in the usual place, a shop card of this character. It will be observed that in this case the injured car, at the time of the accident, was not being used by the defendant in its business. It was empty, had been laid off at Seaford because it was not fit for use, and was being carried to the shop for repairs. This case differs essentially from that of Rodney v. St. Louis S. W. Railway Co. (Mo.) 28 S. W. 887, where the defendant was held liable for injuries to an employee while coupling a damaged car. In that case the car had some time before been laid off as damaged and marked as such, but at the time of the accident it was without any danger mark, and was being used in the ordinary business of the company. Under all the circumstances of this case we think that there was no negligence on the part of the defendant in failing to give other notice of the damaged car than was given.
